NOTICE.—The Editor of this Work has had a few copies of it corrected with the pen throughout; though this having been done with great carelessness, a further regulation may, in some instances, be found needful. These Copies have been respectively deposited in the British Museum Library, the Bodleian and other Libraries, Oxford, the University and other Libraries, Cambridge, Trinity College Library, Dublin, the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, the Wesleyan Theological, and other Libraries and Literary Institutes of Great Britain, the Astor Library, New York, etc.,—to serve as references and exemplars for a similar correction of other circulated copies, wherein that may not have been effected, but which is advisable to be done.—To these insertions, the Editor would make a further or final addition, by the following

ANNOTATION.—When the Reader has duly mastered the studies of this work, which are summarily comprised in the pamphlet entitled, "A Guide to the Knowledge for a Biography of William Law," bound up with it,—if he, in his meditations upon the revealed mystery and nature of things, elucidated in the work, (whilst experiencing a perfect satisfaction of mind as to the essential doctrines and practice of religion,) should yet feel unable to apprehend the scheme or process of creation and redemption—with its several beginnings and ends, its stupendous revolutions of events, and final consummation, as a completed circle, returned again into its first starting point—even the first opening of the heavenly eternity; and the moral scope or object of the Divine Providence in such process, namely to render impossible any further lapse or falling-away thenceforth for ever—by turning the averted wills of all immortal intelligences into a fixed adherence to, and union with the one only good, perfect, divine will; and the entire procedure—embracing therein the consideration of the subsequent reserves of the eternal heavenly glory, to be truly worthy of INFINITE GOODNESS to have devised and accomplished,—if, it is observed, such a further apprehension or birth of understanding be desired by the student of this book, then, presuming him to be acquainted with the arcana of 'Animal Magnetism,' and the circumstances of 'Gichtel's deliverance of the soul of his friend,' he is recommended for that end to peruse the theological discourses of vols. iv. and v. of the "Fool of Quality," 1770, together with pp. 244-5 of "La Voie de la Science Divine," 12 mo. Paris, 1805, considering therewith pp. 211-17 and other relative passages of the present work, and finally, (in order to greater power and certainty of judgment,) the contents of the treatises VII. VIII., described pp. 687-8 of the same. By this means the reader, if duly qualified, may attain to a perfect freedom and delight of understanding on the above topics; with moreover, an insight into the mysteries of the millennial age,—as of the subsequent final jubilee, or harvest home, and hallelujah chorus of the all-assembled children of God, at the opening reign of the eternal heavenly glory. For the powers of the free will of understanding, having attained to sense, and the experience of themselves, must return to, and rest in their original mother, and God again be ALL IN ALL. [John xvii. 5, 20-24, Luke xv. 2-7, 17-32, Rev. xxii. 13.]

There appearing now nothing more of needful information to be added to the contents of this work, as a key or clue to the entire science of true theology, it will be henceforth put into free circulation, ad honorem et gloriam, veram scientiam et adorationem Dei.—If however, further elucidations be deemed suitable, insertion of them will, for the present, be requested in "Notes and Queries."

Preparing an elucidation of these mystical implications and events

PREFACE.

"True metaphysics are the philosophy, and sound mystics the spirit of religion; and that mystical contemplation, which I have frankly endeavoured to reduce to a science, is as superior to any other science, as the soul to the body, and more or less legible on every attentive breast."

THE understanding of the Editor upon the subjects of recondite and practical knowledge introduced into this work, having been greatly enlarged and perfectionated during the several years he has been occupied over it, especially as he approached to its conclusion, when it was, that he first obtained a true and philosophic insight into the arcanum of "Animal" or "Vital Magnetism," so denominated, with the magical wonders that lie couched in it, both as a science and an art; and without which apprehension, it must be affirmed, that neither the original revelations of Scripture as to their literal truth, nor the purely magic phenomena of Nature in any age, can be adequately understood, or rationally explained:—such being the case, the reader will please to observe, that those only of its statements are to be regarded as the Editor's final determinations, which shall be found to be unmodified by subsequent remarks, either in the work itself, or in the "Introduction to Theosophy," which immediately succeeded to it, or by the contents of the "Corrigenda and Addenda" prefixed to it, and immediately following the present introduction* or Preface. The knowledge or comprehension of the entire treatise, as of its references, will therefore be needful, before any representation of its original contents may be honorably offered to the public notice.

For, as truth, and the promulgation of a sound judgment in reference to the leading subjects of its contents,—of such a judgment as, it may be supposed, would have distinguished a Law, a Freher, a Gichtel, a Bramwell, a Kempis, a Lopez, a Paul, or such like divinely illuminated souls, in the like circumstances, or even our Lord himself,—as this practical and important end has been the aim of the Editor throughout the work—to establish as it were, once for all, a catholic standard of knowledge and judgment in respect to the truths of regeneration, or philosophy of the gospel, in its purest form of faith and practice, elementary and recondite, for all future ages of the

* The ultimate object of this work, as hereafter named, and as its Title page imports, may be said, by way of metaphor, to be, the erection of a Temple or Monument of Wisdom, which shall be truly a realization of the beau-ideal of a rightly developed human mind, according to the highest classic refinements of learning, wit and literary art, [the completest discoveries of natural science,] the sublimest principles of moral philosophy, and the purest lights, and holliest attainments of gospel regeneration, or christianity. Whilst its immediate design, is to find, or to assist in creating, the artist or artificer, who shall possess the architectural genius and mechanical talent requisite for the erection of such an edifice, aided however by the supervision, counsels and experience, as might be demanded, of the Editor of the present work.

had been originally derived from those fountains of holy erudition and sublime religious experience, the devotional schoolmen, and their faithful successors, the eminent contemplatives and mystical divines. In those writings however, being of a popular character, or for edification merely, the duty of self-renunciation, and resignation to God, and to the will of our neighbour, was treated hortatively only, or as may be termed dogmatically. But in Mr. Law's writings of the "Spirit of Prayer," the "Way to Divine Knowledge" and the "Spirit of Love," with his "Collection of Letters"—the series of works elucidating the philosophy opened in the "Appeal," (which treatise might not improperly be designated the principia of pure metaphysical science,) the grounds and reasons of the doctrine, as of all the essential points of Christian truth and practice, were found to be fundamentally exhibited, and the whole subject handled with such a comprehensiveness of grasp, and completeness of demonstration, in the strictest sense of the term, as left not another word to be said upon it, whether of the reasons or extent of the duty, the imperativeness of its fulfilment, and the means by which alone it could be performed.

By these treatises then, conjointly with the former mentioned, the Editor became initiated into the true classic doctrines of spiritual or mystical divinity, free from all extraneous non-essential matter,—that is, concerning the new and the old man in us, their respective natures, tempers, and spirit, and mutual relations; and then as to the full practical extent of the self-discipline enjoined by the gospel, (though lying loose and scattered over its pages,) for the crucifixion and death of the latter, and the simultaneous resurrection and life of the former in its stead. For in these two points, are undoubtedly summed up all the practices and duties of the gospel, or which form the conditions, covenants and trusts of the new testament, made by Christ prior to his death; by the faithful performance or fulfilling of which, each individual believer was to enjoy the true benefits of his redemption: according to his universal proclamation, Unless a man deny himself, take up his cross daily, and follow me, he cannot be my disciple; that is, cannot partake of my salvation, cannot attain to the regeneration in this world, nor to my state of blessedness in the world to come. Or again, He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life; in other words, He that dieth to himself and to all the spirit and temper of this world and of Satan, and, with his entire heart and spirit converted to God alone, desires, hungers, lives and prays only, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, according to my own one practice, shall (after my resurrection from the dead, ascension and glorification,) find arising in himself, a new holy nature or spirit, having free communion with God, and which shall be to him a source of every good and blessedness.

Such was the practical evangelical science found to be taught and demonstrated in the series of works last-mentioned; and that not from the simple declaration of Scripture, but from an opening of the ground of nature itself; so that nature was, as it were called forth, and made to testify to the truth of the essential doctrines of the gospel religion, above mentioned.

By these writings, also, the Editor became inducted into the philosophy of Nature, as to its physical or spiritual ground, and electro-chemical operation or combination in itself; which particular however, is more immediately spoken to, in the last two books, the "Way to Divine Knowledge" and the "Spirit of Love." These, whilst forming a concluding sequence to the "Appeal," were professedly composed by Mr. Law, as an Introduction to the Writings of Behmen, and to the right use and manner of reading them: wherein he shows, how that Behmen's writings, though an immediate revelation from God, were not intended for the use of individuals acquainted with the real design of the gospel, and sincerely intent upon the fulfilment of its dictates,—that is, in working out their salvation, in seeking the regeneration, or perfect renewal of their moral natures in the image of God; for such as these, he observed, required no further instruction, being already duly enlightened, and practically intent upon the one only end and aim of all religion and divine revelation: but that the persons to whom they were immediately applicable, were such as, both theoretically and practically, were uncognisant of the scope and design of the christian religion. Which description embraced, it may be said, not only aliens to the commonweath of Israel of whatsoever name throughout the world, but entire Christendom itself; for the pure devotees in religion, though existing in every sect, were comparatively so few, as to be undistinguishable amid the general mass of mere nominal christians. The peculiar adaptation of such a revelation to the universal wants and necessities of the world, he shows to consist in this, that it offers a fundamental elucidation of the nature, power and original of the human Will, and of its central relations to the soul and spirit, and all subsequent parts or developments of man's threefold creaturely life;—involving therefore, a demonstration of the divine Nature, in which all created immortal existences “live and move and subsist,” as well as of the Supernatural life of the Deity, wherein man has his uncreated original, as an idea or generated image of the divine Unity. And that, as the Deity by the working of his supernatural Will, generates his own glorious heavenly nature, or perfection of life, as a birth and spirit of love; so man, by his will, (the ‘engrafted word,’) being of the self-same original eternity, and in its degree possessed of the same magical powers, is to work and generate his glorious heavenly nature or perfection of life, by a similar magical process or new birth, becoming also a spirit of love. This Mr. Law briefly sets forth in the two treatises last mentioned,* but refers the reader for the full elucidation of the subject (in every possible variety of light) to the writings of Behmen. Who was thus raised up and illuminated by God, to offer (first to the christian world fallen away from the simplicity and purity of the gospel faith and practice,) a logical demonstration, from self-evident principles, of original truth; and a fundamental resolution of all the grand central questions of theology and philosophy, that were demanded of the spirit of nature, by the exigencies of the time, in order to the perfect establishment of those two components of science, on a proper working basis of purification, and efficiency of development, for the future amelioration and regeneration of the world.—Thus it was, that the Editor became, both intellectually and practically, introduced into what Mr. Law terms, God's last dispensation to the world, namely, the opening of the ground and mystery of all things: to which (says he,) every folly and vanity of life must, sooner or later, give up itself.

On entering into an examination of Behmen's writings, it was found that in order to obtain a good understanding of their scope and unity, and the relations and harmony of the philosophy† contained in them, they were not to be studied in the order in which they are published in the uniform editions

* By way of thoroughly mastering the works of Mr. Law, especially those relating to religious philosophy, commencing with the “A answer to the Plain Account of the Sacrament,” embracing those contained in the “Introduction to Theosophy,” and ending with the “Spirit of Love,” which will suffice for an introduction to the philosophy of Behmen, supposing the student to be versed in the metaphysical and mystical knowledge prevailing in the earlier part of Law's generation, and also in the simple evangelic theology of the Methodists,—the student would do well to write out a correct analysis or abstract of their contents, whereby he would perceive as at a glance, the heads, logical order and entire drift of the argumentation, and how far they appear to sustain their professed aim and conclusions.

† This philosophy which necessarily contains the only true refutation and overthrow of all errors, heresies and infidelities whatsoever, in religious faith and practice, and affords the only logical means of the induction of the intellectual “heathen” or unbelieving mind into the gospel faith, (both which objects, it is the mission and obligation of the Church of Christ to accomplish,—) though revealed as herein decyphered, to these last ages, and with such internal evidences, as to incontrovertably prove it to have proceeded from that self-same Spirit which first opened and announced the gospel: this counsel of God, so admirably suited to the peculiar wants and distresses of the fallen dark and ignorant state of Christendom, and the world at large,—this new revelation of the

of them: for the author's perceptions at the commencement of his illumination, or when he first attempted to describe the same in writing, were altogether fixed upon the single object then before his vision, namely the birth or essentiality of nature, in its sevenfold working unity in itself, or as to its seven fountain spirits, properties or qualifications; which he describes simply as his spiritual eye beheld them, without any reflexions or suppositions of any deeper original of their manifest working unity. Which remark however, applies only to his first treatise of the "Aurora," written some seven years before any of his other and following books; wherein his descriptions of the seven spirits, by reason of his at the time non-apprehension of the origin of the fourth property of the fire, differ from, and are relatively inferior to, those contained in the subsequent treatises, where that point had become recognised in his understanding. In his after writings then, commencing with the "Threefold Life," (his spiritual vision* having become familiar with the objects continually presented before it, and been enabled to make inferences and reflexions thereupon,) he had evidently come to apprehend the existence of a deeper or higher ground, than the septenary fluxional unit of nature, which he had previously, in the infancy of his illumination and conceptions, taken to be the first or deepest root of things, and that this latter was itself but a birth and manifestation of that former higher, invisible, and otherwise incomprehensible abyss. Whence it is, his descriptions of the seven properties, became settled in the form in which they appear in the "Three Principles" and his subsequent writings.—His knowledge in God indeed, became deeper and deeper, during the penning of his revealments, (as he expressly intimates at the commencement of the "Answers" to the "Forty Questions;") nor did he, as some have imagined, apprehended at once all that he saw, with what was logically involved therein. His descriptions therefore, must be received according to such an intimation, by the well-disposed reader of his works; who will find his ground of understanding therein always consonant and uniform, though the literal expressions relating to the same point, may appear not always to agree together, or even to contradict each other.—And yet how excusable would be even greater im-word and wisdom of God, offering a solution of every query that the human mind can form to itself, concerning its own original, present state and future destiny,—though having existed in print, and been published abroad for upwards of two centuries, the writer found upon his inquiries, to be unknown to the church as a body, and where it had been made known to the chief priests and rulers thereof, had been rejected by them. And this, for simply such reasons as a prosperous, easy, self-satisfied farmer, destitute of any of the acquisitions of polite learning, science and art, beyond the mere rudiments of simple arithmetic, reading and writing, and having no knowledge nor feeling the want of any further erudition,—might be supposed to address to his son, to dissuade him from seeking a learned and enlightened education. Namely, 'to have nothing to do with any such pretended fine-spun, mystical, highflying, useless, unscriptural knowledge,—an attempting to be wise above what was written, in the plain, simple word of God; or that had ever been heard of, by his well-to-do respectable ancestors. Who were as good and as great men as he ever would be; and who kept simply to the one only essential business of life, namely the good cultivation of their farms, and the plentiful production of grain, food and clothing for their subsistence, wealth and comfort'.—Similar were the reasons adduced to the Editor, for keeping the students of our theological institutes, shut up in the simple elements and dogmas of popular Bible christianity; and neither desiring nor seeking to know philosophically, the nature of that Deity of wisdom, power and goodness, that had created, redeemed and sustained them in itself; and which had been pleased to reveal itself apprehensively to their understandings, by the instrumentality of the published writings here alluded to. However, as Mr. Law says, what God designed by such a revelation, must, sooner or later, come to pass: and to attempt to prevent it bearing down, as it must, all before it, will be as futile as to attempt to retard the coming of the last day.

* It may be here remarked, that Behmen was a perfect clairvoyant in the supremest sense of the term; not only, according to Dr. Gregory's definition, "possessed of double consciousness," and not confined, as our modern alleged 'seers' and 'lucides,' to the inferior astral, or phantasmic nature, (who thereby show the position and relations of their spiritual state, in regard to the centre and total universe of life and truth, for no eye can see beyond that world or principle in which it lives:—) but he was able to penetrate through all worlds and spheres of being, even to the centre of the divine majesty itself; for being a highly regenerated gospel christian, therefore the divine eye found in him a proper medium of understanding.—To enjoy our original and redeemed prerogatives of perfect clairvoyance and magical power, it is essential that we by regeneration, attain to our original state and place in creation; and then all is natural to us.

perfections in his writings, when it is considered, that he, no sooner wrote a work, at the earnest instance and intreaties of his friends, than it was immediately taken away from him to be copied, and he set upon some fresh labor by them; so that there appears to have been no preconceived connectedness with his various treatises, but they were all independent pieces, never printed in his life time, but left scattered abroad in MS. in the world. It is rather then the more wonderful, that there should be found such manifest serial unity in his writings, and, considering his unlettered genius, such an admirable, easy, regular descent therein, into the very deepest mysteries of the divine nature; and that such difficult super-rational matters are described by him with so few exteriorly, or superficially objectionable and contradictory terms.

This abyssal, hyperspiritual, hyperphysical, supernatural ground, here alluded to, or, more properly speaking to us, unground—containing the potency of all visible light, and of all natural senses, yea of all powers, colors and virtues,—the Editor might designate in modern photographic phraseology, the negative of nature; or, with the mathematicians, the ab infinitum minus of the unit; or the root and virgin matrix, or central radius of the first fluxional spheric point, for the point is only symbolised by a visible dot, its real entity being mental or magical; and indeed, by numberless other negative yet pregnant well meaning terms,—all of them of true necessity and import in the formulas and elucidations of theosophic science, just as are the minus symbols of quantity or number, in algebraic or mathematical demonstrations. For this abyss, though nothing to us, and to that ground of nature whereby it becomes an object of a created understanding, is not nothing in and to itself, for it contains all, and all things have proceeded forth out of it,—not of necessity, but as the play or sport of its free lubet, good-pleasure or delight; either as immediate births of its own scientiz in eternity, or by subsequent combinations of the same, having a beginning in time, and therefore an end.—This abyssal ground in short, Behmen had discovered to be a mere natureless, affectionless, creatureless WILL, of goodness, light and truth, with all the virtues, colors and powers thereof, eternally posited in a central unity, and thence in a circumferential, or distinguishable sonant development, or word of wisdom—this in what may be termed the infinite abyss or capacity of its own womb, being a magia or desirous nothing: whilst the septenary twofold unity of nature, he had found to be, the material or spiritual posit of this same universal magia, desirous nothing, or capacity of the will, fulfilled with its aforesaid posited lubet, centre, heart, or allness, of the virtue, power and glory of light, goodness and truth. A Will which, by its own inherent instinct, flows forth, without predetermination to this or that, for without itself there is nothing; but generating or positing as it instinctively flows forth, and only magnetically electing in the creaturely manifestations, or formabilities of its working word, in nature. Whence, by the way, Behmen clears up the great doctrine of Election, or Predestination; and hence also his expressions, All is magical; magic is the mother of all things; the eternity is magical,—seeing that all things are the products of Will, working in imagination and desire, and only subsist in such a form of life. To return then,

The student, or seeker of divine knowledge, who has advanced so far in the process of its attainment, as to have passed through the experience of the simple evangelical doctrine, (described Rom. vi. 17—19, and embraced in the division of study classed under the head of “Interscript Continued,” hereafter inserted,) into the next higher practical stage, of spiritual or mystical divinity; and is there exercising himself in the discipline of dying to self, or, in other words, is diligently climbing the steep and slippery hill of perfection, (in the manner described and recommended Phil. iii. 11—14, and Ephes. iv. 13, etc. ;) and who is therefore being duly conditioned for the further or highest branch of the spiritual education, namely theosophy, or a clairvoyant contemplation of the whole field of creation, from the centre of the divine wisdom or image of God, (when reopened in the soul, by the appointed divine magnetist for that end, as the blossom of its regenerated life: which alone is worthy of the name of divine knowledge,—to behold the divine separator, the working word, the verbum fiat, or creating power in all things!)—such a student, it is remarked, should not, on his entering upon Behmen's theosophical writings, confine himself altogether to the earlier treatises; but endeavour in the first place, to obtain a conception of the entire scope of his philosophy,—commencing with that abyssal nothing before spoken of, out of which nature and all things arise, and then of the modal action* of such birth or geniture; whereby the relations and distinctions of Deity and Nature, as well as the constitution or electro-chemic qualification of the latter, would be duly understood. For this purpose, he might now (after the perusal of Behmen's "Epistles,") take up the fifth treatise of the author, the "Book of the Incarnation" before mentioned—the Second Part, and after perusal thereof proceed to the next following treatise of the "Six Points," and after that the "Answers" to the thirteen "Theosophic Questions," with the "Three Tables" and "Clavis." And having thus apprehended, as in a map or scheme, the author's field of vision in his theosophic contemplations, and the causal source of nature's ground,† he might then return to the treatise of the "Three Principles or Worlds of Nature," or of the "Threefold Life of Man," as recommended by Mr. Law in the "Way to Divine Knowledge," in order to obtain a particular and clear intellectual conception of the seven fountain spirits, desirous forms, or properties, composing the unit of the eternal original universal, or divine Nature, (with its two perfectly balanced, contrary principles, of black darkness and lustrous light, having in their centre or midst, as a point of union and of severance, and as the life of each, the fire, or fourth property, being the eye, or opening of the omnipotent, supernatural, abyssal One, or Deity :) and from and according to which seven, every power, quality, motion,‡ essence and life, mental and physical, every mystery of grace and every mystery of nature, has its birth or descent and working,§ mediately or immediately.

To return now to the current of the discourse touching the origin of the present work. From what has been related, it may be seen how the Editor pursued his studies of spiritual or mental nature, by reason of his acquaintance with Mr. Law; how all the steps of his process were experimental apprehensions, and not mere notional opinions; and how the termination of his noviciate placed him on the highest ground of contemplative knowledge, by introducing him into a true acquaintance with the principles of Behmen's writings: where now he felt he had arrived at the original source of all sound information on metaphysical science. For "not a question can be put, nor

* For instance, it is said, that in the generation of the ground of nature, two opposite properties of equal strength begin together. But the reason of this is never stated. Now the reason is this, it is because this supernatural, universal, nothing-and-all-powerful WILL, in forming itself into a point of desire, of physical manifestation, necessarily draws or attracts itself, unbalances itself, pulls itself, just in proportion as it would compress. Hence it is, the enclosing and attracting or drawing, are opposite energies, and of equal force.

† To fully assist the Student in this essential particular, as well as to render more facile of apprehension, the entire scope and nature of the "mystery of Christ"—of "God and the Father, and Christ"—of Deity, nature and man, the Editor has drawn out three sequential charts or series of symbols, which he purposes to insert in the present work, or if not convenient so to do, then in the Second Volume of the "Introduction to Theosophy," when published.

‡ A reference to Grove's "Correlative Forces" and the treatises mentioned at the end of that work, may assist the Student to understand the essential characteristics of the Seven Powers, as found unbalanced, dissevered and imprisoned, or congealed in the material forms of fallen nature; or as latent and at liberty in the expanse of our solar vortex, and constituting the base of the four elements, or elementary gases of material nature.

Of course, travelling as he was, in these researches, or studies, over a vast pathless country, without any guide but such general hints as he had found interspersed through the writings of Mr. Law, and without any other light than the common sense and awakened divine instinct of his own mind; and being moreover deeply engaged in secular affairs,—he was necessarily many years before he attained to such an elevation, as to enjoy a large, and relatively correct view of the vast province of central and universal truth, which now in every direction, presented itself before his delighted vision.

Having then arrived at such eminence, and being enabled to perceive, and to describe comprehensively to others, the direct and safe, though intricate path leading to the same desirable point of vision; and also having made continual descents therefrom into the surrounding districts to explore the same, and ascertain by actual verification, that it was really the country he was in search of, and replete with all the treasures of wisdom and philosophy, even all that the human mind could possibly conceive of as desirable to possess, (and which the enlightened and reflecting of all ages, had ever been secretly longing to discover,)—he became further desirous to make the world acquainted with the same. And feeling, moreover, a grateful admiration of the genius, wisdom and piety of Mr. Law, through whose writings ministerially, he had attained to such a satisfaction of understanding respecting the deep mysteries of religion and nature, (which indeed, are all latent in the human mind, as a self-evident knowledge, and only require awakening into sensibility or vegetation, by the appliances of right horticultural art or instruction,) he began to search through libraries for information concerning Mr. Law personally, beyond what was reported in Tighe's brief Memorial of him; also if any letters or writings of his in existence which were not publicly known. It had also often been a thought of his mind, where and how Mr. Law had obtained so full and clear an apprehension, as he manifestly possessed, of the deep sense of the writings of Behmen, and that, (as evident from a comparison of the dates of his publications and the style of their contents, as of other notices of his writings and opinions existing abroad in print,) in so short a time,—whether any individuals or authors before him, had systematically elucidated Behmen, of whose labours he had had the benefit. By such researches, and the clues which were thereby obtained for further inquiry, (probably analogous to those which Mr. Law himself had made, through the families and friends of Campbell, Hutcheson, or Lee, and others, on the occasion of his first meeting* with Behmen, and ob-

* See Notes p. 26, 368, seq. To understand why Law received with such open arms and delight, the heavenly boon contained in Behmen's writings, it will be necessary to go back to consider the state of his understanding in metaphysics previously; and how his spirit must have hungered after a true and adequate philosophy of God and Nature,—his knowledge in such respect, having been derived from the best metaphysics in vogue up to his age, of the ancients, the schoolmen, the mystics, and philosophers such as Des Cartes and Malebranche, for which latter author he had a great taining an insight into the divine truth of his declarations,) and subsequently by an application to the family of Law, now residing at King's Cliffe, (being the direct descendants of Mr. Law's eldest and most respected brother,) he, the Editor, was enabled to gather together the information and papers presented and described in this Work,—embracing the MSS. of the learned and devout Francis Lee, (which, singularly enough, were afterwards discovered to be referred to, in the preface of Lee's posthumous "Dissertations," 2 Vols. 8vo. 1752, as being 'in Mr. Law's possession,') as well as those of Mr. Law. Among which latter papers, were one or two of his own bound transcripts of parts of writings which were afterwards ascertained to be by one D. A. Freher; the remainder, (it subsequently appeared,) on the decease of a Mr. George Ward to whom they were entrusted on Mr. Law's decease, by Miss Gibbon and Mrs. Hutcheson, having been scattered in the world; but which, for the most part, by a course of singular providences, have since found their way into the Editor's possession.

Still pursuing his researches through clues obtained as above mentioned, the Editor was enabled to trace out the existence of Freher's MSS., and what is more, to obtain possession of a great proportion of the same, both originals and copies by various hands, as referred to pp. 141, 2, of this Treatise. Also, by a prominent Advertisement in a public Journal, (10 June, 1846,) he obtained a further accession to those inestimable documents, whereby his collection of Freher's writings and symbolic drawings, became complete.—He designates these writings inestimable, as, apart from their offering an illustration of a classic, well-poised mind and judgment in regard to the accomplishments of universal learning, together with the spirit of the christian religion, in its most enlightened form of truth and understanding,—as containing a clear, rational elucidation of the principles of divinity and philosophy of the deep, mysterious writings of Behmen. And of which, indeed, it would require, besides an extraordinary natural genius, and the highest academic ability, (such as were possessed by Freher,) with many other concurrent and favorable circumstances, of grace as well as nature,—the con amore study and labour of the best part of a life abstracted from the world, to produce the equivalent, in such respect. Nor is it at all a fulsome adulation, or enthusiastic, ungrounded representation of the talent and spirit of FREHER, to compare him to a Socrates and Plato, or Pythagoras combined, appearing under the full light of christianity: who yet but stands in the relation, of having been the first to establish out of provided materials, a solid found-esteem.—See "Dr. Byrom's Remains" (Chetham Society,) Part ii. p. 337. What he found in these authors he received, but they could not satisfy his mind, being of a limited partial character, or rather their own conceptions or modifications of individual truths. When he met with Behmen therefore, he found at once the source of universal truth, and of the luminousness which he had so much admired in Malebranche, and others, (as poetised by Lee, p. 253, seq.;)—he found indeed therein all that his large, grasping, capacious mind after wisdom, could possibly desire, and therefore from that time, all other writers were needless to him, nay below his own understanding. Well then might he experience, as he reports himself to have done, on the occasion above referred to, such surprise, and reverence, on his first meeting with that author.

Behmen's writings, being the unpremeditated, simple, unsophisticated effusions of his pen, called forth by the entreaties of friends, are not characterized by that high sentiment of sanctity or holy breathingness, which distinguishes some of the treatises of the refined cultivators of the spiritual life of the mystic schools, either of the Romish or the John Arndt Lutheran churches; but they rather present a piety and devotion of a utilitarian character, still after the pure gospel form, which is to be individually cultivated to the highest holiness and perfection. As witness the (1.) Regeneration tract, (2.) Repentance tract, (3.) Resignation tract of his "Way to Christ,"—suited indeed to every day life of the common world of business. This, it would appear, through the working or development thereof, by the Zinzendorfians, and the English Methodists, (who were already grounded in Law's elementary practical doctrine,) was the form of the christian religion, that was to be rendered popular in the world; and to be the grand instrument of the gospel being carried to, and preached in all the nations of the earth, as proclaimed in the gospel to be done, "for a witness unto all nations," prior to the second coming of the Lord. So that the popular religion of the present time, as the popular science (see pp. 401–23, 3, 72, 46, seq.) is traceable back to the source, or fundamental revelations of Behmen!

dation for future progress in spiritual and divine science; and which it was part of Mr. Law's calling, to complete and perfectionate. Indeed the publications of Germany in professed elucidation of the philosophy of BÖHME, down to those of Franz Baader and Dr. Hamburger, though the results of much serious study, and manifesting great ingenuity and ability in their authors, (the work of *Hamburger being, it is said, the result of the study and labour of all the spare time of his previous life,) are not to be named in comparison with Freher's writings, for true philosophic nobility and independence of character,—for pure scholastic demonstration, and elucidation of the exact sense of Böhme's theosophic revelations,—and, which is most important, for a just apprehension of their special providential nature, and capacity for a radical renovation of the gospel spirit in christendom, and the conversion of the alien enlightened nations to the evangelical faith of christianity. And what science as well as religion has derived from their fundamental revealments of the ground and philosophy of nature, either immediately or remotely, will doubtless be fully evidenced in its due time and place, having been incidentally referred to in a preceding note of this preface. It may suffice for the present, to point at the state of mechanical science as well as religious zeal amongst us, and their activities in the enlightenment and progressing universal amelioration of mankind, as illustrations of what has been already effected through their instrumentality.—Thus as above related, have FREHER's writings been preserved † to posterity, (by the providence of God directing the Editor's minds and efforts, in continuation of the same inspiration and grace afforded to the worthy E. Fisher and T. Mills, for the like purpose, described p. 141 seq.) and by means of the present treatise, as also by notices which the Editor has caused to be inserted in periodicals of the day, (Notes and Queries, 17 May, 28 June, 1856, 10 Sep. 1853, etc.) have they become known to the public of this country and of the Western world.

The next question for consideration by the Editor, was the mode in which to bring the whole subject before the world. This he thought, would be best accomplished by a professed BIOGRAPHY OF LAW—synthetically as it were, exhibiting the gradual formation of his mind from his earliest youth, up to the perfect development of his understanding:—which would necessarily involve a full elucidation of his studies, in their due order, especially those of theology and philosophy, and the reasons why he elected to pursue such and such a path therein, so out of the common order of the academic rule; and would also embrace a kind of history of the science or mind of the period during, and antecedent to which, he lived. Moreover, he, the Editor, after much consideration and comparison, (always regarding the subject under the light of the gospel, whose one end and design should ever be kept prominent in such undertakings,) deeming Mr. Law to be, as to mind and understanding, a classic model of a christian philosopher, he considered the biography of such an individual, if adequately composed, whilst offering edification to all classes of readers, (from the simple tyro in knowledge to the learned academic sage, from the ordinary laic to the most faithful, devoted, illuminated disciple and minister of Jesus Christ,) might be turned into a general direction and example for the education of youth,—in a manner at once to realise the beau-ideal of the exalted philosopher of antiquity, with the pure evangelical christian and divine theosopher of the present age, (as more immediately reflected upon in the “Advertisement” appended to the end of the “Introduction to Theosophy.”)

* This work in German, entitled "The Doctrine of the German Philosopher, Jakob Böhme," 8vo. Munich, 1844, however analytically or critically exact, in its digest and summary of the contents of Böhme's writings, and however rightly judicative in his strictures upon the writers whom the author cites, as having, through stupid ignorance or wilful perverseness, opposed and maligned Böhme's writings, is, it must be acknowledged by the enlightened English student of them, but a very chilling, rationalistic performance; conveying no suitable idea of the lively, simple evangelical spirit, and hearty, warm sentiment, which characterise the original writings throughout. Nor indeed—as manifest from the author's observations in the prefatory discourse, touching the spirit and life of the holy Gichtel, and others of the same illuminated, Christ-like mind and character—does he appear to have possessed any right apprehensions of the divine life in its high regenerate action in the soul and outward conversation of the faithful disciple, or follower of Jesus: according to the experiences thereof possessed, in such abundance by the true church of Christ in this country, as well as abroad. Yet it was one manifest design of Böhme's writings to promote, not only a revival of pure, spiritual, gospel christianity in the world, but also to enable the subjects of it to cultivate the life of grace to its highest degrees of theosophic light and magical power, as was done by this holy man of God, Gichtel. Strange is it, that this author, judicious as he shows himself to be in many particulars, should not have hesitated to judge such divine spirits as Gichtel and others, by his own rationalistic apprehensions of the Holy Spirit's operations in the souls of the truly faithful!

Being himself unversed in the refined arts of rhetoric, and conscious of his utter inability to do justice to such a character and such a work,—one that should constitute a kind of standard model for future ages to contemplate, in regard to the true nature and right proportions of secular and christian knowledge to be sought for by education—however he might be able to act in the character of a consulting architect or surveyor in the erection of the edifice,—he, the Editor, now made inquiries amongst his acquaintance of the church and the world, as to where he might find the suitable form of mind and literary ability for the desired undertaking; but without avail.—It then occurred to him, in such conjuncture, to address an Advertisement to the public for the required artistic talent,—comprising therein a description of the chief general features or characteristics of Mr. Law's literary and devotional genius; for he considered that only such was the suitable character of talent* to accomplish such a work. Hence the ADVERTISEMENT with which the present Treatise commences, and of which it is but the exponent.

* For surely none but a divine sage and accomplished master of learning and rhetoric, endowed moreover with great powers of wit, and who had had great experience of observation in the world, could rightly pourtray, and weave together the sentiments, principles, character and exemplary life of an exalted christian philosopher, into a masterpiece of biographical literature; of one indeed, of whom it is related by a somewhat unwilling or prejudiced witness, that “he lived all he taught and practised all he enjoyed.”—The egregious folly of an individual, having no knowledge or idea of the mystical workings of the regeneration, attempting to draw up a representation for the public, of the spirit of the saints of God, has seldom been more glaringly exhibited in this country, than in the recent publication, entitled “Hours with the Mystics,” 2 vols. 12mo., 1856; wherein the author, with the flippancy and conceptions of a modern penny newspaper novelist, reviews the lives and doctrines of the illuminated children of God of past ages,—similarly indeed, to the manner in which a few years ago, the infidel Michelet, in his popular work of “Priests, Women and Families,” treated the spirit of the holy Francis De Sales, De Chantal, Guion, &c.—Notice may also here be taken of another illustration of the malcomprehension of the more sober of our literary class, touching religious or spiritual topics, which appeared in the “Critic” Journal of March 15, 1856, in the review of the “Introduction to Theosophy” therein inserted; where the writer thus speaks, after confounding theosophy and mysticism together. “(1.) It is an error in supposing that theosophy or mysticism may be popularised:” which is as much as to say, It is an error in supposing that the pure spiritual religion of the gospel is practicable, or attainable by all to whom christianity addresses itself. For mystical religion means nothing else but death unto our fallen, sinful, natural spirit, and a life unto righteousness, wisdom and God. 2. The reviewer writes, that spiritual religion or mysticism “goes from without to that which is within, never from that which is within to that which is without:” whereas the scripture alluding to the life of the regeneration, says, that the root of the tree must be first made good, and then the fruit will be good: also that out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh. 3. The author further writes thus, “in the swarming phantasies of his own being, the mystic has the only domain for which he has ever panted”!! whereas the true enlightened spiritualist or mystic, turns away from and abominates all the “swarming phantasies and imaginations of his own natural spirit” or mind, and seeks and longs after only that which the Spirit of Truth, dwelling in his new born soul, will please to open and reveal within him. Such is a sample of the understanding of even the more sober of our literary critics, to whom the world looks up for the instructions of sound judgment.—But in fact mysticism is a term nowhere existing in the pure oracles of religion, esoteric or exoteric. It is the appellative given by worldly

—This attempt also proved unsuccessful, after some correspondence in connection with its chief subject, wherein it was intimated to the Editor, that the pure classic style of argumentative writing required by the advertiser—rigid in its reasoning, and drawing out its conclusions in regular sequence,—however invested or concealed by ingenuity and good sense, in the simple and graceful habiliments of accomplished rhetoric, (as for instance exhibited in Mr. Law's own writings between the years 1717 and 1733,) was not palatable to the present age of superficial utilitarian knowledge and mechanical philosophy; much less would it be found among individuals professedly educated for religion. And that if any where existing, it would probably be amongst the lawyers, whose system of mental training was more favorable to strict logical thought; but that they by reason of their sophistical mindedness, and consequent inaptitude for the holy contemplations, purity, and simplicity of high christianity, were unfitted for so elevated a religious and philosophical undertaking.

It now occurred to the Editor, notwithstanding the utter incompetency he felt in himself for literary handicraftship, and the necessary absorption of his time and attention by secular engagements, to attempt to draw up a kind of specification of the complex talent, that he deemed needful for the execution of the work in question; accompanying it with a sketch of the contents of the writings of the authors, that should form the more immediate subjects of the memorial, (which draft, when printed, he considered, might form an octavo pamphlet of some eighty or hundred pages;) whereby the readers thereof might be able to judge of their ability in its several particulars for the desired work. And to avoid any delay, or further procrastination over it, whether arising from self distrust or other causes, he also resolved to at once forward to the printer, the matter as noted down from the conceptions he had formed of it in his mind, intending to make what corrections therein might be deemed needful, in the proof sheets; and feeling himself competent to supply (however imperfect as to literary art, yet clearly and distinctly,) the remainder of the matter as it might be required. This resolution was accordingly put into practice, and hence by degrees arose the present work;—which, instead of being comprised, as expected in some four or five sheets, and completed in as many months, has been spread over more than the same number of years, and run out to its present dimensions: being in this respect found unavoidable, in order to a full exposition of the subjects deemed proper to be comprised in the work. So that it, in effect, partakes more of the character of a cyclopædia of evangelical truth and divine philosophy, as established by the experience and wisdom of past ages of christianity, than of a brief general statement of the qualifications of mind, spirit and literary art, needful in the individual whom it seeks to find, to compose a just and adequate biography of Mr. Law.

The Editor may, in conclusion, be excused alluding to the heavy mental oppression and labour, necessarily sustained in the compilation of this work; chiefly single handed, no less than to the great expense incurred over it; in collecting together all the materials of it, including the purchase of books (and heavy incidental expences) from various parts of the nation, as before referred to,—in preparing and arranging the matter for the printer, with the editorial and original notices,—in revising the press, and contending with all the difficulties and exasperations incidental to the due completion of the book,—in its being got up simultaneously with the carrying on of his commercial affairs, and consequently much time and attention having been withminds to their ideas of the christian's life of faith. But theosophy expresses the divine science appertaining to the new spiritual life of Christ in the soul, and is analogous to that system of knowledge in which the education of the natural man is to be conducted.

drawn from the latter to their serious prejudice, to be devoted to the work,—in the inconveniences also thereby occasioned to the domestic claims and requisitions of his family and friends,—and then in the consciousness of his own literary incapacity, yet having before the eye of his mind the sober, judicious, enlightened manner in which the work, though but a preliminary discourse, should be executed, to meet the sentiments and elevate the view of the learned reader and experienced christian;—along with all which, is to be taken into account, the private and expressed regrets of his friends, ecclesiastical and secular, that he should be the subject of such infatuation or monomania, as to devote his time, labour, and money, to sacrifice his business and personal health (which suffered considerably in common with his other exterior interests over the work,) to what appeared to them so unremunerative ■ design, and so out of the ordinary way of evangelical effort and religious zeal in the present age, notwithstanding that in every other particular of his life, (they admitted) it was his rule and practice, to aim at the highest perfection, of excellence and utility:—all these he would observe, in conclusion, constituted oppressions and disheartenings indeed; and nothing would have supported him in the steady prosecution of his design amid such a combination of dejecting circumstances, but the consciousness and firm conviction that the work in which he was employed, was the work of God, of truth, of wisdom, of the gospel, of the amelioration of the world, moral, spiritual, universal, to be evidenced in its due time. Under these impressions then he pursued his labours; and has now arrived at their conclusion so far as concerns the present work; which, notwithstanding its great imperfections, is adequate to the purpose for which it was put together,—as a guide to the right apprehension of the mind and character of William Law, for future artists to work with, in the manner contemplated by it: and which shall remain as a faithful testimony of the editor's sincere desire and humble endeavours to benefit the world in the most ennobling manner, yea to the latest posterity. Might he mention some of the reflections which animated him to proceed in his labours, they were such as these:—

1. You see your object clearly in view, and know your way to attain it: drive at it. If you persevere, something valuable will be effected, though it may not be gratifying to your judgment and taste as to the manner of its performance.

2. If you wait till you can do a thing perfectly, or even according to what you may deem the lowest degree of propriety of execution, you will never do it at all. Do all you can in the circumstances: and be not discouraged, though you cannot compose the work according to the order, style, rules, or classic models of rhetoric in which it should be presented, or as Mr. Law himself would have done it. Only be assured the work is the work of God, and then you may leave the results to him.

3. You feel and know your object to be grand and worthy, yea worthy of the noblest philanthropy; and if your views respecting its merits, are indeed just,* then you may be the instrument of such good to the world, as at

* The Editor has observed elsewhere, that Law, (embracing however in the idea, the knowledge and mind of Freher), may be said to be the Newton of metaphysics, at least potentially if not actually. Touching this point, and the subject of the text above, the Editor avails himself of the present opportunity to insert the following extracts; the applicability of which, will doubtless be appreciated, and turned to account by the individual who shall be called to present the whole subject of this work to the world. They are taken from a review of Brewster's "Life of Newton" in the Critic Journal of July 2nd, 1855. The reader, who is conversant with the contents of this work, will bear in mind what Mr. Law has affirmed touching the origin of the Newtonian principles of philosophy, (see also Lives of Alchemist. Philos. pp. 292—97,) as well as of Sir Isaac's chemic experimenting, in his "Animadversions on Trap," given Introduction to Theos., vol. i. p. 347, in his "Spirit of Love," p. 72, seq., "Way to Divine Knowledge," p. 86, seq., and Letters quoted p. 45, 46, seq. The judicious author of the review, it will be perceived, in the last quoted extract, expresses a hope yet to see raised up amongst us, a 'Newton in mental science.' If such a philosopher is to arise, it can present is inconceivable. The result of your pioneer labours, may be such an opening of the philosophy of truth, spiritual and natural, as that there shall come to be but one religion throughout the world, (indeed it must come to this sooner or later, whether from your labours or others,) one faith, one baptism, one God and Saviour of all, known and acknowledged by all nations. Thus may you become an honoured instrument of removing the barriers that at present shut out the eastern Intellectual nations, Jews and Mahomedans, from the fold of christianity; or, in other words, of inducting those peoples into the gospel faith; and so of hastening the fulfilment of the promise, given and repeated in the Old and the New Testament, viz., that unto Christ shall be given, (after his conquest,) "the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession". And that "the gospel shall be preached to all nations, as a sign, before the end come".—In short, if your understanding and views be correct, and properly carried into operation, there may come to be but one philosophy in the world; and you will have the honor—not of inventing or discovering it, but of appreciating it, of rendering it practicable and making it known;—in other words, of laying down the first sound, beaten, macadam, public highway directly leading to the temple of Truth; the key of which you may be said to have also searched for and found, and furnished to the world.

4. To you also, in such case, will belong the honor of indicating the sublime evangelical application of the modern discovery of "Animal" or "Vital Magnetism," so called, as more immediately referred to, at the end of the present work, and in the "Introduction to Theosophy." &c. &c.—Such were some of the reflections which presented themselves to the mind of the Editor in the prosecution of his labors, in the present Treatise.

As regards the type employed in the work, one of the reasons of its smallness, was, as observed, the original intent to comprise all that the Editor had to say, in some eighty or hundred pages, and there being large extracts to only be by the same means that a Newton arose in physical science, that is by a knowledge of Behmen's principles, and an application of them to the established discoveries of practical science; as referred to in the note of p. 368, 9, also of pp. 3, 405, 420—23. Now, in Freher and Law only, are Behmen's principles of nature, demonstrated, in all needful copiousness. What is wanted then, is the theosophic geometrician, to set forth the principles in the due logical form, and then their elucidation, in the discoveries furnished by the diversified experiments of practical magical science, spiritism, &c.—The extracts in question are these following:—

"His chemical studies (writes the reviewer) he (Sir Isaac) commenced about this time, and we are told, that his mind was impressed with some belief in the doctrines of alchemy, and he certainly pursued his experiments to a late period of his life, with the hope of effecting some valuable transmutations."—But why did not Sir David Brewster allude to what is now patent before the public, of Sir Isaac's obligation to Behmen for the principles of his developments: as also for the source of his here related chymic experimenting? Again the reviewer writes:—

"The violence with which some of his discoveries were assailed and criticised appears extraordinary, but such has been the ordinary fate of new systems and original theories in philosophy." (Again he writes,)

"The more original and the more valuable was the discovery which he brought to light, the more vehement were the denunciations hurled against it, and which served more than anything to mark its importance." (And again,)

"Our author observes, that we must admit the truth of the remark of Voltaire, that though Newton survived the publication of the Principia more than forty years, yet at the time of his death, he had not above twenty followers in England! But so has it ever been with the progress of grand new discoveries of whatever kind." The reviewer goes on to say, "A masterly analytical account of this stupendous performance will be found in these memoirs. The most complete and successful attempt to make the Principia accessible to those who are little skilled in mathematical science, Sir D. B. informs us, has been made by Lord Brougham, in his admirable analysis of that work; which forms the greater part of the second volume of his edition of Paley's Natural Theology."

The above extracts are here inserted to show what the future Editor of the Biography of Law, and the Newton of metaphysics, are to expect from the learned and scientific world, in bringing forth the result of their knowledge in such respect! The following is the concluding extract:—

"However the study of material subjects may have led Sir D. B. to condemn all that does not appertain to gross matter, yet we trust that in the intellectual, as well as in the visible world, in the science of mind as well as that of matter, the discoveries of our philosophers will yet be far extended; and we would fain hope that a Newton in this latter branch may eventually arise among us."

be inserted, it became necessary for that end, to adopt a small size of type. It was however decided to put the original matter more immediately addressed to the candidate, in a larger letter, either bourgeois or brevier, though this could not be conveniently accomplished with regard to the Sketch of Law's Life, inserted in the Note commencing p. 334 and ending p. 628 seq., but the small nonpareil type was also used in that instance.—Another reason was, that the work would not be a finality for the public perusal, but would partake more of the nature of a specification chart or drawing, to be consulted by those who proposed to 'undertake the contract,' or erection of the contemplated edifice. — Another reason was, to let the work consist of but one volume, so as to be convenient for investigation and reference; it being, as just observed, intended only as a prelude to one suited for the public perusal, or to a second emended and purified edition of itself for the like purpose, with the substance of the discursive Notes incorporated in the body of the text, in their proper place,—and in a handsome readable type.

Such has been the origin of the present Work,—and the Editor would simply observe, in conclusion, that in the compilation of it, he has done what he could and the best he could, having the noblest ends in view. Especially keeping before his eye, the one simple aim and design of the gospel, and directing his observations to promote the same end in the mind of all his readers,—as comprised in this simple precept and golden rule, Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, (the fulness of the regeneration, the full birth of the divine nature in the soul,) and all other needful things shall be added unto you. With this explanation, entreating the reader's charitable judgment upon the imperfect execution of the work, the Editor concludes his prefatory remarks, by reproducing, in a continuous, complete form, the sum of the entire book, with additional references for magic and spiritism developments and discoveries up to the present time. Midsummer, 1856.

RECAPITULATION, OR SUMMARY OF THIS ENTIRE WORK.

The following Advertisement appeared some time ago in a public journal, but as the peculiar talent which is required, might not be exactly deducible from the terms of the announcement, it has been deemed fitting to present a more explicit and comprehensive statement in reference to the subject, and hence the present treatise.

WANTED a Gentleman of high Literary Talent, and deep Devotional Spirit, not under forty years of age, who, during his scholastic studies, has been well versed in the casuistry and metaphysics of ancient divinity, and whose style of composition is that of strict logical argumentation, however its severity may be arrayed in the simplicity and graces of rhetoric, to assist in writing an elevated religious and philosophic biography.

The following series of works and tracts, are what have been selected as general models, from a due study of which, according to the observations annexed to each, may be gathered the exact nature of the required talent.

I.—Serious Call to a Holy Life, by W. Law, A.M.—Case of Reason or Natural Religion, fairly and fully stated. 2nd. ed. By W. Law, A.M.

These treatises (with the Author's "Christian Perfection" and his "Three Letters to a Lady inclined toward the Church of Rome") may be received as examples of the style of argumentative writing desirable, and showing the needful modicum of metaphysical knowledge. Also, as exhibiting masterly display of wit, brightness of imagination, penetrating observation of life, classic and felicitous delineation of character, and an easy, flowing, complete handling of the several subjects of discussion.

II.—Earnest and Serious Answer to Trap.—Animadversions on Trap's Reply. Both contained in Vol. i. of "Introduction to Theosophy."

As models for an ingenious, dignified style of address, for elevated sentiments of christian purity and holiness, and for the earnest and serious spirit which must breathe through the work. The qualifications of the former named treatises to be incorporated with the characteristics of the present tracts.

III.—Short Confutation of Warburton's 'Defence of Christianity' in his "Divine Legation." This also in Vol. I. of "Introduction to Theosophy."—An Address to the Clergy. By W. Law, A. M.

The former of these treatises (in which may be said to be embodied the literary and other perfections of the previously named works,) may be taken as a model of the magisterial style and power of philosophic writing desirable. The latter, for the Elias-Baptist spirit of divinely animated zeal, resistless truth, and elevated wisdom, in which the biography from first to last should be composed—penned indeed in such a holy, reverential glow of spirit, as if indited by a seraph; so as to inflame the heart of all its readers with the love of God and all holiness and perfection of life.

The foregoing notices relate chiefly to the literary qualifications of the author: the following series of works express the ground of understanding, or sentiment of mind from which the work should be dictated.

IV.—Treatise of Christian Perfection. By W. Law, A. M.—Jeremy Taylor. Of Holy Living and Holy Dying.—Of the Following of Christ. Vols. i. and ii. Quesnel. Reflections on the New Testament, in 4 Vols., 8vo., 1725.—Letter on the Primitive Christians, appended to Horneck's Happy Asceticism.—Bp. Wilson's Letter to Lady Eliz. Hastings, p. 356, seq.—Fleury. Manners and Behaviour of First Christians. 8vo., London, 1698.—Calmet. Commentary, with the Dissertations and Prefaces, (in French.)

Augustine. Meditations, and Soliloquies, &c., 8vo., 1720. With other works of the ancients, Cyprian, Basil, Ambrose, Greg. Nyssen, Chrysostom, Greg. Naz., Jerome, Bernard, &c., wherein they especially discourse upon the blessedness, and means of attaining to perfect sanctity, purity and holiness, &c.—Taulerus. Les Divines Institutions de, avec sa Vie. Also, his Exercices sur la Vie et la Passion de Jésus Christ, 18mo., 1718.—Also, his Evangelical Poverty, with Life prefixed, in English. London, 1708. And his Sermons in Latin.

Relation de la Mort de Quelques Religieux de la Trappe. 5 vols. 18mo. Paris, 1755.—Tour to Alet, (in Volume Second of Schimmelpennick's Port Royal Memoirs.)—Vie de l'Abbé de Rancé, par Dom Pierre le Nain.—De Rancé. The Sanctity of the Monastic State. 2 vols. 12mo. Dublin, 1830,—regarding therein what is of the essence of Christianity, or of expedient practice to the regeneration; and imbibing its earnest and serious spirit.

To form a right foundation for the high superstructure of a perfect Christian, regenerate, divine life. In the first place, inducing in the mind a profound and piercing conviction of the vanity and emptiness of all worldly things, and of the degraded sinful state of the humanity by nature; and therewith an earnest conversion of the soul to God. Secondly, to arm the mind with a steadfast, immovable purpose, to follow Christ fully, in his process of the regeneration—in the way of his precepts, counsels and example,—the narrow way, the way of the cross, the way of faith; as being the one only true and direct way, from defilement to purity, from sin to holiness, from darkness to light, from death to life. And thirdly, to furnish the soul with principles to walk manfully and surely in that way; that is, in the perfect spirit and power of prayer, of self-denial, of contempt of the world, of divine love, and universal charity; of humility, patience, meekness, long-suffering, obedience, purity, silence and resignation; in heavenly foretastes of the world to come, in absolute trust and dependence upon God, with all that is earthly and temporal—all goods and evils of this present life, under the feet.

In elucidation of the manner, more or less perfect, according to the lights with which they were favoured, in which devoted souls have walked, in the process of the regeneration, or way of faith. And how, according to their peculiar complexions and dispositions, (having first sought and found "the kingdom of God" and his righteousness,) they have been led out to serve their neighbour and the world. But especially, are herein to be studied, the practical arts and instruments of entire sanctification,—even to the utter destruction of self-love and self-will in the spirit of the soul, and the attainment of that purity of heart which alone can see God. In fine, to lead the soul by a natural process, of a self-conscious, experimental growth of regeneration, up to the very vestibule of the temple of Wisdom—the supersensual, intellective, or divine life.

The order of the spiritual regeneration is divided by the mystic doctors, and that very justly, into the purgative, the illuminative, and the unitive states; but, as such must be the actual course of experience of all the truly and fully regenerate, we, in this serial order of study, have made provision for the soul to progress (surely) to that end according to its own natural complexion and constitution, rather than attempted to confine or cramp it to a certain form of growth or advancement. And in support of our views, we refer the reader to the remarks in italics, at the head of the note of p. 166, and to p. 252, seq.

Paris. 1651.

NOTE.—The antiquity of Mystical Theology (writes the Editor of the Theosophical Transactions, in commenting upon the treatise of Asceticks, etc.) is here derived down from Noah; and the instances of Melchisedec, Abimelech, the two Pharaohs, Jethro the Midianite, Rebekah, Balaam, and Job, with his friends, are adduced to prove, that it was anciently believed in all nations, that there were means whereby men and women might come to have some acquaintance and communication with God. The tradition and succession hereof through the Colleges of the Prophets, among the Jews; through the Priestly Colleges of the Eastern Magi, among the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Arabians; and through the Pythagorean and Platonic schools, were it accurately and judiciously done, would be a considerable work; but this is not to be expected within a few sheets. And as for the media which the Gentiles did use, to attain the intimacies and communications of their peculiar Deities, or of the Soul of the world, or of the supreme Demi-urgus and Creator, a particular and distinct explication thereof, would necessarily lead us into a disquisition concerning the ancient Theurgic mysteries.—[The next “Magical” Intersection will afford a clue to the understanding thereof.] What was the spirit of Plotinus and Iamblicus, what also the spirit of Porphyry, cannot thoroughly be understood without a more than ordinary insight into these. The Porphyrian spirit is a very great mystery. But as it is in witchcraft, or in demoniacal obsessions, so also is it here. The evil demons are able to do nothing of themselves: it is Nature that works all, and produces those strange and wonderful operations. They also know how to supply actives to passives, and leave her to bring about what they design; to which the present corrupt state of nature is subservient, and wherewith they fail not to add somewhat of their own malice.

[MAGICAL AND CORRELATIVE STUDIES.—The next following Six Divisions are an accompanying scientific and practical study, of high importance.]

1. Tryon. The Knowledge of a Man's Self; being a Second Part of the Way to Health, etc. 8vo. 1703. Also, The Way to Health, etc. 1697. (All grounded on J. B's. philosophy.) Also, Memoirs of T. Tryon, 18mo. 1705.—The Phalanstery, or Moral Harmony; the Preface, by Lady Chichester, 12mo. London, 1841.

2. Pure Foods. Here to read some judicious treatises on the necessity of pure diets, or a pure fuel for the fire of life, and indeed of an universal cleanness, in order (in common with the spiritual exercises of earnest religion,) to the regeneration, or purification and sublimation of the humanity, according to the true scope of the gospel. Also, to examine some works treating of high Boddhist, and other Oriental, Druidic, etc. religious science, virtue and piety: and likewise, concerning the real purificative rites, and inductive physical and mental training of the ancient vestal pythonesses, sibyls, priestesses, etc., etc.

3. Popular Experimental Transcendentalism, or Animal Magnetism, with its subsequent Inductions. To peruse, in this place, Dr. Haddock's Psychicisms and Somnambulism, 12mo. London. 1851.—Also, Dr. Gregory's Letters on Animal Magnetism, 12mo. London, 1851. With Newnham, on Human Magnetism, 8vo. 1845. Dods's Philosophy of Mesmerism, 1851, (American,) and Philosophy of Electrical Psychology, 12mo. 1852.—Townshend's Facts in Mesmerism, 8vo. 1844.—Night Side of Nature, by Mrs. C. Crowe, 3rd ed. 1852.—Deleuze. Histoire Critique du Magnetisme Animale, 2nd ed. 1819. And Practical Instruction in Animal Magnetism, 8vo. Balliere, 1850.—Zoist.—Dupotet. Introd. to Study of An. Mag. In French.—Reichenbach. Researches in An. Magnetism, 8vo. 1852.—Ennemoser's History of Magic, 2 vols. 12mo. 1854;—with other sober treatises, both German and French, elucidatory of spiritual developments and accidental openings of the Magic philosophy. And along therewith, (N. B.) TO WITNESS SOME REALLY GOOD CASES OF MAGICAL SLEEP OR TRANCE, with LUCID CLAIRVOYANCE.

4. Works on Modern Spiritism. The Spiritual Herald, 8vo., (Monthly,) London, 1856—Yorkshire Spiritual Telegraph, Keighley, 1855-6.—American Spiritism Newspapers, and Periodicals; New York Spiritual Telegraph; New England Spiritualist.—Judge Edmond's Preface to his book: etc.—Ballou's Exposition respecting Modern Spirit Manifestations; with a New [and N.B. MOST ENLIGHTENED] Preface, 16mo. Howell, Liverpool, 1853.—(With works advertised in the American Spiritism Newspapers.)

NOTE.—After having gone through the present division of study, (referring likewise again to the Notes of pp. 522—24, 549, 550, 553, 556, 559, and of 467—9, 464, 449, 495, and to the text of pp. 320, etc.), the student will perceive its scope and object; as opening out to him a glimpse of the whole field of the natural and divine magic, and of the accidental entrances therein made by the astral spirit and by faith, up to the present time; besides enabling him to advocate with superlative force of reason and earnestness of zeal, the necessity of the establishment of Theosophic Colleges, in regard to the perfect triumphs of the Gospel. Which should be, not mere elementary schools of the prophets, nor yet as the ancient philosophical academies: but brilliant evangelical seminaries, worthy of the age, for the rearing or training of children of God, up to the highest perfection of sanctity and wisdom, according to the lights of this work—even to the matured apprehension and exercise of those angelical arts and powers, which are the prerogatives of the regenerate humanity.

The considerations that will ensue upon a review of this particular of study, will also elucidate the original doctrines and mysteries of Christianity, of imposition of hands, (by a regenerate and official medium,) of baptism, of the supper of the Lord, etc.,—yea, even of the supplementary sacraments of the Romish church. Here, may be perused with advantage, Law on the Sacrament.—

Query.—Who or what the stranger that so impressively accosted BOHEMIUS when a youth, (as related in his Life,) and what ensued therefrom? Also, respecting the burnished platter, by the lustre of which reflected upon him, he became entranced with 'double consciousness,' into the central ground of all Nature; he however being manifestly qualified for such a baptism and revelation!—Is not this the secret clue to BOHEMIUS's character, (which we here offer to the judicious future editor of his life,) namely, that he was a pure, simple child of nature, of a highly delicate tincture and complexion of spirit, (manifest indeed by the existing Painting of him, in this country,) and accordingly susceptible to magic or 'magnetic' action? Hence his early vision on the Land's Crown mountain; and also, after being 'baptised' by the supposed Rosicrucian, his centre-life became still more opened, and he more lucid? And now, seeking God and salvation in the true, orthodox, gospel mode, (à la Bramwell.) viz., by total penitence, and earnest, wrestling, unflinching, faith and prayer; and obtaining what he thus sought, even the full liberty and witness of the Spirit,—in this state of clear, but now greatly augmented salvation, being again 'magnetised' by the inward solar power and tincture, in the reflexion from the burnished platter, he became a perfect clairvoyant! That is, he realized the full prerogatives of his then state, as a highly regenerate man, in respect to both the temporal and eternal vision, and other senses; whence he wrote down his apprehensions of Nature, as he was able to conceive and express the same, by the astral reason, and defective Babylonish language.—This original view or discovery of the character of BOHEMIUS, which has presented itself to us, is, we consider, the true key to his peculiar genius, as displayed in his writings; in which respect, it may also serve as a qualifying note to our other descriptions of him, in these pages. But the true subjects of a right Theosophic College and its training——Would that some noble-minded Philanthropist might consecrate a hundred thousand pounds to the foundation of such a scheme in the name of the holy, holy, holy, eternal SOPHIAH, and to his own high honour!——might, we consider, be made to far exceed J. B.; as enjoying equal clearness of spiritual sense, but, as being thoroughly grounded in erudition and modern science, so therefore enabled to elucidate technically the 'mystery' and virtues of things, and hence of greater practical utility to the Church and the world.

5. La Philosophie Divine, appliquée aux Lumières Naturelle, Magique, Astrale, Surnaturelle, Celeste, et Divine; ou aux Immuables Vérités que Dieu a révélées de Lui-même et de ses Œuvres, dans le Triple Miroir analogique, de l'Univers, de l'Homme, et de la Révélation Ecrite. 3 vols. 8vo. 1793. To peruse the judicious Notes of the first Volume, and a few of the second Volume, containing the author's experience and judgment of the astral magic, somnambule, Swedenborgian and similar delusionism.

[The reflective reader may in this place, further conceive respecting the glorious manifestations that might be expected in, and by the duly trained, (see again, New Preface to Ballou's book,) divinely illumined subjects of a right Theosophic College.]

6. The Hermetic Mystery, and Alchemy. For references to treatises thereupon, see A Suggestive Inquiry into the Hermetic Mystery, 8vo. London, 1850.—Query, Prof. Molitor, of Frankfort, on the Cabala? End of MAGICAL INTERSECTION.]

A judicious work.—General Delusion of Christians touching God's Revealing Himself. 1713, 1838; supposed to be written by the Author himself of the History of Montanism, 8vo. 1708, which also especially peruse; and this latter to have been a strained work, drawn up to oblige friends.—*Lead. Theosophical Transactions, by the Philadelphian Society, for the Advancement of Piety and Divine Philosophy, pp. 294, 4to., 1697. The close perusal of this Work, is highly recommended, especially pp. 248—268, though indeed, it is full of spiritual gems, the editor being the celebrated Francis Lee, author of Kettlewell's Life, &c., &c. Lee's posthumous Dissertations, 2 vols. 8vo., 1752.

* At the close of this valuable analysis or Abstract, Freher observes, speaking of the latter portion of the work under his review:—

"That which now followeth of another Author, entitled, ELUCIDATION OF THE DOCTRINE OF THIS TREATISE, OF THE REVEREND P. J. EVANG., contains nothing else but a particular enumeration of the chiefest parts thereof, which are these four,—(1.) Of the Soul's gathering her into herself, (2.) Of the Soul's introversion. (3.) Of her penetrating herself, and (4.) Of her drawing near and exalting herself into God. Each of which, this author sheweth, is conformable to many others

Of the Essential Will of God, wherein is treated of the Supernatural Life.—Also, Eckart's Discourses, Tauler's Sermons, and Rusbrochius, Of the Perfection of the Children of God, all in German and Latin. And Jean de la Croix's sublime experimental writings, the Ascent of Mount Carmel, &c.—And again, Böhme's Supersensual Life, p. 43, seq.; Divine Contemplation; and Abstract of the Mysterium Magnum.

The object of this sixth division of study in the series, has already been sufficiently intimated, viz., to afford to the so advanced student, a knowledge of all the science and art, which has hitherto been revealed and discovered, in regard to the high sublimation of the human life; and of the true and lawful mode whereby to advance steadily to the very central throne of the divine revelation, even to become a holy artist, a lord, a prince over nature, to the praise and glory of God. For the humanity, as before observed, being now fully redeemed, man is therefore capable of a transcendently exalted spiritual renovation and illumination: (and if of a spiritual why not of an outward and physical—even of an Enochian life on earth?) And therefore it ought to be the aim of the enlightened Christian, to press on to this high regenerate perfection, or *glorified resurrection state of the inner man; to prove the arts of paradisical horticulture, first in himself, with his own life and intellect, and then to raise up others to the same faith, and inward glory. Which attainment according to its degree, it is, that restores to man his original prerogatives of dominion over all temporal creatures, and to open the latent powers of God, and scientz of the Divine Wisdom in everything. Our Lord spake to his wondering disciples to this purport,—Ye seem surprised at what I now effect, deeming it a miracle: Verily far greater works than these shall ye (my faithful, theosophic disciples,) do, after my ascension. St. Paul also, in the same scope of apprehension, observes, Henceforth know we no believer after the flesh . . . (but rather as members of a God of glory in heaven.) And again, But ye are come, &c. Hebrews xii. 22—24. And what St. John declares, respecting the paradisical glories of the New Jerusalem, i. e. of that Christianity, in which we are all set and growing up, if of the regeneration, needs not to be particularized in this place. [Philip*. iii. 11—16.]

[VII. INTERSCRIPT.—The following List is also here superadded for the sake of such readers as are not well versed in the theological and religious science peculiar to this nation. The knowledge whereof (experiential as well as sciential,) is supposed to have preceded the study of the fourth division of the above series. Viz:—

Sermons and the other solid theological writings of Bp. P. Browne, Cudworth, Barrow, Bull, Pearson, Hall, South, Ken, Hickes, Nelson, Horneck, Author of Whole Duty of Man, Tillotson, Hammond, Dean Sherlock, Young, etc.—Book of Common Prayer.—Nelson's Feasts and Fasts, etc.—Erskine on Faith, 1822: on Election, 1837.

Arndt's True Christianity, translated from the German, by A. W. Boehm, and Boehm's Memoirs, tr. by Jacobi, 1735; with Sermons and Writings of other evangelical Protestant Divines of Germany, as A. H. Francke, J. L. Zimmermann, Freylinghausen, etc. The latter's Abstract of the Doctrine of the Christian Religion.

And lastly, the Spiritual Discourses and other Writings of Divines of the complexional apprehensions of Goodwin, Ambrose, Owen, Preston, Baxter, Mason, Scougal, Bunyan, Reynolds, etc. Watts, Hervey, M. Browne, Scott, Cecil.—(Griffith's Spiritual Life, 1836, E. Mantering's pieces, 1840-50,) etc.

As illustrative of the English Theology in its two chief forms of developement,— of the Mystical Writers, whose words he bringeth forth, viz. St. Bernh., August., Gregor., Rusbroch., Anon. de Spiritu et Anima, P. Florent. ab Hanswyck, Justus Origelianus, Harph., Gerson. Hugo a S. Victore, Thom. de Kempis, St. Bonaventura, Richard a St. Victore, Benjam. major, Lib. Fro-mundus, Eckartus, Joh. Taulerus, B. Teresa, Seraph. Firmanus, Anon. de inter. Domo. One or other place also of J. Evang. he illustrates, for fear his words might be mistaken. Concerning especially the breathing and the ceasing thereof, he observes, that the Apostle Paul says something to that purpose. Gal. ii.,—'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me;' that Job also says such a thing chap. xxxiv. 14.,—'If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath,' (which words sound more favourably for him in the German translation.) And that the same may be found also in the words of B. Teresa, saying. 'This is such a death of the soul, that myself know not, whether or no she can breathe. I have to this hour much thought upon it, and it seems to me that she can not, or at least she herself knoweth not that she can.'

of solid and impressive rational exposition, and of animated application to the affections and imagination. But the utilitarian christianity of these last ages, to which we have before alluded, as the genius of Methodism, with its modern inspirations, may be understood from the next following division.

Brainerd*, original edition.—[Finney's Lectures on Revivals of Religion, (a valuable hand-book for earnest souls.) Query. In illustration of the simple, experimental Bible christianity, and aggressive evangelical action of these latter days, though according to its best examples and discoveries. Which, as we have observed, requires to be impregnated with the recondite science, practice and experience of the antecedent divisions of this series, in order to be raised to its true perfection, and highest efficiency; that is, as the full manhood development of the Divine life, wisdom and power in the Church on earth: to which all astral and diabolical nature must be subjective.—Whilst, at the same time, we would not fail to recommend to the true graduating magus, who may desire to be an accomplished artist, after the mind and graceful model of the Lord Jesus, free from all harsh idiosyncrasies,—to pass through, both associatedly and officially, and spiritually, the experiences of this present methodist section.—End of INTERSCRIPT.]

VIII.—The Old and New Testaments of the Lord, JESUS CHRIST,—the pillar and standard form of evangelical truth. This the popular, and devotional light in which the Holy Scriptures are to be regarded.—The other, or theosophic consideration of them, (and which affords a proof of their Divine Inspiration, though loose and partial in detail, and disseveredly composed,) is—as brief chronicles of the divine origin or creation, and of the degeneration or bestial-diabolic transmutation of the human nature in Adam, the natural head thereof; and then of the entire process of its redemption, retransmutation, and deification, by the “mystery of Christ” in the person of JESUS, as the second and divine head of the same.—Hence it is, the working of these two principles of life—of the rational-animal spirit of fallen man, and the holy, sophian Spirit of Christ,—forms the mystical ground of every narrative, however historically true, of the Scriptures; and the line and virtue of the Covenant, is the golden thread that runs through and illumines the whole. And hence they conclude with presenting to view the person of the Second Adam and Conquering Prince, all perfected, glorified, divine: and with thereupon inviting and admonishing all men to “follow him in the regeneration.”—That is, to cultivate the seed or spirit of grace, of moral holiness or love, of heaven or the heavenly humanity, or virgin wisdom of God, of the ‘divine nature,’ or—himself within them, into a powerful and all-predominant life; even to its full maturity or manhood-development, as thus visible in himself, the ‘perfect,’ ‘justified,’ ‘glorified’ Son of Man, and heavenly Virgin form of substantial light and Love, in whom the earthly nature or spirit, is swallowed up, ‘hid in God.’ And which transmutation is therefore possible to be effected in us—as he is the spiritual, heavenly parent of the humanity, and (as the divine nature,) the element of our souls, and possessed of omnipotent power over us,—if we will but conform to the laws of the divine nature, and co-operate with his horticultural, regenerative, unceasing action in us. Those laws and requirements, are revealed to us in the gospel, in the precepts and counsels of Christ, and in the subsequent elucidations and exhortations of his apostles, having been all fulfilled in his own example and process on earth; and which consist in the continual crucifixion of our fallen natural, or diabolical spirit, and renunciation of our animal, earthly will and wisdom: in other words, in a daily dying to all self, spiritual and natural, and in a turning of the faith and hope, and earnest prayer, or hungering desires of the soul, constantly and absolutely to God—to the love of God, the humility, meekness and patience of the divine light,—for deliverance from ‘self,’ and growth in grace, or salvation. Which spiritual diligence, labour and watchfulness, and passive subjectiveness on our part, is to be persevered in, until the ‘new birth’ be fully brought forth in us, by our heavenly regenerator and magnetist; until the last remains of ‘self’ in the will, be finally immersed in the power of God, and our life be thereupon transmuted into a spirit of love: which, and which only, is the christian salvation!—The sum and end of the whole, is then this: that man (the spirit of his soul being clothed with the regenerate, heavenly humanity, corporeity, or ‘flesh and blood of Christ,’) may be able in this world, to again magically re-enter paradise, and ‘eat of the tree of life’ in the midst thereof, (as witnessed in the experience of Mrs. Pratt, related pp. 588—90 seq.) and so walk and act on the earth in divine power and understanding;^{*} and that on his mortal decease, he may be found a qualified subject and participant of those nameless, ravishing manifestations of wisdom, power, might, majesty and love, which shall eternally spring up, and break-forth in fresh and fresh wonders, as displays of the riches and glories of the God-head, in the kingdom of heaven, but especially in the souls of its redeemed inhabitants:—or in a word, that he may be a partaker of that same divine glory, wherewith JESUS, the King of Glory, and Lord of All—the Alpha and Omega—here exhibiteth himself crowned!—Thus are brought to a close, the words of the prophecy of this book, or the ‘counsel of God’ concerning man, in his creation, his fall, and his redemption in Christ! And, such the theosophic scope, spiritual unity, and divine certainty of the INSPIRED VOLUME; the contents of which, may well be termed the blessed gospel—or good tidings of great joy to all people! And how does the whole form a glorious demonstration of the love of God: or, that GOD, as our God—as in Christ Jesus—is mere LOVE, the POWER of LOVE!—Which power is in very deed, the universal basis of all things; and that quickening element, wherein, as before observed, our self-constrained, iron-hardened, insensible, ungrateful, unbelieving hearts and souls, have, or ought to have, their momentary life and being! Ephes. iii. 8-19. 2 Cor. ii. 6, 7, etc.

^{*} According to the prerogatives of man’s first creation, and therefore of his full regeneration; ‘when that which is outward is (virtually) as that which is inward,’ and there be no longer the division, and degradation of the created Virgin image of God into “male and female,” like the beast creation, (Gen. i. 25—27;) but the garment of shame and ignominy—the ferine and sexual nature—having been virtually put off by regeneration, the man and the woman are again one in the Lord, who is both the father and spouse, or “bride,” of the Virgin generation of the humanity. All which is the right Christian, Enochian faith and life on earth.

For Adam in the first creation, (when all was completed and perfect.) was in this world as a supreme being over it, having no share of its life and nature, that is, no sense or feeling of good and evil in distinction, from it; just as an individual in the magnetic sleep or trance, has no sensibility of pain or pleasure, by the animal body. He was in the world as a heavenly artist, medium and magist, that had power and skill to open the wonders of God in every power of outward nature.—An angel, we read, used at a certain time to come down into a pool at Jerusalem: the water, magnetised by the angel, gave forth its virtues; but the angel felt no impressions of weight or cold from the water. This is an image of Adam’s first freedom from, and power over all outward nature. He could, wherever he went, do as this angel did—make every element and elementary thing, discover all the riches, virtues and powers of God, that were couched in it, without feeling any impressions of any kind from it. This was to have been the work both of Adam and his offspring, to make all the creation shew forth the glory of God; to spread paradise over all the earth, (which was then only existing in a certain place upon it, called the garden of Eden,) till the time came, that all the good in this world was to be called back to its first state, and all the evil in every part left to be possessed by the devil and his angels. But since man fell from this state into an animal life and nature, his work is changed, and he must now labour with sweat to till the cursed earth, both for himself and the beasts upon it. And must also toil in great anguish of mind, under the load of the cross, to regain his first heavenly birth of life, in the strait and narrow way thereto, strewn with briars and thorns, which has been opened for him by Jesus Christ; the end of which, when gained, will, as intimated above, re-invest him with his first heavenly prerogatives.

CONCLUSION. Such, then, are the series of works which are deemed calculated to afford to the reader, a correct general apprehension of the profound and universal theological science of the chief subject of our proposed Biography. As likewise a conception of his far-seeing ideal realizations of the effects that should flow from his own Elias-restoring, Baptist-purifying ministration:—not only in the general diffusion of a simple, practical gospel christianity among the unsophisticate of the earth, as we behold in progress in our day; but also with regard to the induction of the intellectual unbelievers of all nations into the christian faith. Which is yet to be effected, as the final result of the revelation of the “mystery of Christ,”—of Deity, Nature, and all things—in BOHEMIUS, and of the refinement of all natural knowledge, philosophy and theology, the arts and sciences, mechanical and magical, which has ensued, and shall hereafter ensue, as a consequence or developement of it.

As a close, the following EXTRACT is offered to the reader's consideration:—

It is for want of considering the spirit of holiness, as a new nature, as a seed of God, a plant of paradise in the soul, and therefore as something that is to be nursed and cherished, to be cultivated and raised to perfection, by care and contrivance, by art and method, and a diligent use of the best means and most expedient instruments,—it is for want of considering it in this light, that so many people are so little benefited by it, and live and die strangers to that interior renovation, that holy, spiritual “oneness” with the glorified nature of the Lord Jesus, (John xvii. 21—24,) which they might have attained unto, had they but intended it.

For though the spirit of devotion is the gift of God, and not attainable by any mere power of our own,—yet it is mostly given, and never withheld from those who rightly seek, and prepare themselves for the reception of it.

And it is amazing to see how eagerly men of science and business employ their parts, their sagacity, time, study, application, and exercise—how all helps are called to their assistance, when anything is intended and desired in worldly matters; and how dull, infatuate, and unimproved they are—how little they use their parts, sagacity, and abilities, to quicken and cultivate the incorruptible seed of grace, or the Light and Spirit of God—which is the source of every divine blessing of holiness, power and wisdom, and therewith of every needful earthly good—implanted and latent in the ground of the soul.

Thus much by way of specification of the talent which is deemed indispensable for the proper representation of the genius and character of MR. LAW, (as contemplated by this Work;) or rather of the means and instruments whereby, the artist, who is qualified by nature and education for such a task, (being of pure methodist origin and understanding in religion,) may attain to the special ability, science and experience needful for its adequate performance. In a word, to present the portraiture of a man, which, whether as regards the subject of it, or the manner of its execution, may serve as a classic standard, or practical model of divine wisdom, solid learning and rhetorical art, for all future generations of the British people, and of mankind.—Communications on the subject, or for liberty to make extracts from this Work, to be addressed to the “Editor of Law's Memorial,” and left at 24, Ludgate-street, London. Midsummer, 1856.

ERRATA AND CORRIGENDA.

(N.B. These should be immediately effected through the Work.)

THE corrections here specified, are chiefly those which concern the sense of the passages, and matters of fact related, whether the facts themselves, or the opinions expressed. The typographical, orthographical, and other errors overlooked by the printer, are, for the most part, left for the reader himself to amend with the pen, as he may discover them.

jected, and denied by his followers. Let it be so. Still he can have no solid pretensions to a clairvoyancy deeper than the astral phantasia; for as there is a phantasy in man, (awakened, or occasioned by his fall out of the light of God into the dark rationive "serpent" intellect of this world,) so is there a phantasy in the astral nature, otherwise it could never have come into man, and which phantasy is the dark light of the first principle, and of the devil, impregnated with the good powers of the astral light,—he was not then, we say, a divine illuminatus, like Böhme,—born into the "kingdom of God's dear Son," a member of the "church of the first born enrolled in heaven," an associate of the "spirits of the just made perfect," who assuredly have nothing in common with the motley crew of rogues and strumpet-spirits, the Baron affirms, he met with in that world which was the scene of all his magical peregrinations.—Pages 158—60. Query, if these letters are by Law? as the copy of the said "Dialogues" recently met with by the writer, is dated 1788; yet the style and tone appear undeniably, to be those of LAW.—[ANNOTATION.] In the "Cyclopædia of Biography" recently published by Richard Griffin & Co., Glasgow, (1854,) the articles relating to mystical theology, are all treated according to the false, phantasiaic, heretical doctrines of Swedenborg, that is, Swedenborg's theological tenets are therein made the standard of divine truth, and of course the ancient "fundamental truths" and "essential principles" of christianity are "falses," being opposed to the Baron's "trues." Under the head of Böhme therein the Editor thus writes:—"As an apostle of religion * * * we must look for the real proceeds of his influence, in such movements as those of the Moravian Brethren and primitive Methodists; add to which, the most intelligent of the later mystics, followers of Law and Behmen, accepted the revelations of Swedenborg!" It is to the bold assertion here placed in italics, that attention is now called, and the writer would observe that, in penning it, the author, however writing consistently with the phantasiaic light of his great master, was stating that which was directly untrue; and that so far from any intelligent mystic of the school of Böhme and Law, acquainted with the nature and design of their writings, accepting Swedenborg's affirmations,—they, whatever they might have thought of these writings, before becoming acquainted with those authors, thenceforth abandoned all serious regard for them; as containing nothing new or advanced in pure religious philosophy, but on the contrary much that was diametrically opposed to the essential truth and vital interests of the true gospel religion; and in effect, (as elsewhere observed,) "of no more use to the church of Christ or the Gospel religion, than a fifth wheel to a wagon."—One first-rate proof of the spirit and institute of the "New Church" of Swedenborg, being a new dispensation from that "Lord," who said, Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature,—were, the vast number of holy self-denying Missionaries, whom the said "new church," has sent forth to preach the gospel to the heathen, especially the poor savages of the South Sea Islands, "to turn them from darkness to light, and the power of Satan to God," from savagism to refined civilism and happiness!—Page 161. What'er the Eastern Magi sought
Or Orpheus sung, or Hermes taught,
What'er Confucius would inspire,
Or Zoroaster's mystic fire;
The symbols that Pythagoras drew,
The wisdom God-like Plato knew;
What Socrates debating proved,
Or Epictetus lived and loved;
The sacred fire of saint and sage,
Through ev'ry clime, in every age,
In Behmen's wondrous page we view,

Discovered and revealed anew.—
"Aurora" dawned the coming day,
Succeeding books meridian light display.
Ten thousand depths his works explore,
Ten thousand truths unknown before.
Through all his works profound, we trace,
The abyss of nature, God, and grace.—
The seals are broke, the mystery's past,
And all is now reveal'd, at last;
The trumpet sounds, the Spirit's given,
And Behmen is the voice from heaven.

as described in the annexed Tract, "Guide to Biography of Law."

APPENDIX to ERRATA.—BEHMEN'S WRITINGS.

A SUMMARY Account of the Works of JACOB BÖHME, wherein is Revealed the Mystery of the Supernatural DEITY and VIRGIN WISDOM, and of the Birth and ground of NATURE; the Creation of Angels, and the Fall of One Hierarchy thereof; the Creation of this Gross, Mutable World, or Temporary Principle of Nature; and the Ground and Development, or the entire Mystery of MAN, (as ADAM and CHRIST, composing every individual,) in his Creation, in the process of his Fall, and in the process of his Restoration, or Cure. Also, with respect to his Individual process of Regeneration, and his ultimate Deification.

[The Emblem at the head of Böhme's Works, is an Angel passing through the air, blowing a Trumpet, signifying the Demonstration of the Gospel Religion, by a Revelation of universal and self-evident Truth; out of which is sounding forth these words,—To all Christians, Jews, Turks, and Heathens, to All the Nations of the earth, This Trumpet sounds for the Last Time.]

1. Aurora. The Dawning of the Eternal Day, or the Infancy of Creation.—An unfinished piece, of the childhood of his illumination. [Wherein he describes as best he could—as a stammering, timid, unlettered child, the opening panorama of the divine wisdom, set before his internal vision. He narrates the circumstances and ground of the angelical creation; the fall of the chief of the three hierarchies thereof, and the direful effects which ensued thereupon in eternal nature, (by their unbalancing of its seven equipoised powers or forces;) and the thereupon creation of this material, temporal system, (from the condensed, compacted, dark, fiery, fluidic, spoiled materiality and galvanic powers of the spiritual, angelical world, good as well as bad,) as the first act of the curative process of the thus originated evil in nature. The narrative was broken off, by violence, before the author came to the creation of Man.—This piece should not be perused till the reader is pretty conversant with J. B.'s other works; as herein his descriptions of the seven spirits, by reason of his at the time non-apprehension of the origin of the fourth property, the fire, differ from, and are relatively inferior to, those contained in the subsequent treatises, where that point had become recognised in his understanding. Which fourth property is the opening of the life of the supernatural liberty, abyssal nothing, or free, magic Eye,—in Nature; that is, of the pure Deity in nature.] A.D. 1612.

2. De Tribus Principiis cum Appendice. Of the Three Principles or Worlds of Nature, with Appendix.—Describing the Eternal Birth of Nature, in its Seven Properties, and Two Co-eternal Principles, also this Third Principle, and the Creation of All Things. Lastly of MAN, as the Crown and Comprehension, or Developed Central Divine Idea of all, and therefore a true Lord and Prince over All. His Fall, with all the circumstances of it; and his Redemption, by virtue of the 'Mystery' and Process of Christ. With a concurrent evangelical application of the truths developed. A.D. 1618. —[Herein Man's creation is declared, from which it appears, that Man is the noblest being in the universe of God. That he is the primal centre, the immediate abode, habitation, organism, and personal medium of Deity, who, as the triune, incomprehensible, universal power, or Spirit of life—a mere goodness, light, and truth, has no form nor visibility but in Man—understand, the VIRGIN Man, as created, and as restored and glorified in Christ. (Oh, MAN! SEEK AND KNOW THYSELF.)—In this work Man, (who was created as the instrument by which God would heal the disordered, corrupted body of Nature, and restore all to its primitive perfection,) is circumstantially described, in his original creation, his fall, and his redemption, by the "mystery of Christ;" who, as a second Adam, or Man, came to heal and restore the first ruined Adam, and to effect all that, which the Deity would have had accomplished by him.—A knowledge of theosophic science, as of the experimental philosophy of animal magnetism, mediumship, spiritism, alchemy, etc., is, however, essential for a due apprehension of these deep mysteries of nature and magic.]

3. De Triplici Vita Hominis. Of the Threefold Life of Man, according to the Three Principles. That is, as the generated Idea, or Supernatural Image of the abyssal tri-une Will-spirit of the Deity—the VIRGIN SOPHIA, incarnated in, and clothed with the Eternal and Temporal Nature.—And from the relations of Man's present state of grace and nature, setting forth his practical duties and obligations, in order to the regeneration, and attainment of the prerogatives of his glorious redemption in Christ. A.D. 1619.

4. Psychologia Vera cum Supplemento. Forty Questions concerning the Soul of Man, Answered, with Supplement.—In the Answer to the First Question, is presented a Symbolical Diagram of the Wonder-EYE of the Divine Wisdom, the supernatural Abyss or Habitation of the Tri-une Deity; with the Central Generation therein, (by the Father-Will of the Trinity of Deity,) of Eternal Nature, with its Two co-eternal Principles of black Darkness and lustrous Light, and this external Nature, with its Two co-eternal Principle understood therein. A.D. 1620. [Understand these two eternal principles of positive and negative, the nay and the yea of the speaking tri-une Word of Life, the SUPREME ONE—that they together constitute Nature, or eternal Nature: not the dark world alone, which is termed the ground or root of nature, but both principles together, in perfect, indissoluble union.—By the fall of angels, (through the perverse, obstinate, proud, self-willed, ignorant, rebellious misuse of their free, uncontrollable will; being unduly elevated by the sudden perception of their own wonderful beauty, power and glory,)—who had their life and being, or qualification in this eternal, or divine nature,—it came to be discovered or experienced, how the majestic visibility or "glory of God," or "kingdom of heaven," has this darkness as its basis or ground, and how the life of this dark principle in itself, is a life of the most horrible wrathfulness, anguish, falsehood, and misery. And hence arose the Scripture and theological term, God's wrath, or the wrath of God—signifying, not that the will-spirit of the Deity is wrathful, or capable of wrath, for he is the one only good, pure, and lovely, the unchangeable love; but that in bringing forth his ineffable, intellectual, will-spirit into a perceptible essence or nature, a something sensible to creatures, by desire,—this desire, as such, must be the very opposite, or contrary spirit to his own Being of gentleness, peace, delight, holiness, happiness; and by overcoming or possessing which centre his real goodness, holiness, light and truth become manifested in a triumphing, glorious life. This twofold life is then Nature, eternal Nature, the “divine nature,” in which all immortal beings are created to live, and enjoy the divine happiness:—though alas! how many will frustrate the divine intention, and render ineffectual the divine benevolence toward them in the incarnation, sufferings and death of Christ; and so fall into the dark, fiery centre, self-contractive generation, or root of Nature—the eternal dying of the divine liberty, or life of desire, wrath, and all misery.]

5. De Incarnatione Verbi, Partes tres.—Part First. Of the Incarnation of Jesus Christ the Son of God. That is, Concerning the Virgin Mary, what she was from the Original, and what kind of Mother she came to be in the *Blessing and Conception of her Son, Jesus Christ; and how the Eternal Word is become Man.—Part Second. Of the Suffering, Dying, Death, Resurrection, Ascension, and Glorification of Christ, as the first and second Adam. And why we must all follow him in the same Process, and Way thus opened for us, back to the Throne of God.—Part Third. Of the Tree of the Christian Faith; shewing the whole Christian Doctrine of Faith and Practice. Wholly brought forth out of the Supernatural Centre, through the Three Principles. A.D. 1620.

6. Sex Puncta Theosophica. Containing a Description of the Life of the Supernatural Wisdom and Abyss of Deity, and of that of the Three Principles of Nature, also of each Principle as in itself. Shewing how Men should seek, find, and know the Ground of Nature.—7. Sex Puncta Mystica. Clearing up certain deep Points involved and not resolved in the foregoing Dissertations.—8. Mysterium Pansophicum. A further diversified deep Consideration concerning the Heavenly and Earthly Mystery of Nature, and of the full working and fruition of the life of the Latter. A.D. 1620.

9. De Signatura Rerum. Showing the Sense, Virtue, and Qualification of the Shapes and Forms of the Creation. And what the Beginning, Ruin, and Cure of Everything is, Spiritual and Physical. [The Ground of Physiognomy, Phrenology, Homœopathy, &c. &c.—The Language of Nature, or Speech of the Divine Wisdom, apprehensible of her regenerate, clairvoyant children. A book of the sublimest wisdom and angelical melody; and key to the regeneration of the medical art.] A.D. 1621.

Christosophia. The Way to Christ, and Divine Wisdom. Pars prima.—10. De Regeneratione. Of the Grounds and Reasons of Regeneration, being an Introduction to the Gospel Religion.—11. De Pœnitentia vera. A Practical Entrance upon the Way of the Regeneration, or New Birth.—12. De Æquanimitate. Of True Resignation, and Advancement in the Regenerate Life. Or, of continual Dying to Self, and demersing the Will and Desire wholly into the Meekness, Humility, and Love of the Supernatural, Divine Element.—13. De Tentatione, et 4 Complicationibus. Of the Ground and Nature of Temptation; whence it arises, and how to Overcome in the Conflict. [The first three Tracts composed the only book the author published in print: all the rest of his writings being left by him in the hands of his friends, in MS.] A.D. 1622.

14. Libri Apologetici duo, contra Balth. Tilken. Two Apologies.—The first, in Defence and Elucidation of the Aurora. The second, concerning Predestination; and of the Person of Christ, and the Virgin Mary, as treated of in the before-named Book of the Incarnation. A.D. 1621, 23.—15. Anti Stiefelius, libri duo. (1.) Considerations of E. S.’s book, concerning the Threefold State of Man, and the New Birth; also of the Last Zion, or New Jerusalem, &c. (2.) Concerning the Errors of the Sects of E. S. and Ezech. Meths relating to Christian Perfection. A.D. 1621, 22.—16. Apologia contra G. Richter, cum libello Apologetico ad Senatum Gœrlicensem. The Author’s Defence of his printed Book of The Way to Christ, and his Aurora, against the Libellous Censures of the Primate, G. R. A.D. 1624.

17. De Electione Gratiae, cum Appendice de Pœnitentia. Being a Fundamental Demonstration of the Scripture Doctrine of Election, or Predestination. With Appendix, shewing the Way to attain to the clear Vision and Knowledge of Divine Mysteries. A.D. 1623. [Grounded in the deepest Supernatural, Abyssal Centre—the instinct, constitution, or scientz of the Fountain Word and Creator of all things; and thence traced into, and through Nature. And showing the inevitableness of that which is evil and that which is good.]

18. Mysterium Magnum: an Exposition of the First Book of Moses, called Genesis. In Three Parts. Wherein is treated of the Revelation of the Divine Word, through the Three Principles of Nature; and of the Original of the World and the Creation. Also, wherein the Kingdom of Nature, and the Kingdom of Grace, are explained. A.D. 1623. [Demonstrating the literal

* I beg leave respectfully to observe, that it had been well if the recent Synod, held at Rome, had condescended to look into this author’s demonstration, and revelation of the “mystery of Christ,” previously to issuing forth to the world the false Dogma (!) it recently propounded, of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Her high Blessedness and inward reconstitution, whereby she became interiory, as highly graduated as Adam when he was breathed forth out of the womb of Deity, and nothing could be higher, (so qualifying her to be the mother of the throne-prince of eternity, the “man Christ Jesus,”—God and man), took place only on her acceptance of the divine salutation, through the angel Gabriel.—The loan of a copy of this Book of the Incarnation was offered to the Synod, at the time of its sittings, by the Writer, through the agency of the See of Rome in this county, but was not accepted, or the offer overlooked, though acknowledged. January, 1856.

truth of the descriptions of the book of Genesis. But to apprehend such truth a magic understanding is needful; one versed in theosophic science, and also in the modern experimentalism of animal magnetism, clairvoyance, spiritism, mediumship, &c. That is, the incidents narrated being penned from a central voyance—of the two eternal principles and of time, therefore only the like regenerated, divine understanding can duly apprehend the true and full sense thereof.]

Christosophia. Pars secunda.—19. Theosophia. Of Divine Contemplation: how to attain to Divine Clairvoyance and Understanding, or Wisdom. (Unfinished.)—20. De Vita Mentali. Of the Supersensual, Superrationive or Divine Intellectual Life. [See F. Lee's enlargement of this piece in Vol. IV., large 4to., English ed. of J. B.'s Works; which is the most preferable.]—21. Colloquium Viatorum. A Dialogue between a Regenerate Soul, and one in the Way or Process, and Seeking the full birth of Divine Wisdom.—22. Epitome de Mystero Magno. A Theosophic Summary of the Grounds and Process of the Regeneration.—23. Appendix. Suspiria Viatorum. The Holy Prayer Book (containing Prayers of the highest magnetical power, and virtue.) Left unfinished. A.D. 1624.

24. De Testamento Christi. Of Baptism and the Supper. How they are to be understood, both according to the Old and New Testaments. Set forth from the true Theosophical Ground, through the Three Principles of the Divine Manifestation. A.D. 1624.

25. Quæstiones Theosophicæ. Being a Consideration of the Divine Revelation. That is, of God, Nature, and Creation, Heaven, Hell, and this World, together with all Creatures. Whence all things in Nature have their original, for what, and why, they are created. Especially of MAN, or Adam and Christ. Set forth in 177 Questions, with Answers to Thirteen of them. (Unfinished.)—26. Tabula Principiorum. A Table or Consideration of the Deity, in Unity, Trinity, and Wisdom, and as manifested through the Three Principles of Nature; with the Explanation thereof. This Table accompanies the Author's Epistle 'of the True and False Light' of understanding, dated 11 Nov. 1623.—27. Tabulæ Principiorum. Three Tables of the Divine Manifestation. Shewing how God is to be considered in his Supernatural Abyss, and as Manifested in and by Nature, with its Two Principles and Seven Properties, and further by this World. And then concerning MAN as an Image or Epitome of All Worlds, in his Creation, his Fall, and his Redemption in Christ. Being a Key to the whole of the Author's Revelations.—28. Clavis. Or an Explanation of some Principal Points and Expressions in the Author's Writings. [In the German edition, there is an additional Clavis, which has not yet been rendered into English.] A.D. 1624.

29. Epistolæ Theosophicæ. Being a Collection of the Author's Letters, wrote during the last Six Years of his Life, wherein he composed all his Theosophical Treatises, except the Aurora. [These Epistles to be perused in the first place, as an introduction to his writings.]

In order to enter upon a right study of these writings, the reader is advised to previously go through the treatises of Mr. Law, contained in the Vols. I., II. and III. of the "Introduction to Theosophy," named page xix supra, and in the order therein given. Then, having obtained a conception of the entire scope and unity of Böhme's Philosophy, (commencing with the supernatural ground, out of which, or rather in the centre of which free, clear-seeing Eye, or vision—as a point—Nature eternally is generated, by the astrigent motion, attraction, or self-desire of the Divine Triune Will, or Word of life, therein, and universally possessing the same,)—he will be well prepared to pursue his object, according to the special directions for that end given by Mr. Law to an academic friend, at the end of his "Way to Divine Knowledge." Freher's Writings will be found to be a sequential study to the whole, and are as follows.

FREHER'S WRITINGS.

AN OUTLINE OF THE QUALIFICATIONS, ETC.

FOR THE

OF THE LATE

REV. WILLIAM LAW, A.M.

SECTION I.

The following Advertisement appeared some time ago in a public journal, but as the peculiar talent which is required might not be exactly deducible from the terms of that announcement, it has been deemed fitting to present a more explicit and comprehensive statement in reference to the subject, and hence the present treatise.

The nature and extent of the employment is also but partially described in the advertisement, as, in addition to the proposed biography, there would probably be the revision, with notes, of the works of three or more eminent divines and philosophers; to which the biography is partly intended as an introduction, as well as other devotional literary occupation.

It will, of course, be indispensable that the party therein sought for, should already possess such a groundwork of disposition, devotional habits, and sound metaphysical, classical, mathematical, and other corresponding learning, as should enable him, by a little exercise in the accommodation of his style and discipline of thought, to exhibit, according to his own genius, and the nature of the subject, the peculiar specified qualifications of the models which are herein presented for his guidance.

(ADVERTISEMENT.)

WANTED, a GENTLEMAN of LITERARY TALENT, ASSIDUITY, and PIETY (not under forty years of age), who, during his scholastic training, has been well exercised in the casuistry and metaphysics of ancient divinity; and whose style of writing is that of strict argumentation, however its mathematical severity may be arrayed in the simplicity and graces of rhetoric, if some experience in ascetic devotional authorship the better, to assist to COLLECT, READ FOR, and WRITE an ELEVATED PHILOSOPHIC and RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY. Address

The following are the works and tracts which, in regard to style of writing and devotional spirit, have been selected as general models; from a due study of which, according to the observations annexed to each, as also of the supplementary works (see following section), and the remarks accompanying them; as well as from various other observations interspersed throughout the present treatise, may be gathered the nature of the required talent.

- I.—A SERIOUS CALL to a DEVOUT and HOLY LIFE, (By W. Law, M.A.)
- II.—The CASE of REASON or NATURAL RELIGION, (By Do.)

As models for the style of strict argumentation, and showing the needful modicum of metaphysical knowledge. The former work to be especially remarked for its masterly display of wit and wisdom, and as exhibiting great vigour of imagination, penetrating observation of human life, felicitous delineation of character, and an easy, flowing, complete handling of each of its several subjects. The latter work may be considered as a good illustration of the power of close, forcible reasoning, required in the editor, to do justice to the several subjects to be treated of in the work.

III.—AN EARNEST and SERIOUS ANSWER to TRAP, (By W. Law, A.M.)

IV.—Some ANIMADVERSIONS on TRAP'S REPLY, (Do.)

As models for an easy, dignified style of address; for elevated sentiments of christian purity and holiness; and for the earnest and serious spirit which must breathe through the work. The qualifications of the two former treatises are to be incorporated with the characteristics of the present tracts.

V.—A SHORT but SUFFICIENT CONFUTATION of WARBURTON'S DIVINE LEGATION of MOSES, (By W. Law, A.M.)

VI.—The ADDRESS to the CLERGY, (Do.)

The former treatise (in which may be said to be embodied the literary and other perfections of the previously-named works), may be taken as a model of the magisterial style and power of philosophic writing required, presenting a condensed, though perfect, declaration of all the essential points of the subjects in question; a full and open exhibition of all the relative truths, from their deepest ground, in every needful variety of light; and then a masterly refutation of the elaborate fictions, plausible errors, and ignorant conceptions of the learned antagonist;—at the same time with equal dexterity of talent, and irresistible power of conviction, not failing to establish in their place, lucid demonstrations of the right understanding of the grossly misapprehended truths of revelation and philosophy.

The "Address to the Clergy" may be taken in connection with the "Confutation," and more particularly as a kind of model of the Elias-Baptist spirit of divinely-animated zeal, resistless truth, and elevated wisdom, in which the biography is to be written; inasmuch as the subject of it is to be exhibited as one of the forerunners, or extraordinary messengers to come from God to proclaim the approach of the great day,—his original and espoused writings, his whole character and form of life, when shown in their true point of view (here to be done), affording undeniable evidence to such as have "eyes to see," of his undoubted office and commission, again "to prepare the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight." For though working no more outward miracles than did the Baptist, his works and his espoused writings came forth, and stand in such a power of divine distinction from all others of these last ages, as may be justly said, from their effects, to answer in the spirit to that which was formerly done in the flesh, when, "the blind saw, the deaf heard, the lame walked, and to the poor the gospel was preached."

The object of the biography will, therefore, be not simply to set forth the memorial of the individual's private life,—and that in a glowing, reverential, spirit, by way of holy edification to the christian, the scholar, the philosopher, and the gentleman,—but to represent him in the truth of his mystic character as the *Elias of God's last dispensation to the world (as observed

* I am very willing to admit that Elias will come, according to the sense of the prophet Malachi; but he will not come with observation, no more than he did in the person of John the Baptist. He will not bear the name of Elias, nor tell us he is the man that went to heaven in a fiery chariot, and is now come down again to give us warning of the last fire. But some divine person may appear before the second coming of our Saviour, as there did before his first coming; and by giving a new light and life to the Christian doctrine may dissipate the mists and errors, and abolish all those little controversies among good men, and the divisions that spring from them; enlarging their spirits by greater discoveries, and uniting them all in bonds of unity and charity, and in the common study of truth and perfection. Such an Elias the Prophet seems to point out: and may he speedily come to be the great peacemaker and preparer of the ways of the Lord."—BURNET: Theory of the Earth.

above), to prepare the way of the Lord, for the re-establishment and universal diffusion of pure Gospel Christianity. Which will be shown to be effected, first, by his earlier writings, wherein is laid the solid ground-work for a revival of practical evangelical truth, and promulgation of it throughout Christendom and among the unsophisticated portion of mankind; and then in reference to the conversion of Jews, Turks, Heathens, and unbelievers of all nations, by opening out, in his latter works, in a popular manner, the great "mystery of God" as revealed in the writings of JACOB BEHMEN.

In regard to the former consideration, the editor will trace the results of his writings on the various religious establishments and sects of the present day, especially in the evangelical action and reaction of Methodism, shewing the true sources of the distinguishing peculiarities of that system, as to discipline, doctrine, and devotional means and expediences; and therewith the bearing and operation of those principles in the religious or moral regeneration of Great Britain, her commercial and political aggrandisement, and the progressing amelioration of the world.

In the latter respect, will be considered the great system of eternal truth (of which this individual may be especially termed the High Priest), contained in the works of BEHMEN; which, unfolding from its deepest centre the being of God through all His revelations in nature, thereby lifts the veil from the mysteries of religion, displays the grounds and reasons of all the doctrines of the christian faith, divests theology of the perplexing garb in which she has ever been disguised by the partial imperfect theories of popular divinity, or the rational erudition of the schoolmen, and so challenges the faith of the reader, and, at the same time, his fervent devotion and willing obedience to the precepts of the gospel.*

But before proceeding to a further enunciation of the needful qualifications for the editorship of the proposed biography, it may not be out of place at once to present a general view of the contents of the series of works comprising the revelation in question, forming the ground of the individual's last-mentioned relation to the world; whereby the reader, who may have been unable to procure the works, or been wanting in time, or (what is more) in direction how to peruse them, may have his curiosity gratified, and form an opinion as to how far they appear to justify the great things that have been stated concerning them. And for the information of such as desire to become can-dates, and qualify themselves for the accomplishment of the task hereby sought to be fulfilled, (for a profound theosophic knowledge is essential to the biographer, as will hereafter be seen,) we shall also indicate the mode in which the works are to be studied, in order to a speedy apprehension of their drift and principles, as well as give a list of several other works and writings, an acquaintance with which ought to precede or accompany the knowledge of the former.

* Among other interesting matters, it is proposed to be shown how, from such source, science has derived her profoundest truths, Newton himself having, really though not avowedly, "ploughed with Behmen's heifer," in bringing forth his great discoveries; for Sir Isaac did but reduce to a mathematical form the central principles of nature, revealed in Behmen, and, by the aid of experiments and observations bequeathed by antecedent philosophers, was at last enabled to bring to the birth the true system of the universe, leaving such points of physical phenomena as he could not clearly apprehend, in the nature of queries. The same observations will generally apply to most of the philosophical schemes and discoveries of more recent date; among the minor ones, for instance, to the science of physiognomy introduced by Lavater, and perfected as phrenology by Drs. Gall and Spurzheim; also to that which is sound of the philosophy of Berkeley, to the delicate and well grounded, though difficult science of homoeopathy of Hahnemann, who studied the principles of J. B. (as more particularly described in his Signatura Rerum), and experimented therewith upon himself and his family during the space of twenty years, previous to his public profession at Paris. All these individuals were students of Behmen, and many others of the savans of Germany and England, both dead and living. Among other products flowing from that acquaintance, may be noticed the ingenious deductions of the orthodox portions of Swedenborg's theosophical writings; though it is affirmed by the detractors of the celebrated Idealist, as well as by himself, that he never read Behmen; but such an assertion is incompatible to any one acquainted with their respective writings, as much as it is to any one who has read the original works of Swedenborg in English. Indeed, it would be far from a difficult task to take up the works of Swedenborg's writings, and read them off-hand in Behmen's phraseology, as he is constantly translating each into English at the same time tracing back others of his more rational thoughts to their source, in the principles of Behmen. As to the so-called original theories of the present day, regarding the first stages of this temporal system, the ground and relations of the "physical forces," and "convertible affections of matter," etc., such questions may be left to the biography, in treating of the influence of Behmen's writings upon the several branches of practical science, as evidenced in their modern developments and theories.

It may not, also, be inopportune to premonish the candidate,—who is supposed to be a right-earnest christian, and in communion with some spiritual church,—that it will be highly advantageous to him to have passed through a general study of the following experimental religious books, and of the holy scriptures, as well as of the early practical treatises of the subject of the present biography, previous to entering upon the consideration of the works in question: which, to pursue the thread of observation, are here mentioned in detail, though they will be found hereafter inserted amongst numerous other similar treatises, together with every information as to the points to be regarded in the study of them; viz.—Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Dying; Law's Christian Perfection, and Three Letters to a Lady; The Whole Duty of Man's Works; Thomas à Kempis, 3 vols. by Stanhope, Hickes, and Nelson; Thaulerus's Evangelical Poverty, with his Life; Life of the Baroness de Chantal; The Life of Xavier; Ignatius Loyala's Institutions; Devotional Tracts from the French; Bernière's Interior Christian; The Life of the Marquis de Renty; The Life of Armelle Nicolas; The Life of Lady Guyon, with her Tract on Prayer; The Life of Gregory Lopez; Benet of Canfield's Rule of Perfection, in Three Parts; Molinos's Spiritual Guide, the French edition; with the manifestation of the same "one faith," "one spirit," in the 8vo. Memoir of Bramwell; Life of Longden; Life of Hester Ann Rogers; Wesley's Sermons, and Hymn Book; Finney on Revivals, &c. If the reader should truly possess himself of the spirit of these books, he will be well prepared for the recondite contemplations of truth in the works now about to be described.

As regards the means which are ordinarily used by the christian church for the conversion of the sophisticated portion of mankind, whether Heathens or Christians, it must, surely, be apparent to every unbiassed judgment, as it is to every one acquainted with the philosophy of truth, that attempts in that direction have hitherto failed,* and must, according to the nature of things, fail, on the present system, there being no affinity between the remedy and

* The Journal of Henry Martyn is a sufficient proof that nothing but the revelation of "the mystery" will ever meet the necessities of the intelligent among the eastern, or indeed any other nations. The reader must have remarked how often, in his (H. M.'s) disputations and attempts to make converts, he was put to a just nonplus; whereas, had he been able to meet the demands of his hearers, by showing the ground of revelation and all the Christian mysteries,—how nature is the handmaid of God, his success had been as signal as his disappointment. The fountains of learning and religion must be purified before the streams and branches can renew the face of the earth.

The following extract from the "Oriental Spectator," of 1845, may also serve as a further illustration on this point.—"Mr. W., an American missionary, related to us a conversation he had with Lord Ellenborough, when he passed through Allahabad. Lord E.: You have chosen the worst place in the world for pursuing your missionary labours.—Missionary: Why so, my Lord?—Lord E.: Because the Hindoos and Mahomedans are so nearly balanced in numbers, that neither party can afford to lose ground, and give up any of their strength.—The missionaries, in reply, alluded to the labours of the missionaries at Benares, where by far the greater portion are Hindoos, and yet not much success has attended their labours.—Lord E.: Benares is far worse for mission work than Allahabad. Lord Ellenborough continued: What are your plans of labour?—Missionary: We preach in towns and villages,—we circulate the Scriptures,—we are engaged in translating,—we have a printing press, and are educating in two boarding-schools, forty-five boys and girls.—Lord E.: Very good: and what has been done in regard to the translation of the Scriptures?—Missionary: The whole Bible has been translated into the Persian and the Hindoos, and part of it into Urdu or Hindostanee.—Lord E.: In what way do you expect the Bible to be of use to the Hindoos?—Missionary: Those who read it will be convinced of its superior moral excellence, when compared with the Shasters of the Hindoos. And then we rely upon the promised aid of God's Holy Spirit, to change and soften their hearts.—Lord E.: Have you made any converts?—Missionary: We have some twenty.—Lord E.: What sort of people are they?—Missionary: Mostly the disease. For the disease, in the present case, is rational unbelief; to which nothing can afford satisfaction but self-abandonment, which is out of the question,—or strict, self-evident demonstration and experience. Therefore, unless such a ground could be discovered as to show how the God of nature is the God of grace, and that from self-evident principles, the way of the Lord as revealed in the gospel must ever remain a mystery to a large portion of heathen and intelligent minds.

Now, by the revelation opened by the Spirit of God, in the understanding of the author of the works in question, and contained therein,—which truths, penned from a two-fold Enochian vision of eternity and time, the Divine Providence raised up the learned and devout subject of our proposed biography, to demonstrate in a clear manner to the world,—by this wonderful revelation, that seven sealed book, or great volume of nature and grace, hitherto locked from all eternity, is, according to the epoch of time, and the nature of things, become opened; and thereby such a ground discovered, as takes away all barriers to the evangelization of unbelievers, of what character soever. So that nothing remains in order to reduce all nations, whether Jews, Turks, Heathens, or rational unbelievers, to the obedience of faith, but to make known gospel truth in connection with these works, as the remedy, and last remedy of the grace and goodness of God to man: to which end translations of the works should be made into all languages, prefaced with the necessary directions and accompaniments, in order to their easy apprehension. Then might evangelical labourers and devoted missionaries go forth among the learned heathen, without let or fear of non-success: then with the gospel in one hand, and this mystery in the other, enabling them to immediately appeal to the very forms and properties of every leaf, and tree, and spire of grass around them, as so many illustrations of christian truth, they may proclaim with all the energy of the heavenly hosts, at the birth of Christ, the “good tidings” of salvation, of the advent of the reign of God in the soul, to be immediately opened to faith. So shall this gospel be really and rationally preached (as St. Paul preached it to the learned heathen gentiles,) in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come.

And that this revelation, or unfolding of the treasury of God’s counsels, is the last that divine wisdom will impart, that it betokens the approach of the great day, and the close of time, would appear plain and manifest (like all other great truths) from the nature of the thing. For what can the opening of the seventh seal be, [declared by the works in question, which as observed, it is proposed to disseminate through all nations, as a standing miracle, and their last trumpet,] but the throwing open by God of the everlasting doors of the kingdom of grace and nature; whereby all people and kindred and tongues, may see with their own eyes, the completing development of the tree of good and evil of the human life, with its several fruits.

And when only could it fully manifest the essential wonders of itself (OR SPEAKING OF THE ETERNAL WORD IN TIME), but as every flower and youths educated in our schools, and a few adults!”.....Lord E. saw the children of Mrs. L.’s orphan girl’s school, and remarked, in his off-hand way, “I hope you will convert enough of young Hindoos to become husbands for these girls.”

The writer has heard it affirmed by some who, it was thought, knew the truth of the matter, that in a certain celebrated locality of the East, each member of the church, on an average, costs the Missionary Society in England, five pounds annually.

Considerable premiums are occasionally offered, ~~to candidates~~ for Essays, as to the most efficient mode of converting the Eastern nations to Christianity; but with what results? In the present pamphlet is offered a solution of the question, and that solution is one which was made use of, though but verbally, in preaching and teaching from house to house, by the great Apostle of the Gentiles; viz., the declaration of the “great mystery of God, and the Father, and of Christ,” sufficiently done at that time and for such hearers, without an absolute demonstration from the ground, tracing the birth of things consecutively from thence; but for our day it has pleased the wisdom of God to afford a more abundant and gracious boon, and that in writing, viz., the full manifestation of the ground and philosophy of all things.

note. Pages 3, 4, 5, 6, being sent off uncorrected in their rough original form, to the Printer, will be reprinted.

“Behold the fig tree and all the trees; when they now shoot forth ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand; so likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass,—what things but the blossoming of the Divine revelation, when translated Enoch [who was the father of Methuselah, who was the father of Lamech, who was the father of Noah.] appears again in spirit and power, making known, from his inturned exturned vision, the similitude of the Holy Trinity in the shapes, forms, and figures of the creation; shewing the FORMED WORD in all visible things, and revealing all mysteries within and without,—“then know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.”

The following is ^{a drafts} ~~the course~~ ^{preparatory} of ~~philosophy~~ study recommended to the candidate, in order to a proper appreciation of the works about to be described. The order here set down may likewise be observed :

We now come to THE WORKS themselves, the espoused writings of the subject of the proposed biography. The numerals affixed to each indicate the order in which they originally stand.

☞ The foundation of all solid progress in Divine wisdom lying in the renewal of the soul in the image of God, the writer has put together the following Treatises, which he has designated THE GRAMMAR OF WISDOM, or ELEMENTS OF THEOSOPHY, in Three Parts; the instructions and practical exercises of which ought to be made the daily pursuit of all who would enter philosophy at the right door. A particular description of its contents is here inserted for the guidance of such as desire to understand the works in question, in the way and manner in which they are intended to be received and fathomed by the world. The FIRST PART of the Grammar, though not belonging to the works in question, is nevertheless inserted in regard to the unity of the Treatise.

GRAMMAR OF WISDOM.—The FIRST PART, [or, "THE LAW."]—This Part consists of the first thirteen and last chapters of the "Serious Call." The student should study herewith L.'s "Christian Perfection" to the end of chapter xii.; then chapters xix. to xxiii. of the "Serious Call," and then the remaining chapters xiii. and xiv. of the "Christian Perfection."

THE SECOND PART, [or "THE GOSPEL"] is composed of the following Tracts of Behmen's "Way to Christ," rendered uniform in literary character with the preceding part.

(a.)—Tract Of Regeneration. This is to be considered as a compendium, or Introduction to Gospel Christianity, showing the nature of the Fall, and the necessity, nature, and effects of Regeneration.

Theoretic

(b).—[HERE COMMENCES THE PRACTISE.] The tract Of True Repentance:* Or, Of Conviction of Sin, of True Repentance, or the “striving” “wrestling” Exercises of Living Faith, and of the direct Witness of the Spirit, or Birth of God in the Soul.

(c).—The Tract "Of The Four Complexions." This treats of Temptation, showing whence it arises, whether from our own natural constitution, or Satanic agency, or outward providences, or the perversity of our neighbour; with directions how to overcome in all trials. It might be briefly described as "The Philosophy of Temptation, or the Warfare in Awakened Souls, between the World, the Flesh, and the Devil, and the Seed of the Woman."

(d.)—The Tract, "On True Resignation," with treats of the Spiritual Doctrine of Self-Denial, or of Daily Dying to Self; until all the properties of the old Adam weaken and decay, and the New Man be raised up in his stead. In other words, of "Incipient Sanctification," by the unvarying practise in regard to God, of Love, and in regard to self and the action of external things, of perfect Patience, Meekness, Humility, and Resignation to God: (which is accomplished by turning inwardly to THE SPIRIT of these virtues now born in the soul (in the process of repentance and regeneration,) and dwelling therein as the promised "Comforter," to replace the bodily presence and assistance of Christ, as a Saviour from all evils, and an ALL SUFFICIENT.)†

(e).—The Tract "Of The Supersensual Life," as paraphrased. This treats of the further process of Christian perfection or manifestation of the Divine nature in the soul, and Of Intellectual Illumination.—And here, let all seekers after true knowledge observe, commences the study of divine wisdom. "We preach wisdom among them that are perfect," says St. Paul; not to unconverted men; they have no senses for it. And that such is the true and natural order of procedure is apparent at a moment's consideration. "For," as St. Paul again observes, "what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him;" so likewise of the "Spirit of God." And then he goes on to declare, "We know the wonderful mysteries of God by the Spirit of God, which is born within us." As it must be with every other man.

Now, by the quickening action of the spiritual instructions and exercises of the preceding portions of this "Grammar," the incorruptible seed of Grace, or the Divine nature within us, is brought to life, (upon the death of our natural serpentine spirit and properties,) is enabled to unfold its latent powers, and to evolve "with a divine elasticity" into light and liberty. Whereupon the eyes of its spiritual senses or understanding being opened, it learns to recognise the forms and sounds and verities of its native element, the world of Truth, either in its own spirit, or as virtually symbolised in the signatures of outward nature, or couched in the letter of Scripture, or in these writings.—Here then, in the practical progress through the "Grammar of Wisdom," even to the experience of the tract under consideration, lies the key to true philosophy; and here it is especially observed, should the candidate and all begin, who would become proficient in the theosophic school.—From what is stated, it will also be apparent that, should complaints be made of the difficulty of understanding the Works about to be described, the fault can only lie with the plaintiffs themselves, who have not entered philosophy by the right door, (by which, indeed, the author himself obtained his high knowledge,) or have not exercised that patience which the nature of things demands for the apprehension of truth. For as no one can obtain the productions of the terrestrial world but by duly waiting for their development and maturity, so likewise no creaturely intellect can apprehend the vegetations of the intellectual universe or world of the divine wisdom, but so far as he is born again, or he has got eyes to see, as he dwells in the light, and as he patiently abides for their birth and revelation (in his own microcosm) according to the unchangeable process of the divine manifestation. To proceed.

(f).—The Tract "Of the Way from Darkness to True Illumination." This is a Practical Illustration of the preceding tracts, in the notation of the several Experiences of a soul passing through the whole process from sin to holiness or christian perfection, even to its admission into the light of the divine wisdom and infantile apprehension of the philosophy of truth.

THE THIRD PART, FOR "AN ENTRANCE UPON THE SCIENCE OF WISDOM."—For such as having practically passed through the preceding course, feel a divine incentive to pursue the study of divine and natural wisdom. The first tract of this third part of the "Grammar of Wisdom," is J. B.'s brief treatise "Of Divine Vision or Contemplation," and the other consists of his "CLAVIS."—Thus much concerning the "GRAMMAR OF WISDOM."—

3.—For Christ says, without me ye can do nothing; and He is the light of the world, and the life of man.

4.—Now if any one would search the divine ground, that is the divine revelation, he must first consider with himself, for what end he desires to know such things; whether he desires to PRACTICE that which he might obtain, and bestow it PURELY to the glory of God and the welfare of his neighbour; and whether he desires to die to earthliness and his own will, and to live in that which he seeks and desires, and to be one spirit with it.

5.—If he has not a purpose, that if God should reveal himself and his mysteries to him, he would be one spirit and have one will with him, and wholly resign and yield himself up to him, that God's Spirit might do what he pleases with him and by him, and that God might be his knowledge, will, and deed, he is not yet fit for such knowledge and understanding.

6.—For there are many that seek mysteries and hidden knowledge, merely that they might be respected and highly-esteemed by the world, and for their own gain and profit; but they attain not this ground where the Spirit searcheth all things, as it is written, even the deep things of God.

7.—It must be a totally resigned will, in which God himself searches and works, and which continually pierces into God, in yielding and resigned humility, seeking nothing but his eternal native country, and to do his neighbour service with it, and then it may be attained: and he must begin with effectual repentance and amendment, and with prayer, that his understanding might be opened from within: for then the inward will bring itself into the outward.

8.—But when he reads such writings and yet cannot understand them, he must not presently throw them away, and think it is impossible to understand them; no, but he must turn his mind to God, beseeching him for grace and understanding, and read again, and then he shall see more and more in them, TILL AT LENGTH HE IS DRAWN BY THE POWER OF GOD INTO THE VERY DEPTH ITSELF, and so comes in to the supernatural and SUPERSENSUAL GROUND, viz., into the Eternal Unity of God, (N.B.) where he shall hear unspeakable and effectual words of God, which shall bring him back and outward again, by the divine effluence, to the very grossest and meanest matter of the earth, and then back and inwards to God again; then the Spirit of God searches all things with him, and by him, and so he is rightly taught and driven by God.

9.—But since the lovers of them desire a CLAVIS, or Key of my writings, I am ready and willing to pleasure them in it, and will set down a short description of the ground of those unusual words, some of which are taken from nature and sense, and some are the words of uncommon masters, which I have tried according to sense, and found them good and fit.

10.—Reason will stumble when it sees heathenish terms and words used in the explanation of natural things, supposing we should use none but scripture phrase (or words borrowed from the Bible); but such words will not always apply and square themselves to the fundamental explanation of the properties of nature, neither can a man express the ground with them. Also the wise Heathens and Jews have hid the deep ground of nature under such words, as having well understood that the knowledge of nature is not for every one, but it belongs to those only, whom God by nature has chosen for it, and WHO SEEK IT IN THE RIGHT WAY.

11.—But none need be offended at it: for when God reveals his mysteries to any man, he then also brings him into a mind and capacity how to express them as God knows to be most necessary and profitable in every age, for the setting the confused tongues and opinions upon the true ground again. Men must not think that it comes by chance, and is done by human reason.

12.—The revelations of divine things are opened by the inward ground of the spiritual world, and brought into visible forms, just as the Creator will manifest them.

13.—I will now write but a short description of the divine manifestation, yet as much as I can comprise in brief; and explain the unusual words for the better understanding of our books, and set down here the sum of those writings, or a model or epitome of them, FOR THE CONSIDERATION OR HELP OF BEGINNERS: the further explanation of it is to be found in the other books.

THE PREFACE is as follows (previous to the perusal of which, however, the reader is recommended to peruse the Preface to the book of "The Three Principles," which may be considered as a General Preface to all the Author's writings):—

1.—When we consider the visible world, with its essence, and the life of the creatures, then we find therein the likeness of the invisible spiritual world, which is hidden in the visible world, as the soul in the body, and see thereby that the hidden God is nigh unto all, and through all, and yet wholly hidden to the visible essence.

2.—We have an example hereof in the mind of man, which is an invisible fire, that is inclined to light and darkness, viz., to joy and sorrow, and yet in itself is none of these, but only a cause thereto, an invisible, incomprehensible fire-source, and yet as to its own essence is included in nothing, but only in the will of life.

3.—The body cannot comprehend the mind, but the mind comprehends the body, and brings it to love or dislike. This likewise is to be understood of the word and power of God, which is hidden to the visible sensible elements, and yet dwells through and in the elements, and works through the sensible life and essence, as the mind in the body.

4.—For the visible sensible things are an essence of the invisible: from the invisible and incomprehensible the visible and comprehensible has proceeded. The visible essence is come to be from the expression or spiration of the invisible power. The invisible spiritual word of divine power works with and through the visible essence, as the soul with and through the body.

5.—The inward spiritual soul of man was breathed into the visible image by the inspeaking, or inspiration of the invisible word of the divine power (for an understanding to the created image) wherein man's science or knowledge of the invisible and visible essence consists.

6.—Thus man has now received ability from the invisible word of God to the re-expression, that he again expresses the hidden word of the divine science into formation and separation, in manner and form of the temporal creatures, and forms this spiritual word according to animals and vegetables; whereby the invisible wisdom of God is portrayed and modelised into several distinct forms. As we plainly see, that the understanding of man expresses all powers in their property, and gives names unto all things, according to each thing's property; by which the hidden wisdom is known, and understood in its power, and the hidden God is made manifest with the visible things, for the delight and play of the divine power; so that the invisible might play with the visible, and therein introduce itself into the light and sense of itself.

7.—As the mind doth introduce itself with the body, and by the body into senses and thoughts, whereby it works and acts sensibly to itself; so also in the visible world works through the visible and with the visible world. We are not in any wise to conceit that a man cannot search out what the hidden divine world is, and what its operation and essence, for on the visible essence of the creation we see a figure of the internal spiritual operation of the powerful word.

8.—And we ought not to think otherwise of God, but that he is the most internal ground of all essences; and yet so, as that he cannot be comprehended of any thing by the own peculiar power of the thing. But as the sun introduces itself with its light and power into the sensible living things, and works with (or in) all things, and introduces itself also into an essence, the same likewise is to be understood concerning the divine word with the life of the creatures.

9.—Seeing then this visible world is the expressed formed word, according to God's love and anger; viz., according to the grand mystery of the eternal spiritual nature, which spiritual world is hidden in the visible; and yet the human soul is a spark out of the eternal speaking word of the divine science and power, and the body an ens of the stars and elements; and also as to the internal ground an ens of heaven, viz. of the hidden world; therefore he has might and ability to speak of the grand mystery, whence all essences originally arise.

10.—Since then the great mysteries, the beginning and original of all things, befall us by divine grace; that we are able (as through the ground of the soul) to understand the same in real knowledge with the inspired word of the divine science; we will write down its ground (so far as it is permitted to us) in this book, for a memorial to ourself, and for the exercise of divine knowledge to the reader.

11.—And I. We will signify and declare what the centre and ground of all essences is.

II. What the divine manifestation, through the speaking of the word of God, is.

III. How evil and good have their original from one only ground, viz. light and darkness, life and death, joy and sorrow, and how it is in its ground; also whereunto every essence and source is profitable and necessary.

IV. How all things have their ground from the grand mystery, viz. from the spiration of the Eternal One.

V. How the Eternal One introduces itself into sensation, perception, and separation, to the science of itself and the play of the divine power.

VI. How man may attain to the true knowledge of God, and to the knowledge of the eternal and temporal nature.

VII. Also how man may come unto the real contemplation of the being of all Beings.

VIII. Also of the creation of the world and of all creatures.

IX. And then of the original, fall, and restoration of man; what he is according to the first Adamic man in the kingdom of nature: and what he is in the new regeneration in the kingdom of grace, and how the new birth comes to pass.

X. Also what the Old and New Testament are each in its understanding.

12.—And we will enlarge this explanation through all the chapters of the first book of Moses; and point out how the Old Testament is a figure of the New, what is to be understood by the deeds of the holy patriarchs; wherefore the Spirit of God gave them to be set down in Moses; and at what the figures of these written histories look and intend, and how the Spirit of God in his children before the time of Christ alluded with them in the figure concerning the kingdom of Christ: whereby then God has always represented this mercy-seat (or throne of Grace) Christ, by whom he would blot out his anger and manifest his grace.

13.—And we shall show how the whole time of this world is portrayed and modelised, as in a watch-work, how afterwards it should go in time, and what the inward spiritual world, and also the outward material world is; also what the inward spiritual man, and then the external man of the essence of this world is; how time and eternity are in one another, and how a man may understand all this.

14.—Now if it should so happen, that when these our writings are read, the reader should not presently apprehend and understand the same (seeing this ground, which yet has its full foundation and perfect agreement, as well with the scripture, as through the light of nature, has for a long time been very dark, and yet by divine grace is given to plain simplicity) let him not despise and reject the same, according to the course and custom of the wicked world: but look upon the ground of practise which is therein intimated, and give himself up thereunto, and pray to God for light and understanding; and at last he will rightly understand our ground, and it will find very great love and acceptance with him.

15.—But we have wrote nothing for the proud and haughty wiselings, who know enough already, and yet indeed know nothing at all; whose belly is their god, who only adhere to the beast of the Babylonical whore, and drink of her poison, and wilfully will be in blindness, and the devil's snare. But we have laid (with the spirit of our knowledge) a strong bolt before the understanding of folly, not to apprehend our meaning, seeing they wilfully and willingly serve Satan, and are not the children of God.

16.—But we desire to be clearly and fundamentally understood by the children of God, and heartily and readily communicate our knowledge given to us of God; seeing the time of such relation is born. Therefore let every one see, and take heed, what sentence and censure he passes: every one shall accordingly receive his reward, and we commend him into the grace of the meek and tender love of Jesus Christ. Amen.

 The Reader as he proceeds in the study of these Works, should take care to write out the substance or chief points of what he shall have studied, as also on all possible occasions to read portions aloud and emphatically to others, and converse with them upon the sense. DOCENDO DISCEMUS; and the reason is, because all things are in the mind, and merely require awakening through the senses. Some philosophers maintain that there are no innate ideas; others, and more correctly, that there are none but innate ideas: "For as the soul by its creation was made a partaker of the divine nature, it had (and has, as regenerated) the triune life, likeness and spirit of God, living in its own creaturely life, and therefore had the riches and perfections of the Deity grounded and growing up in that which was living in it. For as it was the life of man that had this image and likeness of God in it, so the unfathomable riches, powers, and perfections of the divine nature, came forth in a creaturely state in the birth of the human life. And this is the true ground of our eternal happiness, that is, of that eternal increase of union, perfection, and glory, which the redeemed soul will find in God; it is because the image and likeness of God, being as a seed sown into it, at its creation, it will to all eternity, after its admission into heaven, be made to open more and more its divine nature, and spring forth in new and further fruits and growths of glory, beatitude, and union with God.—And as it is a certain truth that no fruits, flowers, or virtues can be, or come forth in any vegetable, but what were first in its seed, or root: so no divine glory, perfection or power, can ever come forth in any creature in heaven, but what arises from that seed of the Deity, sown into it, at its creation. Therefore, as sure as the heavenly soul will to all eternity increase in new openings and enlargements of divine union, enjoyment, and perfection in God; so sure is it that in the centre, or inmost birth of the soul's life, lie the riches of the divine nature, [and therefore all things, and the knowledge thereof,] as a seed, or root of glory, given into it, by its first created image, or likeness to God."

The following Treatise was the first book of this Author, being written in the infancy of his high knowledge and illumination. It was simply set down as a memento for himself, of what he saw and conceived, but the providence of God made it known, and caused it to be much sought after.—It will be advisable for the reader, after studying the first thirty-six chapters of the last-mentioned Work, to peruse the Answer to the first of the "Forty Questions," then to run over briefly the "Book of the Incarnation," and the first two of the "Six Points." Then by reading alternately in the book of "The Three Principles," and the "Threefold Life," he will easily come into the ground and sense of the author, in the following Treatise.

Description of Nature, showing I.—How all was, and came to be in the Beginning. II.—How Nature and the Elements are become Creaturely. III.—Also of the Two Qualities Evil and Good. IV.—From whence all things had their Original. V.—And how all stand and work at present. VI.—Also how all will be at the End of this Time. VII.—Also what is the Condition of the Kingdom of God, and of the Kingdom of Hell. VIII.—And how men work and act creaturely in Each of them.

THE AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION to this book is as follows :—

To this book I have given this name, viz., "The Root or Mother of Philosophy, Astrology, and Theology." And that you may know what it treats of, observe,—

1.—In the Philosophy it treats of the Divine Power.

I.—What God is.

II.—How in the being of God is created nature, the stars, and the elements.

III.—From whence every thing has its original.

IV.—How heaven and earth were created.

V.—How angels, men, and devils were created.

VI.—How heaven and hell, and whatever is creaturely, were created, and what the two qualities are in nature.

All out of a true ground in the knowledge of the spirit, by the impulse and motion of God.

2.—In the Astrology, it treats,

I.—Of the powers of nature, of the stars, and of the elements.

II.—How all creatures proceeded from thence.

III.—How the same impel and rule all.

IV.—And work in all, and how good and bad is wrought by them in men and beasts.

V.—Whence it comes that good and bad is, and reigns in this world.

VI.—And how the kingdom of heaven and of hell consists therein.

3.—My purpose is not to describe the course, place, and name of all stars, and what their annual conjunction, opposition, quadrat, or the like is ; what they yearly and hourly operate, which by a long process of time has been observed by the wise, skilful, and expert men, who were rich and large in spirit, by their diligent contemplation, observation, deep sense, calculation, and computation.

4.—Neither have I studied or learned the same, and I leave that to the learned to discourse of; but my intention is to write according to the spirit and sense, and not according to speculation.

5.—In the Theology, it treats,

I.—Of the kingdom of Christ, of what condition it is.

II.—How it is set in opposition to the kingdom of hell.

III.—How in nature it fights and strives against the kingdom of hell.

IV.—How men through faith and spirit are able to overcome the kingdom of hell, and triumph in divine power, and obtain eternal salvation, and all this as a victory in the battle.

V.—How man through the operation or working in the hellish quality, casts himself into perdition.

VI.—And what the issue of both will be at last.

6.—The supreme title is AURORA, that is, The Dawning of the Day in the East, or Morning Redness in the Rising of the Sun.

And it is a secret mystery concealed from the wise and prudent of this world, which they themselves shall shortly be sensible of: but to those which read this book in singleness of heart, with a desire after the Holy Spirit, who place their hope only in God, it will not be a hidden secret, but a manifest knowledge.

7.—I will not explain this title, but commit it to the judgment of the impartial reader, who wrestleth in the good quality of this world.

8.—Now if the critic, who qualifies or works with his wit, in the fierce quality, gets this book into his hands, he will oppose it, as there is always a stirring and opposition between the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of hell.

I.—First he will say, that I ascend too high into the Deity, which is not a meet thing for me to do.

II.—Then, secondly, he will say, that I boast of the Holy Spirit: I had more need to live accordingly, and make demonstration of it by wondrous works or miracles.

III.—Thirdly, he will say, that I am not learned enough.

IV.—Fourthly, he will say, that I do it in a vain-glorious way.

V.—Fifthly, he will be much offended at the simplicity of the author, as it is usual in the world to gaze only upon high things, and simplicity is a scandal and offence to it.

9.—To these partial worldly critics, I set in opposition the patriarchs of the first world, who were mean despised men, against whom the world and the devil raged, as in the time of Enoch; when the holy fathers preached powerfully of the name of the Lord, they did not ascend with their bodies into heaven, and behold all with their eyes: only the Holy Ghost revealed himself in their spirits.

10.—It is seen afterwards in the next world, among the holy patriarchs and prophets, all which were mean simple men, and some of them were herdsmen.

11.—And when the MESSIAH CHRIST, the champion in the battle in nature, assumed the humanity, though he was the king and prince of men, yet he kept himself in this world in a low estate and condition, and his apostles were poor despised fishermen.

12.—Nay, Christ himself returneth thanks to his heavenly Father, that he has "concealed these things from the worldly wise men, and revealed them unto babes."

13.—Besides it is seen, how they also were poor sinners, having both the impulses of good and of bad in nature. And yet they repented and preached against the sins of the world, eye, and against their own sins, which they did by the impulse of the Holy Spirit, and not in vain glory.

14.—Neither had they any ability from their own strength and power, to teach of God's mysteries in that kind, but all was by the impulse of God.

15.—So neither can I say any thing of myself, nor boast or write of any thing, except this, that I am a simple man, and besides a poor sinner, and have need to pray daily; Lord forgive us our sins; and say with the apostle, "O Lord, thou hast redeemed us with thy blood."

16.—Neither did I ascend into heaven, and behold all the works and creatures of God; but the same heaven is revealed in my spirit, so that I know in the spirit the works and creatures of God.

17.—And besides, the will to that, is not my natural will, but it is the impulse of the Spirit; and I have endured many an assault of the devil for it.

18.—But the Spirit of Man is descended, not only from the stars and elements, but there is hid therein a spark of the light and power of God.

19.—It is not an empty word which is set down in Genesis, "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him." For it has this sense and meaning, viz., that he is created out of the whole being of the Deity.

20.—The body is from the elements, therefore it must have elemental food.

21.—The soul has its original, not only from the body, though it is in the body, and has its first beginning in the body; yet it has its source also from without in it, by and from the air, and so the Holy Ghost rules in it, in that manner, as he replenishes and fills all things, and as all things are in God, and so God himself is all.

22.—Seeing then the Holy Spirit in the soul is creaturely, viz. the propriety or portion of the soul, therefore it searches even into the Deity, and also into nature; for it has its source and descent from the being of the whole Deity.

23.—When it is kindled or enlightened by the Holy Ghost, then it beholds what God its father does, as a son beholds what his father does at home in his own house.

24.—It is a member or child in the house of the heavenly Father.

25.—And as the eye of man sees even unto the stars, from whence it has a finite original and beginning, so the soul also sees even into the divine Being, wherein it lives.

26.—But as the soul has its source also out of nature, and as in nature there is good and bad, and as man has cast himself, through sin, into the fierceness or wrath of nature, so that the soul is daily and hourly defiled with sins, therefore it knows but in part.

27.—For the wrath or fierceness in nature reigns now also in the soul. But the Holy Ghost does not go into the wrath or fierceness, but reigns in the source of the soul, which is in the light of God, and fights against the wrath or fierceness in the soul.

28.—And therefore the soul cannot attain unto any perfect knowledge in this life, till at the end, when light and darkness are separated, and wrath or fierceness is with the body consumed in the earth, then the soul sees clearly and perfectly in God its father.

29.—But when the soul is kindled or enlightened by the Holy Ghost, then it triumphs in the body, like a great fire, which makes the heart and reins tremble for joy.

30.—But there is not presently a great and deep knowledge in God its father, but its love towards God its father triumphs thus in the fire of the Holy Spirit.

31.—But the knowledge of God is sown in the fire of the Holy Ghost, and at first is as small "as a grain of mustard seed," as Christ makes the comparison, afterwards it grows large like a tree, and spreads itself abroad in God its creator.

32.—Just as a drop of water in the ocean cannot avail much; but if a great river runs into it, that makes a greater commotion.

33.—But the time past, present, and to come, as also depth and heighth, near and afar off, are all one in God, one comprehensibility.

34.—And the holy soul of man sees the same also, but in this world in part only. It happens sometimes that it sees nothing at all; for the devil assaults it furiously in the fierce wrathful source which is in the soul, and often covers the noble mustard-seed, and therefore man must always be in fight and war.

35.—In this manner and knowledge of the Spirit, I will write concerning God our father, in whom are all things, and who himself is all; and will show how all is become distinct and creaturely, and how all drives and moves in the whole tree of life.

36.—Here you shall see, 1. The true ground of the Deity. 2. How all was One Being before the time of the world. 3. How the holy angels were created, and out of what. 4. How the terrible fall of Lucifer, together with his legions, happened. 5. How heaven, earth, stars, and the elements were made. 6. How metals, stones, and other creatures in the earth, are generated. 7. How the birth of life is, and the corporeity of all things. 8. What the true heaven is, in which God and his saints dwell. 9. And what the wrath of God is, and the hellish fire. 10. And how all is become kindled and inflamed. In brief, how and what the Being of all Beings is.

37.—The first seven chapters treat very plainly and comprehensively of the being of God and of angels, by similitudes, that the reader may, from one step to another, at last come to the deep sense and true ground.

38.—In the eighth chapter begins the depth in the divine Being, and so on, the further the deeper.

39.—One thing is often repeated, and still more deeply described, for the reader's sake, and by reason of my slow and dull apprehension.

40.—That which you do not find sufficiently explained in this book, you will find more clearly in the second and third.

41.—For corruption is the cause, why we know but in part, and have not perfect knowledge at once.

42.—Yet this book is the WONDER of the World, which the holy soul will understand well enough. Thus I commit the reader to the meek and holy love of God.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE to this book is as follows: it may serve as a general preface to all his works—

1.—Man can undertake nothing from the beginning of his youth, nor in the whole course of his time in this world, that is more profitable and necessary for him, than to learn to know himself; what he is, out of what, from whence, and for what he is created, and what his office is. In such a serious consideration he will presently find, that he, and all the creatures that exist, come all from God. he will also find, among all the creatures, that he is the most noble creature of them all; from whence he will very well perceive how God's intention is towards him, in that he has made him lord over all the creatures of this world, and has endued him with mind, reason, and understanding, above all the rest of the creatures, especially with speech or language, so that he can distinguish everything that sounds, stirs, moves, or grows, and judge of every thing's virtue, effect, and original; and that all is put under his hand, so that he can bend them, use, and manage them, according to his will, as pleases him.

2.—Moreover, God has given him higher and greater knowledge than this, in that he can penetrate into the heart of every thing, and discern what essence, virtue, and property it has, both in the creatures, in earth, stones, trees, herbs, in all moveable and immoveable things; also in the stars and elements, so that he knows what substance and virtue they have, and that in their virtue all natural sensibility, vegetation, multiplication, and life consist.

3.—Above all this, God has given him the understanding and perception to know God his Creator; what and whence man is, how he is, and where he is, and out of what he proceeded, or was created; and how he is the image, substance, propriety, and child of the eternal, uncreated, and infinite God, in which God has his own substance and propriety, in whom he lives and governs with his Spirit, by which God manages his own work, and loves him dearly as his own heart and substance; for whose sake he created this world, with all the creatures that are therein, which for the most part, without the reason and government of man, could not live in such a condition as they do.

4.—The divine wisdom itself stands in such a high consideration, and has neither number nor end; and therein is the love of God towards man made known, in that man knows what his Creator is, and what he would have him do, and leave undone. And it is the most profitable thing for man in this world that he can search for, and seek after; for herein he learns to know himself, what matter and substance he is of; also from whence his understanding [cogitation, perceptibility,] and sensibility is stirred, and how he is created out of the substance of God. And as a mother brings forth a child out of her own substance, and nourishes it therewith, and leaves all her goods to it for its own, and makes it the possessor of them, so does God also with man, his child; he has created him, and preserved him, and made him heir to all his eternal goods. In and by this consideration the divine knowledge buds and grows in man, and the love towards God, as of a child to its parents, so that man loves God his father, for that he knows that he is his father, in whom he lives, and has his being, who nourishes him, preserves him, and provides for him; for thus saith Christ our brother, (who is begotten of the Father, to be a Saviour, and sent into this world,) this is the eternal life, that they know thee to be the only true God, and whom thou hast sent, Jesus Christ.

5.—Now seeing we ourselves know that we are created out of God's own substance, and made his image, substance and peculiar inheritance, it is therefore right that we should live in obedience to him, and follow him, seeing he leads us as a father does his children. And we have also his promise, that if we follow him, we shall obtain the light of the eternal life. Without such a consideration as this, we are altogether blind, and have no knowledge of God: but we run on as dumb beasts, and we look upon ourselves and upon God's creation as heifers look upon a new door made to their stalls, and set ourselves against God and his will, and so live in opposition and enmity, to the perdition of body and soul, and of God's noble creatures. We fall into this terrible and abominable darkness, because we will not learn to know ourselves, what we are, of what substance, what we shall be, whether we are eternal, or whether we are wholly transitory, as the body is; or whether also we must give an account of our matters and doings, seeing we are made lords of all creatures, and of the whole creation, and have all this in our power to manage.

6.—Even as we see, know, and find undeniably, that God will require an account of all our doings, how we have kept house with his works, and that when we fall from him and his commandments, he will punish us terribly, of which we have fearful examples, from the beginning of the world, and among the Jews, Heathens, and Christians, especially the example of the flood, and in Sodom and Gomorrah; also in Pharaoh, and the Children of Israel in the Wilderness, and ever since till this very time. Therefore it is indeed most necessary that we learn to know ourselves, what great vice and wickedness we carry about us, how horrible wolves are among us, which strive against God and his will.

7.—For there is none that can excuse himself, and plead ignorance, because the will of God is put into, and written in our minds, so that we very well know what we should do; and all the creatures bear witness against us. Moreover, we have God's law and commandments, so that there is no excuse, but only our drowsy, lazy negligence and carelessness, and so we are found to be slothful, unprofitable servants in the Lord's vineyard.

8.—Lastly, it is in the highest measure most needful for us to learn to know ourselves, because the devil dwells with us in this world, who is both God's enemy and ours, and daily misleads us, and ensnares us, as he has done from the beginning, that we might fall away from our God and father, that so he might enlarge his kingdom, and bereave us of our eternal salvation; as it is written, he goes about as a roaring lion, and seeketh whom he may devour.

9.—Seeing therefore we are in such horrible danger in this world, that we are environed with enemies on every side, and have a very unsafe pilgrimage or journey to walk; and above all, we carry our worst enemy within us, which we ourselves hide, and desire not to learn to know it, though it be the most horrible guest of all, which casts us headlong into the anger of God; yea, itself is the very anger of God, which throws us into the eternal fire of wrath, into the eternal unquenchable torment; therefore it is most needful for us to learn to know this enemy, what he is, who he is, and whence he is; how he comes into us, and what in us is his proper own; also what right the devil has to us, and what access of entrance into us; how he is allied with our own enemy that dwells in us, how they favour and help one another, how both of them are God's enemies, and continually lay wait for us to murder us, and bring us to perdition.

10.—Further, we must consider the great reasons why it is very necessary to learn to know ourselves, because we see and know that we must die and perish for our enemy's sake, which is God's enemy and ours, which dwells in us, and is the very half of man. And if he grows so strong in us, that he gets the upper hand, and is predominant, then he throws us into the abyss to all devils, to dwell there with them eternally, in an eternal, unquenchable pain and torment, into an eternal darkness, into a loathsome house, and into an eternal forgetting of all good, yea, into God's contending will, where our God and all the creatures are our enemies for ever.

11.—We have yet greater reasons to learn to know ourselves, because we are in good and evil, and have the promise of eternal life, that (if we overcome our own enemy and the devil) we shall be the children of God, and live in his kingdom, with and in him, among his holy angels, in eternal joy, brightness, glory, and welfare, in meekness, and favour with him, without any touch of evil, and without any knowledge of it, in God eternally. Besides, we have the promise, that if we overcome and bury our enemy in the earth, we shall rise again at the last day in a new body, which shall be without evil and pain, and live with God in perfect joy, loveliness, and bliss.

12.—Also we know and apprehend, that we have in us a reasonable soul, which is in God's love, and is immortal; and that if it be not vanquished by its adversary, but fights as a spiritual champion against its enemy, God will assist it with his Holy Spirit, and will enlighten and make it powerful, and able to overcome all its enemies; he will fight for it, and at the overcoming of the evil will glorify it as a faithful champion, and crown it with the brightest crown of heaven.

13.—Now seeing man knows that he is such a two-fold man, in the capacity of good and evil, and that they are both his own, and that he himself is that only man which is both good and evil, and that he shall have the reward of either of them, and to which of them he inclines in this life, to that his soul goes when he dies; and that he shall arise at the last day in power, in his labour and works which he exercised here, and live therein eternally, and also be glorified therein: and that shall be his eternal food and subsistence: therefore it is very necessary for him to learn to know himself, how it is with him, and whence the impulsion to good and evil comes, and what indeed the good and evil merely are in himself, and whence they are stirred, what properly is the original of all the good, and of all the evil, from whence, and by what means evil is come to be in the devils, and in men, and in all creatures; seeing the devil was a holy angel, and man also created good, and that also such untowardness is found to be in all creatures, biting, tearing, worrying, and hurting one another, and such enmity, strife, and hatred in all creatures; and that every thing is so at odds with itself, as we see it to be not only in the living creatures, but also in the stars, elements, earth, stones, metals, in wood, leaves, and grass, there is a poison and malignity in all things; and it is found that it must be so, or else there would be no life, no mobility, nor would there be any colour nor virtue, neither thickness nor thinness, nor any perceptibility or sensibility, but all would be as nothing.

14.—In this high consideration it is found that all is through and from God himself, and that it is his own substance, which is himself, and he has created it out of himself: and that the evil belongs to the forming and mobility; and the good to the love; and the austere, severe, or contrary will belongs to the joy; so far as the creature is in the light of God, so far the wrathful and contrary will makes the rising, eternal joy; but if the light of God be extinguished, it makes the rising, painful torment, and the hellish fire.

15.—That it may be understood how all this is, I will describe the "Three Divine Principles," that therein all may be declared, what God is, what nature is, what the creatures are, what the love and meekness of God, what God's desiring or will is, what the wrath of God, and the devil is, and in conclusion, what joy and sorrow are: and how all took a beginning, and endures eternally, with the true difference between the eternal and transitory creatures; especially of man, and of his soul, what it is, and how it is an eternal creature: And what heaven is, wherein God and the holy angels and holy men dwell; and what hell is, wherein the devils dwell; and how all things originally were created, and had their being. In sum, WHAT THE ESSENCE OF ALL ESSENCES IS.

16.—Seeing the love of God has favoured me with this knowledge, I will set it down in writing for a memorial or remembrance to myself, because we live in this world in so great danger between heaven and hell, and must continually wrestle with the devil, if perhaps through weakness I might fall into the anger of God, and thereby the light of my knowledge might be withdrawn from me, that it may serve me to recall it to memory, and raise it up again; for God wills that all men should be helped, and wills not the death of a sinner, but that he return, come to him, and live in him eternally; for whose sake he has suffered his own heart, that is, his son, to become man, that we might adhere to him, and rise again in him, and departing from our sins and enmity, or contrary will, be new-born in him.

17.—Therefore there is nothing more profitable to man in this world, while he dwells in this miserable, corrupted house of flesh, than to learn to know himself. Now, when he knows himself aright, he knows also his Creator, and all the creatures too: also he knows how God intends towards him, and this knowledge is the most acceptable and pleasant to me, that ever I found.

18.—But if it should happen that these writings should come to be read; and perhaps the sodomitish world, and the fatted swine of it, may light upon them, and root in my garden of pleasure, who cannot know or understand any thing, but to scorn, scandalize, reproach, and cavil in a proud haughty way, and so know neither themselves nor God, much less his children; I intend not my writing for them, but I shut and lock up my book with a strong bolt or bar, from such idiots and wild heifers of the devil, who lie over head and ears in the devil's murdering den, and know not themselves. They do the same which their teacher the devil does, and remain children of the severe anger of God. But I will here write plainly and clearly enough for the children of God. The world and the devil may roar and rage till they come into the abyss; for their hour-glass is set up, when every one shall reap what he has sown: and the hellish fire will sting many a one sufficiently for his proud, spiteful, and despising haughtiness, which he had no belief of while he was here in this life.

19.—Besides, I cannot well neglect to set this down in writing, because God will require an account of every one's gifts, how they have employed them; for he will demand the talent which he has bestowed, with the increase or use, and give it to him that has gained much: but seeing I can do no more in it. I commit it to his will, and so go on to write according to my knowledge.

20.—As to the children of God, they shall perceive and comprehend this my writing, what it is, for it is a very convincing testimony, it may be proved by all the creatures, yea in all things, especially in man, who is an image and similitude of God: but it continues hidden and obscure to the children of malignity or iniquity, and there is a fast seal before it; and though the devil disrelish the smell and savour, and raise a storm from the east to the north, yet there will then, in the wrathful or crabbed sour tree, grow a LILY with a root as broad as the tree spreads with its branches, and bring its scent and smell even into paradise.

21.—There is a wonderful time coming. But because it begins in the night, there are many that shall not see it, by reason of their sleep and great drunkenness; yet the sun will shine to the children at midnight. Thus I commit the reader to the meek love of God. Amen.

(IV.)—The FORTY QUESTIONS CONCERNING the SOUL ANSWERED.

In the Answer to the First Question is the Figure of the Philosophic Globe, or universal WONDER-EYE OF ETERNITY, or Mirror of the Divine Wisdom, with an Explanation of it.

With a Summary Appendix concerning the Soul, the Image of the Soul, and the Turba which is the Destroyer of the Image.

 The author originally wrote the Answers to these Questions for the sake of his friend, one Dr. B. W., who, after travelling in various parts of the world, in search of the ancient occult wisdom, on his return home, happening to hear of this author, he made his acquaintance; and rejoiced that he had at last found, in a poor cottage of his own neighbourhood, what he had travelled so far in quest of, to no purpose. He thereupon proceeded to several of the most noted Universities of Germany, and having collected together such metaphysical questions concerning the Soul as were accounted impossible to be resolved fundamentally, of which the following is a catalogue, he sent them to this author, from whom he received the answers contained in this book, to his utmost satisfaction.

Each of the previous books from the first will be found to be grounded deeper and deeper, and in this fourth treatise, the Great Mystery of the Manifestation of God may be clearly understood. It would seem that successive books are made in order that what could not be explicated in the one, might be found in the other. It were well, if possible, that all were compressed into one, and the rest laid aside, for the multiplicity causeth strife and confused apprehension, owing to the catching conceits of human reason, which is stark blind as to the mystery, for it stands without and not within the circle of truth. But whosoever applies himself aright, according to the indicated process, to understand the centre of all Beings, and comes but so far as to apprehend the THREE PRINCIPLES of the Divine Manifestation, will not need either these or any man's Writings, for the whole universe of things will be an open book to his delighted apprehension.

THE QUESTIONS are these:—

- I.—Whence the Soul proceeded at the Beginning?
- II.—What is its Essence, Substance, Nature, and Property?
- III.—How is it Created in the Image of God?
- IV.—What and when was the Breathing of it in?
- V.—How is it peculiarly fashioned, and what is its Form?
- VI.—What is its Power?
- VII.—Whether is it Corporeal or not Corporeal?
- VIII.—After what Manner comes into the Body of Man?
- IX.—Which Way does it unite itself with the Body?
- X.—Whether is it EX TRADUCE and propagated after an human bodily Manner, or every Time new created and Breathed in from God?
- XI.—How, and where is it seated in Man?
- XII.—How, and what is the Illumination of it?
- XIII.—How does it feed upon the Word of God?
- XIV.—Whether is such new Soul without Sin?
- XV.—How comes Sin into it, seeing it is the Work and Creature of God?
- XVI.—How is it kept in such Union, both in the Adamic and Regenerate Body?
- XVII.—Whence and wherefore is the Contrariety between the Flesh and the Spirit?
- XVIII.—How does it depart from the Body at the Death of a Man?
- XIX.—How is it Mortal, and how Immortal?
- XX.—How does it return to God again?
- XXI.—Whither goes it when it departs from the Body, be it saved or not saved?
- XXII.—What does every Soul departed? Does it rejoice till the last Judgment Day?
- XXIII.—Whether do the Souls of the Wicked, without difference, (for so long a time before the Day of Judgment) find so much as any Mitigation or Refreshment?
- XXIV.—Whether do Men's Wishes profit them anything, or sensibly do them any good?
- XXV.—What is the Hand of God, and the Bosom of Abraham?
- XXVI.—Whether does the Soul take care for Men, their Friends or Children, or their Goods; and whether does it know, see, approve, or disapprove their Undertakings?
- XXVII.—Whether does it know this or that Art, or Occupation, whereof (while it was in the body) it had sufficient Skill?
- XXVIII.—Whether also does it obtain somewhat more certain Knowledge of Divine, Angelical, Earthly, and Diabolical Matters, than it had in the Body?
- XXIX.—What is its Rest, Awakening, and Glorification?
- XXX.—What is the Difference between the Resurrection of the Flesh and of the Soul, both of the Living and of the Dead?
- XXXI.—What kind of new Glorified Bodies shall they have?
- XXXII.—What shall their Form, Condition, Joy, and Glory be in the other Life?
- XXXIII.—What kind of Matter shall our Bodies have in the Life to come?
- XXXIV.—What is the lamentable and horrible Condition of the Damned Souls?
- XXXV.—What is the Enochian Life, and how long does it continue?
- XXXVI.—What is the Soul of the Messiah, or Christ?
- XXXVII.—What is the Spirit of Christ, which he willingly commended into the Hands of his Father?
- XXXVIII.—Of the Things that shall come to pass at the End of the World?
- XXXIX.—What and where is Paradise, with its Inhabitants?
- XL.—Whether is it Mutable, and what shall it be afterwards?

THE PREFACE is the epistle addressed by the author to his friend, Dr. B., on returning him the answers, as follows:—

1.—Beloved Sir, and my good Friend, it is impossible for reason to answer these your questions, for they contain the chiefest and greatest mysteries, which are alone known to God.

2.—Hence saith Daniel to King Nebuchadnezzar: That which the king asketh and desireth of the learned Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Wise Men, is not in their power. The God of Heaven only can reveal secret things: It is not in my reason to answer the king; but that the king may perceive the thoughts of his heart, God hath revealed it; not that my reason is greater than any man's living. [Dan. I. 26. Gen. XLI. 16.]

3.—So likewise I say to you: you shall be answered, not that my reason is greater than any man's living, but only that you may perceive the thoughts, the earnest seeking and desire of your heart, it is given me to answer you.

4.—And you should not, in such a way, so anxiously seek after these things; they are in no outward reason. But to the Spirit of God nothing is impossible: seeing we are the children of God, and in Christ new born of God, the son sees very well what the father does in his house, and also learns his art and work.

5.—Seeing also we are the mystery of God, we ought not to suppose that we must not so much as look upon, nor meddle with such mysteries as Babylon teacheth; for none taketh unto himself any thing of God's mysteries, unless it be given him. And St. James saith, every good and perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of lights, with whom there is no change nor alteration.

6.—And seeing you seek so eagerly after such things, you become thereby even the cause of finding them, for God gives his mysteries both by means, and also without means; but that no man might boast, he often makes use of very mean people about them, that it might be acknowledged that they come from his hand.

7.—You shall be answered with a very sound and deep answer, yet briefly comprised, not according to outward reason, but according to the spirit of knowledge.

8.—And although I could sufficiently show and demonstrate these things in a larger description: yet seeing they are all described, and explained at large in my other writings, at present I set them down but briefly for the ease and delight of the reader, and that it may serve for a short memorial of the great mysteries.

9.—But he that desires to know these things fully and fundamentally, let him seek them in my former writings, especially in the third book, and there he has the whole ground of the divine essence; and also of the creation of all things; of that which is eternal, and of that which is corruptible; and how every thing was made, and is come to be as it is, and act as it does, and what it shall be in the end.

10.—And therein also lies the key of the Mysterium Magnum, so far as a creature is able to comprehend or bear, and thither we refer you for further explanation, and so I commend me to you, into the brotherly love in Christ.

~~As a still more abundant consideration of the Holy Trinity Manifestation has been reserved to the future, to be given in a separate and the following pages.~~

(VI.)—The Book of the SIX POINTS, or A HIGH and DEEP SEARCHING-OUT of the GREAT SIX POINTS: an Open Gate of all Arcana, or hidden Secrets of the Life; Wherein the Causes of All and Every Being, Substance, or Thing become known and may be apprehended. It is the High and Deep Ground of the Mysterium Magnum, of the Being of all Beings, or Substance of all Substances, and of the Three Worlds:

To which is appended, A BRIEF EXPOSITION of OTHER SIX POINTS.—Written by the Inspiration of God, from the Spiritual Perception of the Ground or Foundation of all Things.

THE GREAT SIX POINTS are as follows:—

Point I.—Of the First Sprouting of the Three Principles; What kind of Tree or Life each of them generates in and out of itself, and how men should seek, find, and know, the Ground of Nature.

— II.—Of the Mixed Tree of Evil and Good; or the Three Principles in one another, how they unite, agree, and co-work together, — III.—Of the Original of Contrariety in the Sprout or Vegetation, in that the Life becometh striving in itself.

— IV.—How the Holy and Good Tree of Eternal Life springeth through and forth out of all the Sprouts of the Three Principles, and is apprehended by none of them.

— V.—Of the Tree and Sprout of the Life of Perdition: how a Life may perish, that is, how it passeth out of the Source or quality of Love and Joy, into the source or quality of Misery; which is opposite to all other Lives.

— VI.—Of the Life of Darkness, wherein the Devils dwell; what kind of Birth or Generation and source and quality, it hath.

The other SIX POINTS are these following:—

- Point I.—Concerning the Blood and Water of the Soul.
 — II.—Of the Election of Grace, or Predestination of Good and Evil.
 — III.—Of Sin : what Sin is, and how it is Sin.
 — IV.—How Christ will deliver up the Kingdom to his Father, [Of the Third Motion of the Deity, by the Holy Ghost] I Cor. xii, 24.
 — V.—Of the Magia : what the Magia is, and what the Magic Ground is. [The universal Imagination of the Deity in the Light.]
 — VI.—Of the Mystery : what it is. [The Mystery of the Will or Occult Principle in its Operations.]

THE PREFACE to the Great Six Points is as follows :—

1.—We have written this work, not for the unreasonable beasts, who have outwardly the form of a man, but in their image and spirit are evil and wild beasts, which discovereth itself in their property or conditions.

2.—But for the image of man, for those which grow or spring forth out of the beastial image, with a human image, which belongeth to God's kingdom; who would fain live and grow in the human image, in the right true man.

3.—Who many times and often are hindered by the opposite contrarious life, and so stick in the mixed life; and pant after the birth of the holy life: for those are these writings written.

4.—And we advise them not to look upon it as impossible to apprehend and to know such secret hidden arcana: and we offer that to them to consider and conceive of, in a similitude.

5.—For instance; there stood a life, which was sprouted out of all and every life, and was mixed; but there grew another life in that, out of every life, which, though it was grown out of all and every life, yet was free from all and every other life, and yet stood also in all essences of the life, [in all properties or qualities of the life.]

6.—And that other new life became enlightened with the light, and that only in itself: so that it could see all and every other life; and yet the other lives could not behold nor apprehend the new life.

7.—Just thus is every one, who out of the mixed life of evil and good is become born again in and out of God; that very new image born or generated in the life of God, beholdeth all and every natural life, and nothing is strange or hard to it; for it beholdeth only its root, out of which it is sprouted or grown.

8.—As we may apprehend, by observing how a fair flower or blossom groweth out of the wild earth; which is not like the earth, yet with its fair beauty declareth the ability or potentiality of the earth, and how it is mixed with good and evil.

9.—Thus also is every man, who becometh born or generated out of the wild condition and property, to the right image of God again.

10.—For those now, who are in the sprouting, and drive forth towards the FAIR LILY in the kingdom of God, and stand in the birth, is this book written; that they should strengthen their essences therein, and spring or sprout in the life of God, and grow and bear fruit in the tree of Paradise.

11.—And seeing all the children of God grow in this tree, and every of them is a branch in that tree, therefore we would have our sap, smell, savour, and essences, imparted to our fellow-branches and sprouts in our tree wherein we all stand, and out of which we all sprout and grow: that our tree of Paradise might be great, and we rejoice one among another.

12.—And that one sprout and branch may continually help to cover or shelter the other from the storm: we give this to all the children of this sprout in this tree, friendly to ponder of; and commit and commend ourselves into their love and sprouting.

The Preface to the other Six Points, is as follows:—The highly precious knowledge of this book is not attained unless the soul have once overcome in the storm, and beat down the devil, and so hath attained the victorious garland or crown of triumph, which the most blessed Virgin chas-tity sets upon it as a badge of victory, and a token that it hath overcome in its dear champion Christ; then this wonderful knowledge riseth up, yet with no perfection.

✎ This (unfinished) tract is admirably adapted, as it is indeed made to serve for an Introduction to the Science of Theosophy, in the Third Part of the GRAMMAR of WISDOM, heretofore described.

THE CONTENTS of this treatise [of the Apprehension of Divine and Natural Things in the light of God,] are as follows :—

FIRST PART.

Chap. I.—Of the Divine Contemplation : what God is, and how Men shall know His Substance by His Revelation.—The Objections herein Answered are these, (1.) Why it seems as if there was no God, and as if all Things in the world went by Chance. (2.) Why God, who is Love itself, permits a will contrary to His own, whereby Creatures suffer such cruel Pain and Misery, instead of keeping all things in the Harmony or Temperament of Goodness. (3.) Why Evil should be found along with Good ; what is the Reason and Profit of it.

— II —Of the Mind, Will and Thoughts of the Human Life, how they have their Original from the Will of God, and how it is an Object or Representation, viz. an Image of God, in which God willeth, worketh, and dwelleth.—The Objections herein Answered are (1.) Why the Mind in the Mortal Body can become super-cogitative, that is, be introduced into the Supersensual Divine Life, and be filled with God.* (2.) How a Man may prevent the Desiring Life from entering into Earthly Properties.

* The master of the Grammar of Wisdom will not need, like the author of * * * * * to go groping about for the reasons and causes of things therein related. Which work is a noble specimen of the egregious absurdity of a man devoid of faith, however excellent a condenser of facts and an historian, to attempt to write the life of a man of faith, and to philosophise upon the incidents thereof. Another proof of the vanity, and what is more, of the malice of that author, is his insinuation about Law. Finding in the course of his researches connected with the biography, with what force of truth and just sarcasm, Law, in his masterly writings, treats the unmanly contemptible employments of mere tell-tale, sing-song literature, he took the opportunity, in his book, to cast a stigma upon Law and his writings, by not only joining in the mawkish regrets of a few shallow religionists, that a man of Law's piety and resplendent talents, should, "in his latter days have so degenerated into mysticism and the errors (as they call them) of J. B." but by slyly insinuating, with an affected air of candour and pity, that he (L.) "who had been the means of turning so many heads, at last sacrificed his own intellects to the mad reveries of J. B."—But what was the end, for all is well that ends well, and all ill that ends ill. One, the devoted servant and instrument of God, after a life of seventy-five years' duration, spent in a continual acquisition of wisdom and piety, and in the boundless diffusion of temporal and spiritual benefits to his fellow-creatures, and whose intellects seemed to be but the more divinely bright and luminous as he approached the heavenly City, (his "Tract upon Warburton" being written after he was seventy years of age, and his "Address to the Clergy" a few days only before his decease), died as he lived, in the triumph of faith, these being some of his last words,—“Away with these polluted garments,” said the dying seraph, “I feel a sacred fire kindled in my soul, which has destroyed every thing contrary to itself, and shall burn as a flame of divine love to all eternity !” And now how fared it on the other side ? According to the newspapers, the libeller himself closed the last years of his life in drivelling idiocy.

Further, on glancing back over the last fifteen or sixteen pages, and then forward over the same number, may it not be here inquired, what but a self-willed audacious fool, or an envious sophistical knave, would dare to reproach the above series of writings, as void of sense and light, and publicly revile the author as a madman, as they of old did to Him who spake as never man spake, [John x, 20, 21,] and who, in and by the Author of the above works, wrote as man never before wrote. The very sacredness and profundity of the subjects therein considered, the systematic manner in which they appear to be treated, the extraordinary common sense and piety sparkling and shining through every line of the prefaces, and the unearthly, semblant-miraculous character of the whole, yet all simply tending to the promotion of the love and knowledge of God, and the diffusion of Divine benevolence amongst mankind, so far from provoking the jeers of the conceited earthly-wise, ought rather to have the same imposing effect upon the mind, as the first sight of the author's books had upon Law, when in the full fresh bloom of his intellectual powers ; which is thus described by one of his friends :—“In an intimate interview I had with Mr. Law, a few months before his decease, (with which I was favoured at my particular request), I inquired of him, when and how he first met with Behmen's works. He replied, that he had often reflected upon it with surprise ; that although when a tutor in London, he had perhaps rummaged every bookseller's shop and bookstall in the metropolis, [doubtless feeling the want of a much higher philosophical and theological science than even he had yet attained, even the true science of God, nature, and all things,] yet he had never met with a single book, or so much as knew the title of any book of J. B.'s. The first notice he had of him, was from a treatise, called “Fides et Ratio,” published at Amsterdam, 1707 ; soon after which he accidentally obtained one of the best of his works. [the “Signatura Rerum ?”] When I first began to read him, (says he), he put me into a perfect sweat. But as I discerned sound truths, and the glimmerings of a deep ground and sense, even in the passages not then clearly intelligible to me ; and found in myself a strong incentive to dig in these writings, I followed the impulse with continual aspirations and prayer to God for his help and divine illumination, if that I was called to understand them. By patiently reading in this manner again and again, and from time to time, passing over any little objections and difficulties that stood in my way for the moment, I perceived (said he) that my heart felt well, and my understanding kept gradually opening ; till at length I discovered the wonderful treasure there was hid in this field.” Such indeed is the way in which all rightly constituted minds receive and examine such writings, though not according to the literary ginewack method of the juvenile authors of "Hours with the hyphes &c"

SECOND PART.

Chap. III.—Of the Natural Ground; how Nature is an Object or Representation of Divine Skill and Knowledge, whereby the Eternal Will with the Abyssal Supernatural Knowledge, maketh itself perceptible, visible, operative, and willing; and what the Mysterium Magnum is.—The subjects of this chapter are, (1.) Of the Ground of Nature, how the Eternal is displayed in the Temporal. (2.) Of the Two-fold Life in the Reflex Image, how Man's Mind manifests the Eternal Mind. (3.) Of the Three Spirits in Vegetables: First, the outward Salt, Mercury, and Sulphur. Secondly, the Fifth or Quintessence, which lies in the Oil of Metallic Sulphur. Thirdly, the Tincture, which is the Reflex Image of the great incomprehensible Divine Mystery, with a Description of the Tincture.

— IV.—Of the GOING-IN and GOING-OUT, how the Eternal Will of God brings itself Out, and in the perceptibility In, and again into the Unity. Whereby a man may understand to what End, the Substance of this Temporal Universe is created, and to what the Creaturely Ground is profitable; also to what End, Joy and Sorrow hath become manifest, and how God is so near unto All Things.

(X.)—THREE TABLES of the DIVINE REVELATION or MANIFESTATION: Showing how God is to be considered in Himself without Nature, according to the Three Principles. Also, what Heaven and Hell, the World, Time, and Eternity are, together with all Creatures; and out of what all Things are existed.

THE PREFACE to these Tables is the very profound Epistle concerning the Knowledge of God and all Things, being the Sixth of his published Epistles.

☞ The reader must not be offended, during the perusal of this account of the author's works, at the seeming tautology, or constant repetition of one and the same unchangeable ground, in his several treatises. For the author, (more especially at the commencement of his high illumination,) being a poor illiterate man, and having no knowledge of regularity of composition, wrote without art, save as a faithful recorder of what he saw and conceived in the Divine light. When, therefore, he entered upon the resolution of any particular subject, he always began afresh from the same first ground and full opening of the mystery of nature. But when it is considered that, on such occasions, he never expresses himself in the same terms, but always presents his wonderful subject in a new aspect, and moreover, that he had no idea of his works ever being collected together and published as now done, but supposed each of them would exist in a separate and independent form in MS., as a complete treatise of itself,—it will appear not only consistent with, but a further instance of the care and condescension of the Divine goodness, that he should have set forth his very sublime knowledge in so simple and child-like a manner, whereby his readers might the more easily come to apprehend his deep sense and meaning.

~~Here endeth what may be termed the pure philosophy of these writings, highly revealing the ground of nature, or the natural principles of things.~~

We proceed, in the next place, to insert a description of the author's vindications of his writings from the attacks and objections of opponents during his lifetime, which will afford an opportunity of clearing up many points that might otherwise appear difficult to be received: which is accomplished by the four treatises enumerated XI., XII., XIII., XIV., in the next following pages.

And afterwards we shall continue the author's 'Demonstrations of the several doctrines and institutes of Christianity;' which taken altogether, may be summed up in the following order, viz:—

First,—A theosophic explanation of the sense of the first book of Moses, called Genesis, clearly unfolding from a self-evident ground in perfect harmony with the gospel faith, all the hitherto unresolved enigmas and mysteries couched in the first, second, and indeed every chapter of that mysterious book; which will be found to be accomplished in the forementioned treatise of the "Mysterium Magnum," and incidentally illustrated in others.

Secondly,—A central radical demonstration of the person of Jesus Christ as God and man, and of his vital essential relation to all mankind, in accordance with what shall have been observed concerning the creation, fall, and redemption of human nature in the last-mentioned treatise upon Genesis, and in perfect harmony with the Holy Scriptures; which will be found to be effected by the fore-mentioned "Treatise of the Incarnation," and incidentally throughout the whole of the works.

Thirdly,—An orderly exposition of all the inward and outward circumstances of the process of Jesus Christ in the redemption of mankind, showing the natural efficacy of all the several parts of that process in qualifying him to be the redeemer of human nature, and in actually rendering him such; which is accomplished in the aforesaid book of the "Three Principles," and incidentally in other of the works.

Fourthly,—A theosophic handling of the two sacraments or testaments of Christ, viz. baptism and the supper, from the eternal ground thereof; which is completed in the treatise of the "Two Testaments," hereafter described, and incidentally in the "Three Principles" and other of the author's works.

Fifthly,—An unfolding, from its deepest ground and centre, the great doctrine of predestination, or the so-termed fore-knowledge and fore-ordinance of God, not only to clear up the texts of Christianity upon that profound subject, but to for ever satisfy the ancient and universal conjectures of all nations, whether Christians, Jews, Turks, or Heathens, upon that hitherto irreconcilable mystery; which will be found to be clearly and absolutely accomplished in the treatise of the "Election of Grace."

Sixthly,—An opening of the true ground and reasons of the whole theory of christianity, both as regards faith and practise, that is concerning gospel repentance and faith, the warfare between the flesh and the spirit or old and new man, the nature of inward and outward temptation, the constant necessity of true resignation or dying to self, termed "the cross" of Christ, the "inward and outward cross," the "carrying the cross," "active and passive self-denial," with a description of the self-deception of a backsliding state, and then concerning the attainment of purity of will and heart, and a total death to self, denominated christian perfection. Wherein is of necessity shown the natural effects of the spirit of prayer, of ardent hunger and thirst after righteousness, of diligent unceasing research after God, for the manifestation of his life and power and light in the soul, of mortification, silence, love, and attention to the presence of God in the soul, and of a devout recurrence to all the passive graces, as so many productive forms of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, within us; which will be found largely set forth in the several forementioned tracts composing the Second Part of the Grammar of Wisdom, already sufficiently described, as well as in all the author's works.

Seventhly and lastly,—affording the key to the great mystery of Nature, as a metaphysical anatomist exhibiting the formed Word of God in the signatures of all living things, or the sign and signification of the several forms and shapes in the creation, thus demonstrating the truth of christianity* by every living member and the whole system of things of the visible universe. So that nature

* The following extract is from an able philosophical Essay entitled "The Past Present and Future, with regard to the Creation," recently published at 27, Paternoster Row. The Essay, though written in a popular manner, is, in fact, the result of an extensive acquaintance with the philosophy opened in these writings, a constant observance of the advances of practical universal science, and a close study of the Holy Scriptures.

It is reported of the secluded author of this Tract, that, what with his theosophical erudition, his acquaintance with the ground and relations of the physical forces, and the diversity of phases those principles present in conjunction with matter, when violently excited, and his constant study of nature in all her beautiful and lovely forms of fruits and flowers, he has almost attained to the point of being able, with intellectual clearness, to interpret Nature in her productions, tracing them from their first spiritual ens to their last substantial perfection, thereby possessing a counter-check to the true doctrines of Theology and Philosophy. The above Essay, however, is founded upon natural phenomena and the word of God, and the author has proved his point in a very lucid and satisfactory manner.—The extract therefrom is here inserted to afford a glimpse of the superior advantages to be obtained by a proper study of Behmen's writings, either for the enlightened exposition of the sense and depth of the sacred scriptures, even in a popular manner from the pulpit, or in aid of the researches of science into the powers, laws and phenomena of Nature. The learned writer sets out with maintaining that "as nature is still, according to the saying of the Apostle (Rom. i. 20), a living image of the Creator's powers, it must needs be considered in its inseparable relation to the Deity, to be rightly understood, and that as natural philosophy, in its present imperfect state, has not any such ability, recourse must be had to the light of Faith. [that is, to the word of God; interpreted by that key to his Word with which He himself has furnished us in the revelation of the ground and mystery of all things, by His chosen servant Behmen.]—The extract is taken from the Illustration of his subject, at the conclusion of the Essay, he having for that purpose collected together and placed before him on the table, in sight of his audience, (a few friends who had met to hear the lecture,) a number of oranges, apples, grapes, figs, pomegranates, peaches, nuts, potatoes, onions, carrots, peas, mustard-seed, grains of wheat and barley, acorns, boughs of fruit-blossom, roses, hyacinths, daisies, geraniums, chickweed, tulip-bulbs, and other of the numberless microcosms or children of the great mother of nature; the and grace are shown to tally with each other: as indeed no religion can be true that makes them to disagree, and no philosophy fundamental that cannot indicate their mutual relations; which will be found most harmoniously elucidated in the treatise "De Signatura Rerum," and partially in other of the author's works.—To use the beautiful and just description of the last-mentioned treatise, by an ancient learned writer, "there is," says he, "therein, one continued breath and sound of the author's own experimental science, running in harmonious division through all the three principles of the Divine manifestation, and with sweet accord playing interchangeably upon all the three forms and particular properties of which, both entire and when cut in half to expose their constitution, he gave the philosophy of, incidentally, in answer to the occasional inquiries of the audience, during the delivery of the Essay:—

1.—I have collected together, (says he,) and have lying before me, on the table, many different kinds of grains, seeds, roots, and fruits.

2.—I consider each of them to be, as it were, a manuscript written in a character or language which I cannot decipher. The variety of form and colour bespeaks a variety in the intelligence conveyed by each. Or each of them may be considered as a medal or medallion of a former reign, with its special image and superscription.

3.—Now, my ignorance in deciphering these curious and interesting living manuscripts, shall in nowise prejudice my faith, either in the intelligence of their common Author, or in the skill with which He has embodied it. The writing must be plain, and the sense good, and rich, and manifold; though, I own, I want the cypher that shall unfold all their meaning.

4.—The sense conveyed belongs, I believe, to a former world, older than this, and to us invisible, but still in power present in all that we are permitted to behold.

5.—I call these living records, living documents; for as they have in them the lineage of their ancestry, created on the third day of the world, so are they fully qualified to perpetuate life, under fitting circumstances, to endless eternity. Should the world continue—which, assuredly, it will not—their life would continue also from generation to generation, even as it is uninterrupted in the Deity himself.

6.—This they have by virtue of their origin; for of every tree, and plant, and herb, it was said by God 'that its seed was in itself.' Is not this so much as saying, that His own eternity lay hid and operative therein, or that His eternal power was corporised there?

7.—Now that which lives in a form, begins only as to form: form is mutable and temporal; life is unbeginning—its first root is God. The outward phases of inward and eternal powers are endless; but the inward invisible powers themselves are, I believe, on revealed grounds, numerically seven.

8.—Deity is repeatedly declared to be sevenfold, in His Unity. This accounts for the endless variety of His works, and also secures their harmony where the sevenfold law is obeyed. It also accounts for their decay, or mutability, or death, either in a higher or lower sense, when the sevenfold law is broken, for then the powers act unequally, and therefore, either centripetal or centrifugal action must prevail, and there the divine Unity has no copy: in the unequal action of these powers lies, I suppose, both spiritual and temporal death.

9.—In the wilful sinner centripetal action prevails. Hence all the pride, the hardness, the coldness, the unbelief of our hearts. In the real penitent centrifugal action is restored, and the powers balanced.—The truth and power of penitence comes from a sight of the cross of Christ, who willingly crossed his own centripetal action with the will of God. This I suppose to be the ground of His invitation, expressed Matt. xi. 28—30, and the spirit of the whole Gospel.

10.—I repeat that each of these seeds and fruits, as indeed every other creature of God in this creation, relates to some matter of earlier history, and reveals a real fact. It tells that principles and properties disunited before time, and suspending their action in a higher sphere, combined again at Divine command, in number, weight, and measure, in a lower sphere, and proclaimed a temporary peace, a material marriage, and continued productiveness.

11.—Look at our own national medals. Have we not Roman, Saxon, and ancient English coins belonging to our own national history? Each of our medals tells of some event that preceded it, and consists of metal—gold, silver, or copper—that existed before the event which it records took place, and much more before the coining took place, which converted the metal into a historic monument.

12.—How strange to suppose that the Creator of all things, the King of kings, should have no mint or Record-office, and keep no documents of interesting facts; or, that He should never publish the story of events, or issue coins, or strike medals, to tell of rebellions, defeats, degradations, or boons, franchises, and elevations! Yes, doubtless, "the invisible things of God are clearly to be seen and understood by the things that are made."

13.—The good and evil that is in the creation, as now it is seen, tells, I presume, of prior confusion in higher powers. If the lion slay and destroy—if the fox steal—if the upas tree distils a deadly poison—if some metals are corrosive, and others minister to health—if the deadly nightshade grow beside the barley, wheat, and oats—let men learn that pride, rebellion and murder are older than man, though not so old as love, goodness, and truth.—Strife is older than man; but never would Jesus have borne a cross had man kept the sevenfold law.

14.—It is because seven spirits are in God (Zech. iv.) that seven days were employed in reducing the chaos to temporary perfection. Each day saw a good work done: for the Unity wrought gradually, developing in succession, higher and higher powers, in the confused mass, till man, the image of God, crowned the work; and in man, and in all the prior works, God kept his own first earthly sabbath, resting complacently in all that He had created and made: even as the creation rested in God from prior undue action, but not in eternal rest. There still remaineth, I sup-cliffs of philosophy, divinity, and theosophy, even from the deepest bass to the smallest or highest note that can be sounded or reached by the spirit of man; wherefore none will understand him but the nurslings of Sophia." Such, indeed, is a just description of the sweet angelic language or music warbling simply and naturally, (truth and wisdom) through every page of that treatise, and it may be said through all this author's works.

Having interposed thus much in elucidation of the manifest design of pose, a σαββατισμος, a keeping of the sabbath, in the highest sense, to the creation, through the people of God. (Heb. iv. 9.)

15.—When God raised his son from the dead, His seven powers wrought, at once, without succession; and therefore the day of the resurrection takes precedence of the ancient seventh day—for it embodies, in unity, the energies of the whole week, of all time, of eternity, or the whole power of God. (See Ephes. i. 19, 20.)

[Why was the Son of God—the redeemer of the world—raised from the dead the first day of the week? I suppose because He and His redemption are the antitypes of that great work which began on the first day of the week that the universe, as now we see it, ever knew or beheld!

The creation of the universe and the resurrection of the Lord are both gracious acts, originating in one motive and founded in similar reasons, and proclaiming this truth that "there is one only who is good, that is God," and that He doeth good, and that He is God alone.

They are successive stages in one vast plan, the full development of which belongs to periods yet to come.]

16.—But look with me once more at these seeds, and flowers, and fruits: their ancestors are older than ours by three days. Before man was made, the grass grew, the trees bloomed, the fishes swam, and the orbs of space commenced their circuits. The fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field are older than we. Mortality is older than man.

[If I wanted another argument to show that the present bondage of the creation is referable to spiritual causes older than man, and holds subject spiritual powers in material forms, I could find it, I think, in the fact that, the Lord, the Spirit, is its deliverance. And if the church is one with the Lord, in spirit and in truth; if our life is hid with Christ in God, what wonder that the expectation of the creation is towards the manifestation of the sons of God? Man had a mission to the creation before he fell (Genesis i. 28), and that mission will assuredly be fulfilled by the second Head of our race in the midst of the church. Heb. ii. 5—12.

17.—I believe that Divine powers act, in the present universe, by means of material resistances, which serve as bases, instruments, and coverings of one ineffably and inconceivably glorious Unity, to whose eye all things are ever naked and open.

18.—Philosophers and observers are beginning to be persuaded (I allude chiefly to Dr. Faraday's researches) that among "the various powers of nature, or physical forces, as they are termed, although producing different classes of results on matter, there exists a close relation:" in fact, they are connected by a common origin, have a reciprocal dependence on one another, and are capable, under certain conditions, of being converted the one into the other. Electricity is a source of magnetism—magnetism, combined with motion, yields electricity. There exists a relation between these powers and light: and now it is discovered that a ray of light may be magnetised and electrified, and that lines of magnetic force may be rendered luminous. "Motion, chemical affinity, heat, light, electricity, are convertible affections of matter," says Professor Grove.

What wonder is it that these natural mysteries should gradually discover themselves, if all that we call matter has only one origin, and that origin higher than its present state? If matter be only a system of degraded powers, tending to permanent equilibrium, but failing, at one time by excess and another by defect, wherever life is, light cannot be far off.

Light, life, and motion do surely tell of Eternity. And we cannot but begin to entertain the idea that all belonging to time and sense is only a coarse veil, spread between us and eternal beauties, which are ever nigh, and ever and anon sparkle through the coarse covering, impatient of the hour when the hand that wove the temporary veil shall rend it again and show clearly the hidden glory.

19.—In one closing word: the present creation seems to be only a parenthesis—a mere parenthesis. Now, all that is parenthetical finds its full meaning in the context, in that which went before, and in that which follows after it. A parenthesis is not without real sense, but it has not sense enough to stand alone. It is enclosed between the past and the future: we must look to the left, and also to the right, if we would understand.

Hence it is that angels above, saints below, and "they that shall be," have only one common hymn and song:—"Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which wert, and art, and art to come! Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they were and are created: heaven and earth are full of Thy glory: glory be to Thee, O Lord, Most High."

20.—I believe Christ Jesus, the Lord, to be the full, living image, house, form, and glory of God. I believe the universal church of faithful people to be the body of the Lord.

I believe the creation to be an appendage of the Church.

I believe that the Lord will be seen, glorified, in the Father.

I believe that the church will be seen, glorified, in the Lord.

I believe that all that now ministers to mortality will be swallowed up of life.

In this faith I desire to occupy and be occupied till the Lord shall come, and bring with Him the kingdom, the power, and the glory, which shall finally establish every where the supremacy of God. (1 Cor. xv.)

P. S.—It appears, there is preparing for publication, by the same writer, "HEPTALOGIA; OR, AN ATTEMPT TO ASCERTAIN SOME OF THE TRUTHS CONNECTED WITH THE REVEALED NUMBER OF GOD."

this wonderful gift to these last ages, the verity of which may be easily ascertained by a proper, orderly, and patient study of the treatises themselves, [when republished in a complete edition, with the accompanying works or hand books of Law and others, as proposed in the prospectus affixed to the end of this book, in order to their translation into the languages of the East, and of all nations, as an inseparable accompaniment to the holy scriptures]—we now proceed with the description of the remaining treatises.

(XII.)—CONSIDERATIONS upon E. S.'s BOOK of THE THREEFOLD STATE of MAN.

THE PREFACE is as follows :—

* * * You have sent me a little book, and desire my observations upon it. Truly, the writings you have of mine, may sufficiently discover the knowledge given to me, and convey to your understanding what I can say upon it ; but as it may serve to the honour of God, and the salvation of man, I shall give a brief summary answer, and refer you to my other writings, for your further consideration.

* * * * *
If a man would set the human mind eternally at rest, he must reveal the root out of which flesh and spirit hath its original. A man must open and show the centre of the Eternal, as also of the inceptive nature. Men will then apprehend the earthly and the heavenly Mystery, whereupon the Eternal Beginning and the Eternal End are ONE ; and so the Spirit of the Soul, having seen the entire wheel, is satisfied and at rest. [This I now propose to do, so far as the Lord shall permit.]

(XIII.)—An APOLOGY CONCERNING PERFECTION : Being a REFUTATION of certain Erroneous Explanations by E. S., of the following Four Texts of Scripture ; and Showing what is the Outward and Inward Perfection attainable in this Life.

Text I.—God created Man in His own Image.—Gen. i. 27.

— II.—Great is the Mystery of Godliness : God was manifest in the Flesh [first in Adam.] I Tim. iii. 16.

— III.—Thy Maker is thine Husband ; the Lord of Hosts is his Name ; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel ; the God of the whole Earth shall He be called.—Isaiah. liv. 5.

— IV.—As the Woman is of the Man, even so is the Man also by the Woman ; but All Things [out] of God.—I Cor. xi. 12.

THE PREFACE is as follows —

Courteous Reader, who lovest truth ! There is lately come into my hands a treatise, sent from good friends, who have entreated me to give my exposition of the four texts of Scripture professed to be explained therein. And seeing there are in that treatise some erroneous opinions that run contrary to the Holy Scriptures, and which are of great concern to the reader, I am willing to undertake the labour, and express the sense according to a right understanding.

Not that I would judge any man ; but for the sake of such as with earnestness seek the pearl of divine knowledge, I would clear up the understanding of those various points, that the hungering mind may be introduced into satisfaction and rest ; and so may have occasion to seek with greater earnestness the refreshment of this pearl, until we can attain the perfect enjoyment thereof, in the other life after this tabernacle.—II Cor. v. 1.

I will therefore set down the true ground of these doctrines, and leave it for the consideration of the lovers of divine knowledge.

(XIV.)—An APOLOGY CONCERNING the (Printed) BOOK of TRUE REPENTANCE and TRUE RESIGNATION, as also of the AURORA : being a Defence of those Treatises from the scurrilous Libels published against them in Latin, by G. R., primate of G.

(XV.)—MYSTERIUM MAGNUM ; before described.

(XVI.)—Of PREDESTINATION, or the ELECTION of GRACE ; that is, Of God's WILL towards MAN, commonly called Predestination. Showing how the Texts of Scripture are to be understood, which treat of Fallen Lost Adam, and of the New Birth from Christ, the Second Adam.

With an APPENDIX, being a COMPENDIUM of REPENTANCE, or a short Description of the Key which opens the Divine Mysteries, and leadeth to the Knowledge of them.

To which is superadded, A TABLE of the DIVINE REVELATION ; Showing how God perpetually Generateth and Breatheth forth Himself from Himself, and how He is to be considered in Nature according to the Three Principles ; with a brief Exposition of the Table.

 The chief hindrance that has kept good men from deciding theological differences, and understanding the sense of the Scriptures, hath been their confining themselves to such a train of thought as has withdrawn their attention away from those texts which are most material and necessary to be considered, concerning the WORD which is Christ and God: as it is written,—

In the Beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word, all things were made by it, and without it was nothing made that was made; in it was life, and the life was the light of men; also the light shineth in the darkness, though the darkness comprehend not the light; this is the true light which lighteneth every man coming into the world; it was in the world, and the world was made by it.

These texts are seldom pressed or considered, but those arguments that can be collected concerning the written word of God the holy Scriptures, and what they call the word preached in pulpits, are urged so much, that people are ready to understand the texts concerning the substantial Word of God, the Word of His power, the Word of prophecy, the Word in our hearts, also the creating Word, the Word of wisdom, the Word of life, as meaning the Scriptures only: and men are so violent as to account him heretical, that shall venture to question their opinion in his mind: thus partly the true understanding cometh to be veiled from people's eyes.

Some of the Learned, also, are very unwilling to take so much pains as to read and consider what is offered to them in this author, though some sincere lovers of good literature have, by reading him, found that which is more excellent than which they and others had spent their time in a long time together. But they account themselves filled so full with their present wisdom and knowledge, that they have no room to desire any other, especially that which cannot be attained without casting away the high esteem of that which they have laid up as a treasure to themselves already; and so every little difficulty of uncouth words or phrases and expressions, which they cannot presently see to agree with their former opinions, makes them loth to be troubled about that which they think themselves to have more and better knowledge of beforehand. Neither can they in reason be blamed, saying that they block up their own way to inestimable treasures which they know not of, and others not so learned, attain; yet which they might have in much greater abundance, if they would not suffer their learning to hinder, which itself would much more further them therein.

Another bar the Learned have is this, that they will not allow of reasoning and proving by similitudes, because such are not demonstrative logical proofs according to the requisites of that art. But he that was more than Solomon, our Saviour himself, chose to teach in similitudes the highest and most precious wisdom, hidden under such teaching. And if the writings of the holy prophets and apostles be examined, it will appear that there is not the least thing done in this world, but doth, by way of similitude, signify and teach to us some what of the most transcendent and richest mysteries of eternity. All visions which were the clearest revelations, were represented in something or other in part or in the whole, like that which is in this outward world; though the thing representing is but a shadow in respect of the inward substance that is resembled by it, as for instance Christ and faith is a substance,—and a rock is but a shadow; and the Holy Spirit, the Word, and God, and the Divine Nature is much more a substance, whilst the things in this world resembling them, are scarce so much as an exact shadow of them. So also the sun of righteousness, the city of God, the trees in the paradise of God, the fallow ground of our hearts, the grain of mustard-seed which the kingdom of heaven is represented by, and likened unto; a steward, a husbandman, a door, a vine, a sheepfold, a candle set upon a table, or put under a bushel, a seething pot with the scum rising up, a rose, a lily, briars, thistles, and thorns, the seven stars, the dragon, the woman, the candlesticks, the temple, the moon, rivers, fountains, fire, brimstone, &c., every of these denote unto us some mystery or other in the spiritual world, as will in time to come be manifested; which we could know nothing of, only by way of similitude, but it is the Spirit alone that teacheth the mystery by and from them. Neither can we apprehend the demonstration of that which we never saw, but by similitude in those things which the outward man hath seen or conceived; for our minds are opened, as the understanding of a child is in learning, and we must be as children to all our great knowledge before, or else we cannot be taught any new thing that is beyond our former reach, apprehension or capacity. But when the similitude is declared and weighed, the knowledge of the thing itself will be the more easy, and then the demonstration of it may be briefly and exactly made by such as are teachers in Christ's school, to scholars exercised in some degree in such spiritual matters: otherwise, that saying of our Saviour may well be applied to them, if ye believe not when I tell you earthly things, how shall ye believe if I tell you heavenly matters.

This may be a just plea for this Author's teaching the mysteries of eternity by examples and similitudes of natural earthly things. And in them he layeth open his ground of interpreting the holy Scriptures, by which men try the deepest questions and controversies in religion, that the seeming differences therein may be cleared and composed; that all may understand them rightly, all Christians, Jews, and Heathens, and so prize them as they ought. And in the following preface to this treatise, he sets down to this effect, that the supposition that God is only afar off in a heaven above and beyond the stars and firmament exclusively, and not in everything and everywhere present as to himself substantially and totally, with all that he is in essence in the Unity of the Deity, and Trinity of Manifestation in his whole kingdom power and glory, though as to the creature not discernable or perceptible, but by his Word revealing himself in and to the creature according to its kind,—is the only cause why men cannot satisfy themselves in that great secret arcanum of predestination, and other high and necessary mysteries mentioned in the Old and New Testament.

The Heathens would esteem the Scripture, if it were but hinted to them how they might consider that that which is mentioned and contained therein, (and of which it chiefly is appointed to testify,) is the same with that which is in their very hearts; they would rejoice to hear the lively demonstration and effects of that God and his graces, which lie as a deep fountain and well-spring hidden in their own souls; and so they would soon taste the eternal gospel of the love of God shed abroad in their hearts, upon reading of the holy Scripture, thus if shown how all lieth within them, in their hearts and souls.

The Jews, also, cannot be fully persuaded that Jesus Christ, whose name is Immanuel, is and was the true Messiah. Though they shall certainly be converted, as we Christians believe and long to see accomplished, yet they cannot perceive the truth, but by understanding how the promised seed was by God put into, or caused to sprout forth in the soul of Adam and Eve, after the eating of the forbidden fruit; and so became salvation to all men, continually taking effect in those who become the offspring of that seed, by forsaking their sins, and being obedient to that seed of God, the Word of life, the Word of promise, which is the Word of grace, the Word of God, the Commandment, his Law, his testimonies, his ways, statutes, precepts, judgments, which are so much pressed in Moses and in the Psalms of David; all which was Christ in them. As to which seed in the line of the covenant according to the manifestation in the flesh, Christ Jesus, their Messiah and our Saviour came, and took our nature born of Mary, and finished our redemption in a human soul, such an one as all ours is, (and wherefore he condescends so low as to call us his brethren, though in him dwelt the fullness of the Godhead bodily,) and so wrought and perfected our salvation: and all should in him be partaker of the divine nature, that were born again, and did grow up in him, that is, in his grace and covenant in their souls, and so he rule in them to the subduing the seed of the serpent, the lusts of the flesh in any whomsoever. And this is that light that enlighteneth every man, even every Heathen, Jew, and Christian, at the instant of taking the life of the soul in the womb, so coming into the fleshly substance of the elementary body of this world.

The Word of the Lord doth not contradict itself, neither in its operation in the works of the outward world, nor in the inward teachings of the Holy Spirit in the soul, nor in the written Word of the holy Scriptures,* which were written as holy men spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, which teacheth, nor can teach any other than what the holy Word speaks, from whence the Spirit proceeds. Therefore the essential Word is to be considered in every respect, before men be able to decide a deep controversy, question, or doubt in any matter fundamentally.—And we see that God's ordinance in the outward world, which we call Providence, doth in nature appoint what profession and condition of life every one shall have; and thereupon was Caiaphas high priest that year in which Christ was crucified, though he was inwardly a conspirer against Christ; and so was Judas appointed to be one of the apostles, though inwardly he was a devil; so king Saul was amongst the prophets, so also there are many false apostles gone into the world, and many false Christs, but the true ones are what they are in spirit and truth in the inward hid man of the heart. Therefore every one should labour to be that in spirit, mind, soul, and affection in his honest outward calling or office, low or high, which is right in the sight of God according to his Word and ordinance, which he is outwardly called unto; and not under pretence of the outward calling, think he is such without the Spirit, nor despise those who are such in spirit, though not in the outward calling at all. For most of the eminent prophets, and so of the apostles, disciples, evangelists, elders, bishops, overseers, or pastors, doctors or teachers, have not been called from the schools of the prophets, nor from among the learned or noble, though some of them have been so; and those were called of God as was Moses, Aaron, David, Peter, Paul, Timothy, Barnabas, &c.

And so were all those called who were the first inditers and penners of the books of the Old (and New) Testament, though there may be cause to think that the greatest part thereof was afterwards delivered to Esdras and his scribes from the angel of God, when it is considered that the most ancient manuscript copy of that Hebrew Bible which is now extant in print, was that which the Jews received from Esdras or Esra, at the return from the captivity of Babylon. [See Dr. F. Lee's "Dissertation."] For the whole book is continually written in the Caldee letter, though there be a difference in the style of several of the books, which the angel knew well how to express to a tittle. And certainly if Esdras and the rest with him had had the originals to transcribe them from, they would not have burnt or buried those hand-writings of the authors. And although the Samaritan Pentateuch be supposed to be the character wherein the five books of Moses were written, yet it cannot be the same for matter and words, because it differs in several places from the true Hebrew text, and in some places doth agree with the Septuagint Greek translation, and not with the Hebrew itself, which was the language Moses was supposed to write in, and the character the same with the Samaritan Pentateuch,—as is signified in an introduction to the several languages of the best and exactest impression of the Bible that ever was published in the world, which, about two hundred years ago, was produced by the labour of the most learned and knowing men in the Oriental languages, and most versed in the literal text of the Bible; wherein it appears that the same person whom the Hebrew calleth Esra, author of one of the books undoubtedly of the canon of the Bible, is translated in the Septuagint Greek, Esdras; and the book of Esra, in our English Bibles, is accounted the first book of Esra or Esdras; and the book of Nehemiah, the second book of Esra or Esdras; so that the Greek copy of the first and second book of Esdras in our Bibles, may rightly be accounted his third and fourth book; as it is in Luther's translation in the German Tongue. And thus as the law was ordained by angels in the hands of a mediator, which was Moses; so when it was lost, it was restored to Esdras again by the same means [II Esdras, xiv., from 20th verse]; which doth advance the excellency of the Old Testament beyond any other books before Christ's time for their manner of delivery, in addition to the spirit of prophecy, that filled both the first and last authors of the whole book, as a few of the matters spoken and written by them make manifest, which have been transmitted to us for our learning, by the infinite mercy and goodness of God.

For, we may observe, how that the inward substantial seed of the promise, the seed of God, was hidden and suppressed in the offspring of Adam and Eve, except only in the line of the covenant going along through the loins of many sinful parents, even to Mary, the mother of the Messiah, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was the Son of Adam, who was also the Son of God. But the seed continued under the evil life and conversation of the old world before the flood, though they had the preaching of Adam himself, and Abel, Seth, Enoch, Noah, and others. And after the deluge they were more depraved, though under the preaching of Noah, Shem, Heber, &c., till Abraham, to whom God did seal his covenant of promise with circumcision, for a stronger teaching to the outward man, observed by Isaac, Jacob, and his sons the twelve patriarchs, till Moses, who was raised up by God, and received a further external clear teaching, in the institution of the passover, as another seal of the covenant; also giving the law of the ten commandments, which the outward man had so darkened in the inward heart almost of every one, very few excepted; also the law of sacrifices and other ceremonies, with the judicial law for government of God's own people; and this dispensation remained all along amongst a wicked and stiff-necked generation in the world under the evangelical teachings of the prophets, till Christ himself. Under whose outward teaching, while he was upon the earth, men were so very wicked, that according to his own parable, when the lord sent his son to the vine-dressers, thinking they would have revered him, they said, this is the heir, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours; and so they did kill him, and cast him out of the vineyard. At this time, (as need did require) to help the outward man that the inward Word might grow in him, greater teaching was afforded than in the time of Moses or Solomon, he being then incarnate, viz., by the ministry of John the Baptist sealing his covenant by the baptism of water, and a little before Christ's death by his eating the passover with his disciples so instituting his last supper: and yet the apostles could not apprehend or remember what he told them, nor bear what he would have taught them before his death, not till the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, was sent after his ascension and glorification, which should bring to their remembrance whatsoever he had told them. And then this great manifestation of the power of God did so spring and spread, that many were converted by it, that were not prevailed with by the former teaching; and it reached unto Saul, who was also called Paul, and made an apostle of the highest mysteries to the Gentiles, all which were brought to his knowledge by the Holy Spirit, for he had never heard Christ's teaching as the other apostles had. And by his preaching, (from a philosophic knowledge of truth,) the Gentiles became Christians; but in the age following, the wickedness of Christians was like that of the Jews before, which had caused the ark of the testimony, the book of the law, their temple, city, and country, and every excellent thing they had to be taken away or destroyed; and so these Christians caused the powerful effects of the Holy Spirit to be withdrawn after the decease of the first preachers and faithful brethren, till at length thick darkness spread itself over all nations, and there was only left some of the holy men's writings contained in the old, and some in the new Testament, which were brought forth to light, and put together in a book, or as it is called THE BIBLE. The understanding of which writings therein was small in the following ages, except in those that suffered martyrdom, who did declare the power thereof by mighty wonders; and though afterward much teaching successively began to spring up, yet the Holy Scriptures were not so narrowly looked into and publicly divulged till Luther, who was helped forward by a little book called Theologia Germanica, and the sermons and works of Taulerus, compiled in the obscure times before him, and printed in the Latin tongue.

About that period Calvin, and many others arose, each in his own way prying still more into the letter of the Scripture, whereby divers questions became raised in divinity, which have not been fully decided and resolved to the satisfaction of the variously constituted differing parties, by the pains of all that have laboured in scholastic learning to this very day, nor indeed could be, without the knowledge of the ground of the truth. Yet of all the deep obscure mysteries expounded by this author, [as concerning the internal habitation and existence of the one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all and through all, and in all; filling all things in that manner as there is but one air which is the same breath of all living creatures; which is the unknown God whom the heathens ignorantly worshipped, and many Christians, as they call themselves, in these days, who know Him not to be within them, notwithstanding all his preaching by his Word in their hearts, and their reading of the Scripture, and the outward preaching from the written Word; the reason of which is, that his indwelling is not so pointedly, strenuously, and frequently pressed in our public preachings, as it ought to be:]—this of predestination is accounted the most mysterious in general, though there are some who, to the great comfort of their souls, have had most mysteries cleared to them in this author, and this amongst the rest in the treatise under review; which raiseth a hope in them, that the time is at hand wherein all the mysteries of God shall be manifested.

Now, though the Light be in all of our darkest hearts and souls, and shineth therein, yet if we take no heed and turn not to it, we cannot apprehend the light, or rather shall not be apprehended by it, nor will the day dawn, neither shall we have any morning in us, as the Hebrew text in Isaiah [viii. 20.] expresseth it; and then we cannot speak according to that Word which is the law and testimony,—not that which is written with ink, which endureth not for ever, but the real substance thereof in the fleshly tables of our hearts, written by the finger of God, when he created the soul at the first beginning of life in the womb. [Well, therefore, may one, a reader of this author, say of him, that he layeth down in every thing a kind of material divinity; and it is that which endureth for ever.]

He that mindeth this Innate Word of life will soon have a clear understanding of the Scriptures, and not only so, but at length attain what they themselves knew that spake and penned them; and more than that, for as the time of the world proceedeth further to its limit, that shall be understood of the eternal Word which neither the angels nor prophets, nor apostles knew, who saw what the angels desired to look into, and were not able. For the Word of God is the utmost that can ever be known possibly at all. By this the holy men knew what they knew, having it manifested to them in their hearts; and their knowledge hath been expressed by their words outwardly to the ears of people from the beginning of the world, and some of them wrote those things in books which have been preserved to us in the Bible, and have been or are being published in most languages, (as proposed to be done with the writings of this author, in demonstration of the eternal ground and truth of the former); so that every nation almost may now read in their mother tongue those writings of men full of the Holy Spirit, which, in them, proceeded from the Father and the Son, viz., Christ, whose name is called, The Word of God; and therefore those Scriptures may rightly be called, the written Word of God, as the words of those men may be called the Words of God, and their minds so instructed by the Divine wisdom and understanding, may be called the mind of God, or his thoughts, sense, and meaning. For they are not their own; but God himself, His will, mind, word, and spirit, His Light, wisdom, and understanding is manifested in theirs, and in all men who speak or write of such things truly and knowingly, and not stealing God's word every one from his neighbour; [Jer. xxiii. 30.] and It will be manifested in every one who is obedient and willing to be taught and enlightened by It into a holy life. For God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, in the soul of every one, and revealeth His secrets to his saints, the holy ones.

The Author's PREFACE to this Book "Of the Election of Grace," is as follows:—

1.—When reason hears any thing said concerning God, intimating what he is according to his being, essence, substance, and will, it imagines in itself as if God were some strange thing afar off, dwelling without and beyond the place of this world, aloft above the stars, and governed only by his spirit with an omnipotent power in the place of this world.

2.—But it supposes that his majesty in Trinity, wherein God is especially manifest, dwells in heaven, without and beyond the place of this world.

3.—And thereupon reason falls into a creaturely opinion, as if God were some strange thing, and that he did, before the time of the creation of the creatures and of this world, hold a consultation in himself in his trinity, by his wisdom, to contrive what he would make, and to what end every thing should serve, and so has framed a predestinate purpose in himself, what he would ordain every thing to be.

4.—Whence the contentious opinion is risen, of God's determination concerning man, as if God had in his purpose or predestination chosen one part of men for heaven, to be in his holy habitation, and appointed the other part to eternal damnation, in whom he will manifest his wrath; and that contrariwise in the other which are his chosen and elect he will manifest his grace,

5.—And so it is thought he has in his predestination made a separation, that he might shew his power both in love and anger: and therefore every thing must of necessity be as it is.

6.—That part ordained to wrath it is conceived are so reprobated and hardened by God's purpose and predestination, that there is no possibility left for them to attain the salvation of God, and on the contrary in the other there is no possibility of damnation.

7.—And though the Holy Scripture speaks almost the very same words, to which creaturely reason assents, which understands not at all what God is: yet Scripture, on the other side, speaks much more to the contrary: that God wills not evil, nor has purposely by way of predestination made any thing that is evil.

8.—Both these contraries, how they are to be understood each of them in its own ground, we will give to the Christian impartial readers, the seekers and lovers of the ground and of the truth, to unite and reconcile them, and establish the true understanding; I say we will give them a short explanation to consider of, and present our gift or talents (as it is apprehended and laid hold on in the grace of the highest good) for them to examine with a good intention.

9.—Not meaning thereby to contend against or despise any for their conceived opinion, but for a Christian and brotherly conjoining and uniting of our gifts which we have, bestowed upon any of us from the Divine grace.

10.—The branches and twigs of a tree appear not in all things like in form, and yet stand in one and the same stock, and one gives and introduces entity and virtue into the other, and all flourish and rejoice, blossom and bear fruit, in one stock, there being no grudging and dislike of their strength and dissimilitude: but each branch labours to bring forth its fruit and harvest.

11.—So it may also well be with our unlike differing gifts; if we introduce our desire into the right true mother, as into our stock, and each branch of the tree afford the other its virtue in good will.

12.—We must not bring ourselves into selfishness, and into our own lust of self-love, as going forth in pride, willing to be above our mother in whom we stand, and above all her children, and be a tree of our own.

13.—Neither are we to receive into us the devil's poison and venom or infection of self, and false or wicked magnetic impression, whence strife and opposition, also rents and schisms and divisions arise, so that one twig of the human tree rends and separates itself from the other, and affords them not his ens or being and virtue, and exclaims against them for schismatical, sectarian, apostate, false, and wicked.

14.—It sets itself, and is known as a broken separated twig before its brother in a false lustre or show: whence the multitude of contentions amongst men have risen.

15.—Of all which we will signify what the original of contention is, and from whence opinions and divisions naturally arise; we will also signify what the true ground of the only religion is.

16.—And we will shew from whence the opposition from the beginning of the world to this time has proceeded, for the better understanding of the Divine will, both according to love and anger; and how it is all fundamentally to be understood.

17.—And we admonish the loving reader to immerse himself in Divine humility into God and his fellow branch or brother; and so he may read and conceive our received deep sense and apprehension, and be brought from all error into the true rest, wherein all things rest in the Word and power of God. And we commend him into the working love in the ens or being of Christ, and our well intended will and desire into his. AMEN.

— XII.—A short Instruction concerning some Questions, which make Reason to err; according to which Reason supposes that God hardens Man out of a special predestinate purposed Will: and how they are to be understood.

— XIII.—A summary Conclusion to the whole.

APPENDIX.—A COMPENDIUM OF REPENTANCE, being a short Description of the Key which opens the Divine Mysteries, and leadeth to the Knowledge of them.

The Title of THE TABLE at the end is thus:—A SCHEME or TABLE of the DIVINE MANIFESTATION, with an EXPOSITION of the Threefold World (IN THREE DIVISIONS): Signifying what God is in himself, without Nature and Creature: and then how He is to be considered in Nature according to the Three Principles. Also what Heaven, Hell, the World, Time and Eternity are, together with all Creatures both Visible and Invisible; and out of what all Things are proceeded and spring forth.—[This Table is here expounded in brief according to the numbers; but in the preceding Treatise of Predestination, the matters are handled more at large, especially in the first Five Chapters. It is, as it were, the Sum of all the Author's writings; and as an A. B. C. to Beginners.]

The HEAD DIVISION of the Table, signifieth what God is, considered as without and beyond Nature and Creature; and what the Mysterium Magnum is: Showing how God, by his Breathing forth or Speaking hath introduced himself into Nature and Creature.—MIDDLE DIVISION: Here beginneth the Mysterium Magnum; viz., the Distinction in the Outbreathing, that is the Speaking of the Word: Wherein the Word, through the Wisdom becometh distinct, also Natural, Sensible, Perceptible, and Palpable or Inventible; whereby the two Eternal Principles, of God's Love and Anger, in Light and Darkness are understood.—BOTTOM DIVISION: Here beginneth the Outward visible World, viz. the Outspoken visible Word: Wherein (1.) Is understood the Good Life of the Creature which stands in the Quintessence. And (2.) The Poison, and Grossness of the Earth and Earthly Life. Afterwards followeth the Explanation of the Words and Numbers of the Table, showing how all is to be understood.

(XVII.)—Of CHRIST'S TESTAMENTS, BAPTISM, and The SUPPER. In Two Books.

First,—Of Holy Baptism, how it is to be understood in the Ground thereof, and why a Christian should be Baptised.

Secondly,—Of the Holy Supper of the Lord Christ; What it is, with the Benefits and Effects of it; and how the same may be worthily participated of.

And how they are to be understood, both according to the Old and New Testament, set forth from the true Theosophical Ground, through the Three Principles of the Divine Revelation, and presented to the Children of God, for the Information of their Understandings.

NOTE.—These two little pieces entitled together by the author "The Book of the Two Testaments," (the one of Baptism, the other of the Supper,) handle those two grand mysteries more fundamentally and plainly than any book extant: clearly satisfying all doubts, and putting an end to the different opinions concerning each of them, whereby to conjoin all the Disputants and Separatists together,—those that are called Anabaptists and those that are called Pædobaptists; those that baptise persons of age upon confession of their faith, and those that baptise infants without witnesses to stand for them. This treatise also reconcileth the differences of opinion about transubstantiation, consubstantiation, and the participation of mere bread and wine; and sheweth how to understand the right participation of the real flesh and blood of Christ under bread and wine. And inasmuch as there is real participation to be had of the flesh and blood of Christ without bread and wine, it sheweth why the bread and wine was so instituted to be celebrated and communicated; and so likewise seeing the baptism of the Holy Ghost hath been many times without water, why the baptism of water is necessary to be used, even to those that had before received the Holy Ghost as well as the apostles.

All which, being understood, there will moreover appear what the ground of the preaching of the Word of God is, as it is an ordinance of God; and how we shall truly perceive what is the essence of all ordinances as they are so called, (which in the signification of the word is no more but a thing ordained or appointed,) and so it will be easy to perceive how far short Christians do come, of rightly esteeming the true ordinances, and how forward they are in taking that for such which is not indeed the ordinance of God. * * * But, indeed, we must know God before we can know his ordinances; and to know him, we must seek him. Many have sought God, but they have not found him, because they sought him not in the right way and place: they look to find God outwardly, indeed anywhere but where he is, namely, in the centre of their souls: he that cannot find him there, shall never find him, for that is the only place of His revelation. * * * Would that men were diligent to seek after the experience of spiritual things, then God, who dwells within their hearts, would feel and hear their desires, and breathe forth his Holy Spirit, and satisfy their hungering desires with Divine gifts, filling their minds and understandings with light and knowledge of all His mysteries.

We want nothing but the unceasing exercise of the spirit of prayer, whereby to stir up the gifts and graces of God's Holy Spirit who *dwell*eth in us, (N.B.) till He flow forth in us with all His gifts ~~as we desire~~ which we at present suppose unattainable.

The Author's INTRODUCTION is as follows :—

All strife and misunderstanding concerning Christ's person, office and being or substance, as also concerning his testaments which he left behind him, wherein he worketh presentially, ariseth from the defected creaturely reason, which runneth on only in an image-like opinion, and reacheth not the ground of this mystery, and yet will be a mistress of all things or beings, will judge all things, and doth but lose itself in such image-likeness, and breaketh itself off from its centre, and disperseth the thoughts, and runneth on in the multiplicity, whereby its ground is confused, the mind disquieted, and knoweth not itself.

2.—No life can stand in certainty, except it continue in its centre, out of which it is sprung.

3.—Seeing then the soul is sprung from God's Word and will, and yet is entered into its own lust and desire to will of itself; in such searching of self willing, it cannot reach its first ground from whence it is sprung, and thereupon it runneth without its ground in mere uncertainty, till it return to its original again.

[Otherwise expressed. (a.) In their confusion and running out into the multiplicity, the thoughts break themselves off from their chaos, viz. from the eternal Word of God, and from the eternal Divine speaking. In which spoken Word, all beings, together with understanding, reason, and thoughts consist, and take their ground and beginning from it.

(b.) For if the abyssal, non-natural, uncreaturely God, viz. the eternal ONE, speak his Word no more, and that Speaking should cease, there would be no understanding, reason, or thoughts more, also no Nature nor Creature, and all beings would be an eternal Nothing: for every life ariseth from the exhalation of the eternal ONE, viz. from the Abyss; and there could be no formability in the eternal ONE, according to which or out of which something might be made.

(c.) For if there be a formability to a figure, then there must also have been a cause from whence the form were arisen, and God were not ONE Only God, who were without ground, time, and place, for all that hath a beginning hath a ground; but that which hath no beginning is without ground and form.]

4.—Every beginning goeth out of the eternal ONE, viz. out of the tri-unity of God, through the exhalation or speaking of the UNITY of God. As a fountain floweth from its original, through which flowing forth, the unity bringeth itself into self-viewing findingness and perceptibility, to the forming and imaging of itself. Every visible and invisible being, both spiritual and corporeal, have taken their original in the exhalation of the Divine power, and are a reflection of the separable will of God, and stand with their ground therein. For the beginning of every being is nothing else but an imagination of the out-flowing will of God, which hath brought itself into separability, formedness and image-likeness; wherein lieth the whole creation: and every life doth consist in its re-exhalation and reflexion in same manner.

5.—Seeing then that the human life is an out-flowing and reflexion of the Divine power, understanding and skill, therefore the same ought to continue in its original, or else it loseth the divine knowledge, power and skill, and with self-speculation bringeth itself into centres of its own, and strange imaging, wherewith its original becometh darkened and strange.

6.—As is to be known by erroneous reason, which ever teacheth concerning God, and yet hath no true understanding; also it never cometh to rest whiles it runneth on in strange imaging.

7.—Therefore say I, that this is the only cause that men dispute and strive about God, his word, essence, or being and will; that the understanding of man hath broken itself off from its original, and now runneth on in mere self-will, thoughts, and images in its own lust to selfishness, and imagineth to itself another ground to the Divine willing, wherein yet there is no true knowledge, nor can be, so long till the life returneth into its original, viz. into the Divine outflowing and will.

8.—And if this be done, then God's will speaketh forth the Divine power and wonders again through the human willing. In which Divine speaking the life may know and comprehend God's will, and frame itself therein. Then there is true divine knowledge and understanding in man's skill, when his skill is continually renewed with divine power, and when divine skill presseth forth through the life, in that kind and manner as in the beginning it did flow forth from the divine power and skill.

9.—As Christ hath taught us, when he saith, unless ye be converted and become as a child, ye shall not come into the kingdom of God. That is, that the life turn itself again into God out of whom it is proceeded, and forsake all its own imaging and lust, and so it cometh to the divine vision again.

10.—All strife about the Divine will and being or essence, whereby men despise one another, cometh from self image-likeness, that one man comprehendeth the image of another, viz., his thoughts, and yet cannot rightly apprehend them. Where one man sets himself in the thought and mind of another, and bringeth that which is his own thereinto, and compelleth that which is another's into his meaning, and forcibly sets himself aloft in the thoughts and mind of another, and holdeth them for his proper own, and will make a show therewith, and therewith domineer in and over the thoughts and mind of others: men must worship and reverence his thoughts and mind, and hold them to be the Word of God, or the speaking of God.

11.—Thus man deludeth himself, and robbeth God of his honour, taketh his covenant in his mouth, and yet hateth the nurture of the Spirit of God, which therefore reproveth him in his conscience, that he is but an apostate Lucifer, and will compel others into his image, that they shall hold it for the Word of God.

12.—But a true man inclineth himself to his original, and forsaketh all images, and desireth no self imageability of his understanding, except what God will frame and speak with and through him; and despiseth none, but only distinguisheth the true from the false, the good from the evil, and teacheth the truth with divine powerful out-flowing and will.

13.—All disputation concerning God's being or essence and will, is performed in the images of the senses or thoughts without God : for if any liveth in God, and willeth with God, what needeth he dispute about God, who or what God is?

14.—But that he disputeth about it, is a sign, that he hath never felt it at all in his mind or senses, and it is not given to him that God is in him, and willeth what he will. It is a certain sign that he will exalt his own meaning and image above others, and that he desireth the dominion.

15.—Men should friendly confer together, and offer one another their gifts and knowledge in love, and try things one with another, and hold that which is best, 1 Thes. v. 21. And friendly instruct one another, and not so stand in their own opinion as if they could not err, seeing we have a mighty enemy against us, who suddenly bringeth strange images into man's thoughts, and maketh men insult : whence sects and schisms originate, viz : from SELFHOOD, [though God makes the weakness as well as the wickedness of man to show forth his glory.]

16.—It lieth in no man's person that men should suppose that the divine understanding must come only from such and such : for the Scripture saith, Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good, 1 Thes. v. 21.

17.—The touchstone to this knowledge, is, first, the corner-stone Christ ; that men should see whether a thing enter out of love into love, or whether alone purely the love of God be sought and desired ; whether it be done out of humility or pride. Secondly, whether it be according to the holy scripture of the Bible. Thirdly, is it according to the human heart and soul, wherein the book of the life of God is incorporated, and may very well be read by the children of God : where then the true mind hath its touch-stone in itself, and can distinguish all things : if it be so that the Holy Ghost dwell in the ground of the mind, that man hath touchstone enough, that will lead him into all truth.

18.—Christ's testaments are a secret mystery, and are proffered to the minds and thoughts that are departed from and come again to God, where the life bringeth itself to God again, and so will the thoughts that return to God be first fed with Divine power and understanding. The same afterwards kindle the life, that it hungereth after God ; to which afterwards is given Christ's flesh and blood for a pledge and seal, and the Divine essence or substance will be imprinted therein ; whence the life is brought again into its original, viz., into God's power and Word.

19.—A false thought or mind of man is nourished again by its likeness, viz., from its own conjecture, or from highness of mind, or from the subtlety of the serpent : and these it desireth to exalt, and put into an image ; and that image is a branch on the tree of Satan.

20.—Now that man which is fed from the Divine power and spirit in his mind and thoughts, he is divinely-minded, and bringeth forth good things out of his good heart ; but that man who is fed in his thoughts from the power and will of the flesh, he is fleshly-minded only.

21.—When reason considereth of Christ's Testaments, and thinketh and considereth how yet Christ can be present in his testaments, then it thinketh it is done after an image-like manner. And when it knoweth that it is not done in an image like manner, then it falleth quite from that, and thinketh He is present only in remembrance : as when his word is preached, then he worketh thus only in the same powerfully ; and so it thinketh also concerning his testaments, that Christ worketh only spiritually in the faith, and that the testaments are only signs or symbols, whereby we should instruct ourselves what he hath done for us, and therewith only declare his death, and the shedding of his blood, and should keep it in lively remembrance, to our comfort.

22.—Thus reason understandeth nothing at all of the kingdom of Christ, much less of his person or of his office : and in that respect men dispute and strive about it, and will needs attain it with the searching of reason ; all this attaineth not the true understanding : for Christ's testaments are heavenly, and reason is earthly and worldly ; it seeketh Christ in the time [for that which is temporary] and if it find him not therein according to their power, then it supposeth he is present only to the thoughts, which cast themselves up to him in heaven ; but this will not renew the life, and bring it into God again : it will not make the new birth.

23.—All strife cometh from hence, that men do not understand that heaven wherein Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, that he is in this world, and that the world standeth in heaven, and heaven in the world, and are in one another, as day and night.

24.—The inward ground of the Word, out of which the four elements are sprung, is the heaven, viz : a spiritual world : in that inward power Christ ruleth, true God and man, through the outward world ; for where Christ saith, Matth. xxviii. 18, 20, all power is given to me in heaven and on earth ; also, I am with you always till the end of the world ; also, He shall rule over all his enemies till all his enemies are laid under him as a footstool, 1 Cor. xv. 25 ; Psal. cx. 1. This is to be understood of his inward kingdom, where in the inward power he ruleth over the outward earthly, and also the hellish.

25.—For the outward world is sprung out of the inward spiritual world, viz., out of light and darkness ; which fabric before the office of Christ stood in the eternal Creator's office, who from eternity hath wrought [or effected] light and darkness, viz : the spiritual world ; which fabric is flown forth and become visible, and brought by God into a creation, wherein light and darkness, viz., good and evil, rule one with another : where is understood hell and pain in the flowing forth of the eternal darkness, and the light of nature in the flowing forth of the light ; and in that where evil and good ruleth alike, is understood the kingdom of nature, with hot and cold, and all other properties.

26.—This dominion hath God given to the office of Christ, that he being both true God and man, should rule over all the propriety and self-willing of this kingdom, where evil and good rule one in another. As the sun in the visible world ruleth over evil and good, and with its light and power, and all whatsoever itself is, is present every where, and penetrates into every being, and yet in its image-like form doth not pluck away to itself with its efflux, but wholly giveth itself into every being, and yet ever remaineth whole, and nothing of its being goeth away therewith ; thus also it is to be understood concerning Christ's person and office ; which ruleth in the inward spiritual world visibly, and in the outward world invisibly, and thoroughly penetrateth the faithful man's soul, spirit, and heart. And as fire gloweth through the iron, and as the sun worketh through and through an herb, so that the herb becometh solar, [or filled with the virtue of the sun, and, as it were, so converted by the sun that it becometh wholly of the nature of the sun] so

Christ ruleth in the resigned will in soul and body, over all evil inclinations, over Satan's introduced lust, and generateth the man to be a new heavenly creature, and wholly floweth with itself into him, both as to divine and human power, so that the faithful man becometh a right branch on his vine, in which God and man (as to that same inward new birth) dwelleth.

27.—Now herein consist the Testaments of Christ, that he offereth himself to the faith, that he will give it his flesh and blood, and all grace, and spiritually dwell in man, as the sun dwelleth in the plant, and maketh the fruit ripe and tender.

28.—So in like manner is the poor fallen earthly man, which perished in soul and body, again renewed, and wrought out to be a heavenly fruit; where, in the end, only the grossness of the flesh falleth from him, and the spirit together with the soul remaineth in Christ: and also here in this life according to this indwelling power, he dwelleth in heaven; concerning which St. Paul saith, Our conversation is in heaven, Phil. iii. 20. But the body is in the world, and of the world's essence; and now as the heaven penetrateth the world, and giveth it virtue and power; so also Christ thoroughly penetrateth the outward man with his inward ruling power, and resisteth the vain lust of the earthly nature.

29.—THEREFORE say I, none understand any thing of God, EXCEPT GOD WORK IT IN HIS MIND AND THOUGHTS: for all natural knowledge is outward in the world, and ariseth from its astrum, and runneth on in surmisings, doubting whether a thing be so or no; but the spirit of God assureth in the soul and spirit of his faithful, and witnesseth in them that they are God's children, Rom. viii. 16.

30.—Now how this present essential participation is effected, and what the covenant of grace between God and man is, both of the Old and New Testament: what BAPTISM and THE SUPPER of Christ are, shall be declared in the following chapters.

31.—THIS GROUND IS ONLY THEREFORE BROUGHT FORTH SO DEEPLY, THAT ALL THAT STRIVE ABOUT IT MIGHT SEE THE TRUE INWARD GROUND, AND CEASE FROM STRIFE, AND YIELD THEMSELVES INTO THE SIMPLICITY AND LOVE OF JESUS CHRIST. Whereby then suddenly the power of Satan will be diminished, and all people and nations will see that the Christians are the children of God, if they thus walk in love.

THE CONTENTS are as follows:—

OF HOLY BAPTISM.

Chap. I.—The above Preface.

II.—Of the Covenant of God after the Fall: what the Fall of Man is, and how God hath bound himself in Covenant with him again. What the Circumcision in the Old Testament is, and what the Baptism in the New.

III.—A Brief and more Fundamental Information, how Man is Baptised by the Holy Ghost, with Christ's Sufferings, Death, and Resurrection, in Body and Soul.

IV.—Of the outward Water-Baptism by Man's Hand: who is worthy to perform such Baptism, and what Baptised Infant doth worthily receive this Baptism, how it goeth with the unworthy Hand, as also with the unworthy Baptised Infant, [sponsors who are faithless and prayerless.]

OF THE HOLY SUPPER.

The Author prefaces this Part with the following intimation to the reader:—

Though indeed I here dive and search sublimely and deep, and set it down very clearly, yet the reader must be told thus much, that without the Spirit of God it will be a mystery to him, and not apprehended. Therefore let every one look well to it, what he judgeth, that he fall not into the judgment of God, and be captivated by his own turba, and that his own reason distract him: this I say, meaning well, and give it to the reader to ponder.

Chap. I.—Of the Ground of the Old Testament; how this Testament was clearly in the Type among the Jews.

II.—Of the Supper of the New Testament, how the Type is come into Essence or Substance.

III.—How the Disciples of Christ have eaten and drunk Christ's Flesh and Blood: and how that is properly to be understood.

IV.—Of the Difference in the Participation of it, what the Wicked receive by this Testament: and how a man should rightly prepare himself for it, that he may be truly worthy.

V.—Of the Contention and Strife among the Learned about Christ's Testaments: how that Strife is a vain and very hurtful Thing, and ariseth (however plausibly covered) in the Anger of God, from the Devil's Desire and Will; whereby all brotherly Love and Unity is destroyed, the highly-precious Name of God Blasphemed, and the Holy Ghost in his Divine Wonders is Judged, and becomes despised by Reason.

(XVIII).—THE WAY to CHRIST, DISCOVERED; CONSISTING of THE FOLLOWING SIX TREATISES:—

(a.) Of TRUE REGENERATION: Being an INTRODUCTION to GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY.

The Author's PREFACE [to the following treatises,] is as follows:—

Though I have in my other writings set down a clear description of Regeneration, or the New Birth, from the ground thereof, yet because every one hath them not, neither hath every one the capacity to understand them, I have therefore, as a service to the simple children of Christ, here set down a short sum of the whole theory of practical Christianity.

But if any desire to search the deep ground from whence all floweth, and have the gift to understand it, let him read these books following:

I.—THE THREE PRINCIPLES of the DIVINE ESSENCE.

II.—THE THREEFOLD LIFE of MAN.

III.—The FORTY QUESTIONS of the ORIGINAL ESSENCE, SUBSTANCE, NATURE, and PROPERTY of the SOUL.

IV.—The INCARNATION and BIRTH of JESUS CHRIST the SON of GOD: also of His SUFFERING, DEATH, and RESURRECTION.

V.—The SIX POINTS, treating of the Three Worlds, how they are in one another as one, and yet make Three Principles, viz. Three Births or Centres.

VI.—The MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, which is a fundamental Interpretation upon Genesis.

And in them he shall find all that he can ask, and that as deep as the mind of man is able to reach.—I have written this for the true Israelites, that is, for the hungry and thirsty hearts that long after the fountain of Christ, who are my fellow-members in the spirit of Christ; but not for the Ishmaelites and scorners. For they have a book within them, wherewith they vex, persecute, and suppress the children of Christ that are under the cross; and yet, though it be against their wills, they must be servants to the children of Christ, though indeed they do not yet understand so much.

The CONTENTS are these :—

Chap. I.—How a Man ought to consider himself.

— II.—How Man is created.

— III.—Of the miserable Fall of Man, and how he is Delivered again.

— IV.—How we are Born anew, and also how we fall into the Wrath of God again.

— V.—How a Man may call himself a Christian, and how not.

— VI.—Of right and wrong going to Church, receiving of Sacraments and Absolution.

— VII.—Of unprofitable Opinions and Contention about the Letter.

— VIII.—Wherein Christian Religion consists, and how Men must serve God and their Brethren.

(b.)—Of TRUE REPENTANCE: Showing how Man should stir up Himself in Mind and Will, and what his Consideration and Earnest Purpose should be.

✎ This practical Treatise, with the following and preceding tracts, were the only writings of the author published during his life-time, the rest of his works being handed about in MS. only.

The Author's PREFACE is as follows :—

Dear Reader, if thou wilt use this book aright, and art in good earnest, thou shalt certainly find the benefit thereof. But I desire thou mayest be warned, if thou art not in earnest, not to meddle with the precious names of GOD, in and by which the most High Holiness is invoked, moved, and powerfully desired, lest they kindle the anger of God in thy soul. For we must not abuse the holy names of GOD. This little book is only for those who would fain repent, and are in a desire to begin: Such will find what manner of words are therein, and whence they are born. Be thou herewith commended to the eternal goodness and mercy of God.

THE CONTENTS are these :—

Particular I.—How Man must Stir up himself in Mind and Will, and what his Consideration and Earnest Purpose must be, when he will perform powerful and Effectual Repentance; and with what Mind he must appear before God, when he would ask, so as to obtain Remission of Sins.

— II.—The Process of Repentance, or Way to Conversion; showing what Course a Man shall take who findeth in himself, by the former or any other Consideration with which his Mind and Conscience shall have been pierced, a Hunger or Desire to Repent, and yet feeleth no true sufficient Sorrow for his Sins.

— III.—A Short Formula of Confession before the Face of God; wherein is personified a poor Soul agonising for Pardon, night and day Wrestling, Groaning, and Struggling into the Divine Liberty, or Principle of Light and Love. Every Seeker according to his Call and Necessity may order or enlarge this Confession as the Holy Ghost shall secretly teach him. What is here set down is only a short Direction.

— IV.—Concerning what transpireth in the Deep of such a Soul; and how many draw back and perish in such a Beginning, as young Grafts broken off with the Wind, or withered by the Heat, for want of Perseverance in that tremendous Conflict with the Powers of Darkness. How the Soul must never give up the Battle, for it cannot be crowned, unless it both fight and overcome in the Storm.

— V.—A Short Direction how the poor Soul must come before God again, and how it must wrestle on for the noble Garland; what kind of Weapons it must use, if it will go to combat against the Wrath of God, against the Devil, the World, and Sin, against Flesh and Blood, against the influence of the Stars and Elements, and all its other Enemies; and what Earnestness is required in all this.

— VI.—A Form of Prayer, showing after what Manner the poor seeking Soul must pray: though the Holy Ghost formeth and frameth the Prayer for the Soul in every heart that intends to Conquer.

— VII.—A little Direction for the Soul that has been earnest without Intermission, how it must meet its Beloved when she knocketh in its Centre, or most inward Shut Chamber. Of the exceeding joyous and lovely Garland with which the Soul that has been Constant is Crowned. How she rises into a new Nature and a new World. How the "incorruptible Seed" is become a new-born Jesus or Son of God, in conscious fellowship with the ever-blessed Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost. The Baptism of Jordan.

— VIII.—An Intimation of the several Kinds of Trials that await the new-born Soul, how she shall endure Temptation, and all kinds of Opprobrium, as an enthusiast, a man beside himself, a fool, a dreamer, a mystic idiot; how thereby she must go through the whole earthly Process of Christ under his Cross.

— IX.—A Form of very Earnest Prayer in Temptation for the Soul who is now brought into the Wilderness, as the Beginning of the severe Proba. When Temptation cometh to the Soul, and besiegeth it, how the Soul must valiantly stand out its Forty Days' Conflict with the Devil, and overcome with its Champion Christ.

— X.—Short Ejaculations when the noble SOPHIA or Eternal Wisdom embraceth the Soul, and offereth her Love to it.

— XI.—A Form or Model of Prayer for obtaining the Divine Working, Protection, and Government; showing also, how the Mind should work with and in God in Christ, the Tree of Life.

— XII.—A Form of Prayer for a Soul in Tribulation under the Cross of Christ, when it is assaulted by its outward Enemies, who persecute, slander, and reproach it.

ADDENDA,—representing a Chaste and Amorous Colloquy between the Soul and the noble Virgin SOPHIA (or Spirit of Christ in the New Birth, out of His Humanity in us); representing how great a Joy there is in the Heaven of the new Regenerate Man, and how lovingly and graciously the noble SOPHIA presenteth herself to her Bridegroom the Soul, and how the Soul behaveth itself towards her when she appeareth to it.—But this can be understood by none but the Children of Christ, who have known it by Experience, with whom the Spirit “witnesseth with their Spirits that they are Children of God.”

Further, A Short Description how it is when the Bride thus embraceth the Bridegroom; for the Consideration of the Reader, who may not yet have been in this Nuptial Chamber. It may be he will be desirous to ~~be conversant~~ enter into the inner Choir where the Soul joineth Hands and jubilates with SOPHIA or the Divine Wisdom. Then he will understand well enough what is here written; otherwise it will appear all enthusiasm and delusion.—To which are added Sundry Occasional Prayers.*

(c).—Of TEMPTATION, a TREATISE of the FOUR COMPLEXIONS : Wherein are afforded Consolatory Instructions for a Sad and Assaulted Heart, in the time of Temptation: Showing, also, whence Sadness naturally ariseth, and how the Assaulting happeneth. The whole confirmed by several Pertinent and Comfortable Texts.

NOTE.—This useful and instructive treatise of consolation in time of temptation, very properly follows the preceding tract, the Rudiments of Theosophy. For as the foundation of Christianity there taught is laid in so deep and earnest an exercise of repentance, as shakes the soul of the natural man to the very bottom, and by that concussion stirs up and brings to his view the foul dregs of corruption that have hitherto lain there undisturbed ever since he came to the years of reason; so the horror of this sight, together with the painful sense of guilt and misery consequent upon it, which the author calls the judgment of the soul or conscience, proves a very severe trial to the young soldier of Christ, at his first entrance upon the warfare. And in some instances it is a long as well as a sharp process; for it may continue on a man many years, as stated in the previous Book of Repentance, if he doth not earnestly and speedily put on the armour of Christ. This is a very deplorable condition indeed: but in no subjects does it occur so predominantly as in souls environed with the melancholy complexion; especially if they have defiled themselves with much gross sin, or taken up erroneous conceits of their having been reprobated by God, or of having out-sinned their day of grace.

This extremity of spiritual distress, of which none can know or conceive the poignant anguish and bitterness who have not in some degree felt the same, has here a friendly relief. Every information is communicated, every advice given, and every consolation administered, which the unhappy case can well require or admit, short of the immediate vital operation of the great Physician of Souls and only sufficient Comforter himself, to whose joyful entrance into the afflicted soul the way is here opened and cleared, by the removal of all these doubts and fears which arise from the soul's ignorance of its own true nature and essence, and of its necessary subjection during its abode in the body, to the influence of the astral powers and its natural complexion. This beneficial knowledge is in the following little tract fundamentally, though briefly, afforded: and that from so divine a ground, and with so satisfactory a fullness of conviction, as to leave no doubt of either its truth or worth.

SECTION I.

Concerning the Four Complexions, or Constitutional Dispositions of Man's Animal Nature, and their various manifold Combinations in one Person after this, and in another after that Manner.

Chap. I.—Of the Cause of Spiritual Trouble, Sadness, and Fear. Also, what such Perturbations, Anxiety, and Fear are; and whence they arise.

SECTION II.

Of the Four Complexions severally, with their respective Properties; what the Soul and the whole Man doth, and how they are driven, when the Soul kindleth its Fire-Life merely from the Complexion, and the Astral Influences.

— I.—Of the Temptations peculiar to the Choleric Complexion; that is, where it predominates, for all the others are there also, though in lesser and various Degrees.

— II.—Of the Temptations peculiar to the Sanguine Complexion.

— III.—Of the Temptations peculiar to the Phlegmatic Complexion.

— IV.—Of the Melancholy Complexion; that is, where it chiefly predominates; what are its peculiar Temptations.

SECTION III.

Containing Instructions suited for every Temptation in which the Soul may find herself. An Information for all Complexions.

* This Tract of the “Way to Christ,” it is believed, is the source from which the early Moravians, directly or indirectly, derived their “evangelical” Principles, which they or their successors worked out so enthusiastically.—The following piece on “Resignation,” premonishes, with surprising exactness, the very evils they unconsciously fell into. [See “Rimius,” “Lavington,” etc.]

I.—Showing how to deal with the Prince of Darkness when he tempteth the poor Soul to Despair.

II.—Showing how to consider and overcome Temptation arising from the Astral Influences and other Sources : to be well apprehended.—Of Patience, Meekness, Resignation, Faith, and the Yoke or Cross of Christ.

SECTION IV.

Concluding with brief Advices to Souls under all the Complexions severally, making, with what goeth before and followeth, an universal Mirror or Looking-glass, wherein every one may see himself. It is written just as it was represented or set forth, out of the Light of God's Grace, to the Eyes of the Author's Understanding in the Spirit.

I.—Containing Advices and Directions for a Soul environed with the Melancholy Complexion, or where it predominates strongly. How to find out the Centre of Nature ; the Knowledge of which is the greatest Treasure in the World.

II.—Containing Brief Advices to Souls under the Predominance of the Choleric Complexion.

III.—Containing Brief Advices to Souls environed predominantly with the Sanguine Complexion.

IV.—Containing Brief Advices to Souls chiefly under the Phlegmatic Complexion.

(C).—Of TRUE RESIGNATION ; Showing how a Converted Man must daily and hourly Die to his Own Will in Self ; how he must bring his Desire into God, and what he should ask and desire of God. Likewise, how he must continually Spring up out of the Dying Sinful Man, with a New Mind and Will through the Spirit of Christ. Also what the Old and New Man are, and what each of them is in Life, Will, and Practice.

THE CONTENTS are as follows :—

Chap. I.—[Of the necessity of Self-Denial, Living by Rule, Early Rising, Study of the Holy Scriptures de genibus, Communion with God's People, Spiritual Diligence in all the Means of Grace, and Activity in Good Works, Purity of Intention, Simplicity, Watchfulness, Humility, Silence, and Attention to the Presence of God in the Soul, Dying to Self, and Continual Prayer, to newly-regenerate Souls, in order to Growth in Grace, and by Reason of the great Dangers and Temptations that beset them :] how many lose their first Illumination, and thereupon become Backsliders, falling again under the Dominion of Self and Reason, and how they thereby deceive themselves and others.

II.—How the Soul must perpetually Sink down, by Faith and Prayer, from all the inward Motions of Self, into the most a/ject Nothingness, totally Resigning Itself in Pure Love to God ; that so the SPIRIT OF GOD only may be its Willing, its Knowing, and its ALL.

III.—Some further Observations upon the Subject, and of the necessity of Continual earnest Prayer in the daily Christian Course.

(6).—Of the SUPERSENSUAL or DIVINE LIFE : a Treatise of the High Privileges of Believers. Wherein is shown how the Soul may attain to Divine Contemplation, and what its Childship in the Natural and Super-natural Life is, and how it passeth out of Nature into God, and out of God into Self again.—Wherein is Discoursed of Purity of Will, of Naked Faith, of Absolute Resignation and Death to Self, and of Perfect Love or Oneness with Christ and God.

THE PARTICULARS are these :—

Section I.—Of the Supersensual or Divine Life.—How the Regenerate Soul should press forward in unceasing Prayer, Self-denial, Mortification, and Faith, to the attainment of the great Salvation of God, and so become capable of all manner of Divine Sensations and Communications.

II.—Of Divine Wisdom. How a Man may and should rule over all Creatures, namely, from the Inward Ground of Nature, the Super-imaginary or Intellectual Life, out of which all Creatures are and were created ; wherein nothing can hurt him, for he is like all things, and nothing is unlike him. And showing the Way or Means to arrive at this Heavenly Understanding and Sovereignty, at this Sight of all Things in God, at this pure and naked Knowledge, which is abstracted from the Senses ; at this Participation of the Divine Wisdom, which oversees all Things and governs through all Beings, without being affected or captivated by any Thing : viz. by PURITY of Heart, which consists in putting off the Ferine Investiture, and in the Resigning of the Will and Life wholly up to Christ. When this Total Surrender shall have been made (which can only be done in the earnest exercise of Faith and Prayer), then commences the true Abyssal Quiet of the Soul. With the Body such a Man is in the World as in the Properties of outward Nature ; with his Reason, he is under the Cross of Christ ; and with his Will he is at the End, or, in other words, the Beginning from whence All proceeded, and to which all return. Thus he beholds all things outwardly with Reason, and inwardly with the Mind ; as Christ did when upon Earth.

III.—Of Divine Power. Showing how to Live above the World in the highest Sense of Christianity, and to subsist in all Temptations, and be but the brighter for them, viz : All Things being possible to Faith, the devoted Soul should every day and hour, if possible, cast itself beyond all Creatures, Sensual Perception, Discourse, and Reasoning, into the Abyssal Mercy of God in Christ : for if the Will could so break off itself (were it but for one Hour, or even for one Half-hour) from all Creatures, plunging itself by Faith into that NOTHING (and ALL), which is God himself, and there attend his Will in the Patience of Hope, and the Silence of Love, it would presently be penetrated with the Divine Glory, and become possessed of Strength to do all Things ; yea, far more than Words can describe.

IV.—Of the Total Annihilation of Self or Selfhood, and of the Virtue, Power, Height, Greatness, and Glory of DIVINE LOVE. Wherein are described by many ravishing Particulars, the Operations of LOVE in the Origin, Support, and Government of Nature and Creature, and in its more attractive Endearments with respect to Intellectual Beings.

Concluding with some Practical Instructions upon the several Parts of the above Discourses ;

describing and setting forth (but which, however, can only be understood by experience,) the manner of Passing the Gulph which divides betwixt the Two Principles or States of Light and Darkness. And it is particularly shown how this Transaction is carried on in the Soul; what the Firmament therein is, which separates from God,—what the breaking through that Partition Wall, and how effected: what the Centre of Light is, and the pressing into that Centre is; what the Light of God and the Light of Nature are; how they are operative in their several Spheres, and how to be kept from interfering with each other; with some account of the Two Wills, and their Contraposition in the Fallen State: of the Magical Wheel of the Will, and how the Motion thereof may be regulated; of the Eye in the Midst thereof, what the Right Eye is to the Soul, and what the Left is, but especially what the Single Eye is, and in what Manner it is to be obtained. Of Purification from the Contagion of Matter. Of the Destruction of Evil, and of the very Annihilation of it, by the Subsidence of the Will from its own Something into NOTHING. Of the Naked and Magical Faith, and the Attraction thereby of a certain Divine Corporeity: how all consists in the Will, and proceeds but from ONE POINT; where that POINT is placed, and how it may be found out; and which is both the Safest and Nearest Way to attain to the highest Super-sensual State and Glory of the internal Kingdom of Christ: which so few Souls even hear of, much less attain unto. [* “comment Dieu, saillant du POINT Indivisible, etc.” See Note p. 46, also the Observations, “For Truth is ONE, etc.” p. 51, etc.]

APPENDIX.—Describing the State of the Blessed, and of the Damned Souls when they depart from the Body, according to the True Principles of the Magia: and how Heaven and Hell have Communion with Man.

[Also, where the Angels and Devils dwell in this World's Time; how far Heaven and Hell are asunder; and what and whence the Angels and Human Souls are, according to the same Magic Nature of Things.

Also, what the Body of Man is, and why the Soul is capable of receiving Good and Evil.

Also, concerning the Destruction of the World, of Man's Body in and after the Resurrection: where Heaven and Hell shall be; of the last Judgment, how effected; and finally, wherefore the Strife in the Creation must be.]

(g.)—The WAY from DARKNESS to TRUE ILLUMINATION; Being a Practical Illustration of the whole Previous Theory, in the Experience of a Soul passing through all the States of Grace, even to the Supreme State, when the Gates of the Divine Revelation became opened in and to the Soul.

(~~xxx~~)—The HOLY WEEK or PRAYER BOOK, containing PRAYERS on SEVERAL OCCASIONS. An unfinished Treatise.

NOTE.—These Prayers are full of unction and instruction, and, as rendered into modern phraseology, are most beautiful devotional compositions. They express, according to their subject, all that a divinely-illuminated mind would desire to see in a model of sober, earnest, zealous, and enlightened addresses to God and Christ.

XIV.—A Meditation upon the Third Commandment.—Of God's Holy Name.

XV.—A Meditation upon the Fourth Commandment.—Of the right Sabbath Day.

XVI.—A Meditation upon the Fifth Commandment.

[The Author proceeded no further. He would have gone through the Six Days of the week, making the beginning on Monday (as here is to be seen,) and concluding on the Seventh, that is, on the Sunday, in the true Paradisical Sabbath. He would have expounded the whole Decalogue, the Apostle's Creed, and the Paternoster, in such a manner, by way of Confession and Prayer, but he was continually hindered; as also from writing other excellent Treatises, by reason of the entreaties of various friends, who put him upon writing first one, and then another work.

He had also intended, with the Divine help, to make an Exposition upon all the Epistles and Gospels throughout the year, but he began nothing of it, because his time was intercepted and cut off.

(XX.)—SIGNATURA RERUM, or, the SIGNATURE of ALL THINGS; Showing the Sign and Signification of the several Forms and Shapes in the Creation,* and what the Beginning, Ruin, and Cure of every thing is.—It proceeds out of Eternity, into Time, and again out of Time into Eternity, and compriseth all Mysteries.

It is uncertain whether the Author ever wrote a Preface to this book, which is a true mystical Mirror of the highest Wisdom. The following Observations may, however, serve as an INTRODUCTION to it:—

The best treasure a man can attain unto in this world is true knowledge, even the knowledge

* * NOTE, relative to the existing uniform edition (in English) of BEHMEN, Four vols. 4to, Richardson; 1764-81.—It is a common but erroneous supposition that LAW was the editor of this (incomplete) edition of Behmen's Works. Law doubtless had it in intention to produce a new and correct translation of those works, as may be inferred from his book of "The Way to Divine Knowledge," and the following Letter to one of his correspondents; but he died in 1761, before the first of the present volumes was finished, if begun; and all his identity therewith, if any, may be confined to a few verbal ~~changes in the copy~~ of one of his own copies of the "Book of the Three Principles," from which they might have been transferred into the above edition. Even the Symbols, or "Figures," which are stated to have been "left by the Rev. W. Law," were only copies he had sketched himself, or caused to be taken from the originals, which were designed by Freher, in illustration of his own Treatises upon the Philosophy of Behmen.

The fact is, the entire republication of the Works constituting the above edition, was undertaken at the sole expense of Mrs. Hutchin- ~~son and Mrs. Beccles~~ the friends and companions of Law. ~~of Law, who were wont, occasionally, to correct his pieces through the press, being then resident in London, and who doubtless undertook the duty of editorship at the request of those ladies, to carry out, as far as possible, the designs of their late esteemed friend in respect to a New Edition of J. B., as expressed in his latter writings. And the reason of this edition not being completed, was, that Mrs. Hutchin- and Mr. Ward died about the time of the publication of the Fourth Volume; Mrs. Gibbon, it appears, not being willing to~~ continuation of the work, ~~under the name of~~ All that these parties did as editors, was to take the original translations, change the phraseology here and there, without reference to the German original (which language it is supposed they did not understand), leave out certain portions of the translator's prefaces, alter the capital letters of a few words, and conduct the Treatises through the press. From some cause or other, they have omitted several very important Treatises of the author, which should have been inserted immediately after "The Book of the Incarnation," and in other cases have disregarded the proper order of the Writings. They also adopted the antiquated Life of Behmen, drawn up by Durand Hotham, in 1653, having no other memorial to their hand, which is tinctured by the phantasies and old wives' fables peculiar to the alchemists of former times. The supposition of this Memoir being edited by Law has been the occasion of much dissatisfaction in the minds of his friends, and much discredit with the public to his good sense and judgment. But, as before observed, Mr. Law had no connection with this edition of Behmen; and, besides, was as great an enemy to all the pretences of alchemy or occult science as the most simple-minded Christian believer.

The following is the Letter above referred to, in answer to one recommending Mr. L. to undertake a new edition of Behmen's Works:—

"I have several times had the same designs in my mind, which you recommend to me; but have never yet been enough moved to enter upon them * * *. I taught myself the High Dutch Language, on purpose to know the original words of the blessed Jacob * * *. The edition I have in in quarto [1730?] carefully printed from Gicktel's edition in the year 1715. The translators of J. B., Elliston and Sparrow, are much to be honoured for their work; they had great piety and great abilities, and well apprehended their author, especially Elliston; but the translation is too much loaded with words, and in many places the sense is mistaken.

"A new translator of J. B. is not to have it in intention to make his author more intelligible by softening or refining his language. His style is what it is, strange and uncommon; not because he wanted learning and skill in words, but because what he saw and conceived was quite new and strange, never seen or spoken of before: and therefore if he was to put it down in writing, words must be used to signify that which they had never done before.

"If it shall please God that I undertake this work, I shall only endeavour to make J. B. speak as he would have spoken, had he wrote in English. Secondly, to guard the reader at certain places from wrong apprehensions of his meaning, by adding here and there a note, as occasion requires. Thirdly, and chiefly, by Prefaces or Introductions to prepare and direct the reader in the true use of these writings. This last is most of all necessary, and yet would be entirely needless, if the reader would but observe J. B.'s own directions. For there is not an error, defect, or wrong turn, which the reader can fall into, in the use of these books, but is most plainly set before him by J. B." [WHAT WAS HERE DESIGNED BY MR. LAW, IT IS INTENDED TO SUPPLY IN THE PROPOSED NEW EDITION OF THE WORKS OF BEHMEN.]

"Many persons of learning, in the last century, read J. B. with great earnestness, but it was only, as it were, to steal from him certain mysteries of Nature, and to run away with the philosopher's stone; and yet nowhere could they see the folly and impossibility of their attempt so fully shown them, as by J. B. himself." [May we not add, many of the savans of this age do continually each in his own way, the same thing, and are equally wanting in magnanimity to refer to their original.]—"In the beginning of this century a number of persons, many of them of great piety, formed themselves into a kind of society, by the name of Philadelphians." [Dr. F. Lee's Defence of himself. For man is the great mystery of God, the microcosm, or the complete abridgement of the whole intellectual and temporal universe; he is the MIRANDUM DEI OPUS, God's masterpiece, a living emblem and hieroglyphic of eternity and time; and therefore to know whence he is, and what his temporal and eternal being and well-being are, must needs be that one necessary thing, unto which all our chief study should aim, and in comparison of which all the wealth of this world is but gross, and a loss to us.

Hence Solomon, the wisest of the kings of Israel, says, Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding; for the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold; she is more precious than rubies, and all things that can be desired are not to be compared unto her.

This is that wisdom which dwells in nothing, and yet possesses all things, and the humble resigned soul is its playfellow; this is the Divine alloquy, the inspiration of the Almighty, the of Mrs. Lead, (in his long letter to Mr. Henry Dodwell) must be read through the spectacles of the present observations of Law, to judge justly of the subject: which letter Law had by him, copied out in his own hand, when he penned the present letter.] "They were great readers, and well versed in the language of J. B., and used to make eloquent discourses of the mystery in their meetings. Their only thirst was after visions, openings, and revelations, etc. And yet nowhere could they see their distemper so fully described, the causes it proceeded from, and the fatal consequences of it, as by J. B. He often truly says, that in his writings are to be found all that the heart of man can wish to know of God, nature, and creature, etc. But then he as often says, and fully proves, that all is barred, and locked and bolted up from all those that, by art and reason, and self-ability, would enter into it."

In reference to what Law and others have written respecting the true source of the Newtonian philosophy, as well as of the supposed original discoveries of other philosophical minds, the following extract from a letter of Law to Dr. Cheyne is here appended: * * * "When Sir Isaac Newton died, there were found amongst his papers large abstracts out of J. Behmen's works, written with his own hand. This I have from undoubted authority; as also that, in the former part of his life, he was led into a search of the philosopher's tincture, from the same author.

"My vouchers are names well known, and of great esteem with you.—It is evidently plain, that all that Sir I. has said of the universality, nature, and effects of attraction, of the three first laws of nature, was not only said, but proved in its true and deepest ground, by J. B., in his Three first Properties of Eternal Nature; and from thence they are derived into this Temporal Outbirth. This, added to the information above, is, I think, a sufficient warrant for having said that "Sir I. could have referred to Behmen for the true ground," etc. * * *

"P.S.—From the authority above, I can assure you that Sir Isaac was formerly so deep in J. B. that he, together with one Dr. Newton, his relation, set up furnaces, and for several months were at work in quest of the Tincture, purely from what they conceived from him. It is no wonder, therefore, that attraction, with its two inseparable properties, which make in J. B. the first Three properties of Eternal Nature, should come to be the grand foundation of the Newtonian philosophy.

"I am in too much haste to say anything but in this broken way. If you have any commands for me, of any kind, a letter must be directed to me at Cliffe, near Oundle, in Northamptonshire.

"It is my conjecture, that Sir Isaac declared so openly, at first, his total ignorance of the source or cause of attraction, to prevent all suspicion of his being led into it from Behmen's doctrine. It is plain he knew the deep ground which Behmen had given of it. No one from Behmen can know anything of the Tincture, or the means or possibility of coming at it, without knowing and believing, as Behmen does, the ground of universal attraction. And therefore Sir Isaac's silence and ignorance of this ground must have been affected, and for certain reasons which can now only be guessed at."

The following is Poiret's note on this author at the end of his "Theologie Germanique," 1700: —Jacob Boëme (dit il) est le seul, au moins dont on ait eu les écrits jusqu'à lui, auquel Dieu ait découvert le fond de la nature, tant des choses spirituelles, que des corporelles; et qui, avec une pénétration toute centrale des choses théologiques ou surnaturelles, ait aussi connu d'origine les vrais principes de la philosophie, tant de la métaphysique, et de la pneumatique, que de la vraie physique. Il a vu par lumière et par sentiment intérieur, comment Dieu, saillant du point indivisible de son éternité uniforme, s'est manifesté à soi en Trinité parfaite par la génération ineffable de son Verbe lumineux, et par la procession de son Esprit Saint et délicieux; et comment ayant contemplé dans soi les vertus, les beautés, et les délices immenses de ses divines formes et de leurs combinaisons et diversifications infinies, il a fait couler de sa Divine Puissance par son Verbe et par son Esprit des êtres spirituels et corporels à l'imitation des idées qu'en avait formé sa divine sagesse: comment ces êtres out dans leur fond naturel et dans leurs perfections lumineuses et gratuites des propriétés, des beautés, et des délices semblables et analogues à leurs originaux qui sont dans Dieu: mais avec cette différence entr'eux, que les êtres spirituels les possèdent et les mettent en acte d'une manière divine, et avec liberté; et les êtres corporels d'une manière plus basse et bornée, vive néanmoins, avec sentiment et instinct vivant. Par là ayant réduit toutes les formes de la nature spirituelle et celles de la corporelle à Sept, et leurs principes à Trois, dont les deux premiers sont pour les choses spirituelles, et le troisième, qui est comme un tableau matériel des deux premiers, pour le monde extérieur; il a expliqué la création des Anges et de leur lieu, la chute des démons, la création de ce monde, plus grossier que l'angélique, et tiré du chaos ténébreux que les démons avaient causé en corrompant leur domicile; la création glorieuse de l'homme, sa chute, sa restitution par Jesus Christ, et une infinité d'autres mystères spirituels et naturels.

Ce profond et mystérieux auteur, lorsqu'il parle du fond de la nature, et des qualités des choses, tant divines que naturelles, ne peut être vivement et réellement entendu de personne pour savant ou grand esprit qu'on puisse être, (car cela consiste en sentimens) si ce n'est que Dieu réveille et touche divinement et d'une manière qui à present serait sursentuelle ou surnaturelle, nos facultés analogues aux siennes, et nos sens passifs, tant les divins, qui sont correspondans à Dieu, que les naturels, qui correspondent à ses œuvres, mais que nous avons perdus, ou du moins, qui sont assoupis et endormis dans nous par l'état de corruption et de mort où nous a réduits la chute d'Adam. Sans ce reveil, pour bien que l'on puisse parler de ces choses après la lecture des breath of God, the holy unction, which sanctifies the soul to be the temple of the Holy Ghost, which instructs it aright in all things, and searches τὰ βάθη τοῦ Θεοῦ, the depths of God. [1 Cor. ii. 10.]

This is the precious pearl, whose beauty is more glorious, and whose virtue more sovereign than the sun : it is a never-failing comfort in all afflictions, a balsam for all sores, a panacea for all diseases, a sore antidote against all poison, and death itself : it is that joyful and assured companion and guide, which never forsakes a man, but conveys him through this valley of misery and death into the blessed paradise of perfect bliss.

If it be asked, What is the way to attain to this wisdom? Behold! Christ, who is the way, the truth, and the life, tells you plainly in these words,—If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me; or, as he says elsewhere, Unless you be born écrits de l'auteur, l'on ne s'en formera néanmoins que des peintures toutes mortes, ou plutôt des idées aussi défectueuses que dissemblables à leurs originaux, et même de pures fictions, à peu près de la manière que ferait un aveugle né, qui, ayant souvent oui parler de la lumière et des couleurs, en parlerait aussi ensuite par ouïr dire, mais pourtant sans savoir vivement ce que signifient les mots qu'il prononce.

Ce n'est pas néanmoins qu'à proportion de la bonne disposition de cœur et d'esprit que l'on a, l'on n'y puisse entrevoir plus ou moins, mais grossièrement encore, et d'une manière imparfaite, plusieurs vérités très-belles, et qu'on n'en puisse tirer de très-belles lumières et conclusions pour ce qui regarde les dogmes, tant de théorie que de pratique. Mais ce n'est pas par là qu'il est le plus clair à tout le monde : c'est par ce qu'il entremêle ci et là de la corruption de l'homme et de la dépravation du Christianisme d'aujourd'hui, de la conversion, de la résignation et de l'abandon de l'âme à Dieu : des principes de la vie Chrétienne, des devoirs de l'homme, et de la pratique de la vertu, en un mot, de ce qui est nécessaire à savoir, et essentiel pour la pratique. Tout cela est touché si clairement et si fortement dans ses écrits, qu'il n'y a personne de bonne volonté qui ne puisse les comprendre et les goûter sans difficulté, pourvu qu'on s'y prenne par la lecture de ceux de ses traités, qui contiennent le plus ces sortes de vérités, tels que sont, ses livres de la Voie à Jesus Christ, qui font la seconde section de la Grammaire Théosophique, ses Lettres, et même la dernière et plus grande partie de son Mysterium Magnum, ou Explication de la Genèse.

Mais la pente naturelle et orgueilleuse de l'esprit de curiosité ne trouve pas tant de goût ni tant d'attraits pour ces sortes de matières solides et capitales, que pour des spéculations abstraites et relevées touchant les principes et les formes de la nature, leurs diverses combinaisons, les effets naturels qui en peuvent procéder, et choses semblables, auxquelles bien des gens, qui se piquent d'estime pour les écrits de cet Auteur, semblent s'attacher davantage qu'aux choses qu'il recommande comme uniquement essentielles, et comme la Clef de tout, telles que sont, la pénitence et le pur abandon à Dieu, ou la pure résignation à sa divine volonté, qui est le centre et le principe le plus profond de tout, et même l'unique qui soit d'une profondeur infinie : car concevoir et pénétrer toutes les grandeurs, toutes les lumières, et toutes les délices divines et angéliques, en posséder la connaissance avec celle de toute la nature jusque dans ses replis et dans ses principes les plus profonds, et y être attaché, tout cela n'est qu'un fond naturel, borné par le moi et par la propriété, et qui même peut dégénérer en fond diabolique et infernal. Mais il n'y a ni fond créaturel et fini, ni péril aucun dans la dénudation et la résignation de toutes choses sous la volonté de Dieu et dans le parfait abandon à lui seul, en lui laissant la liberté de nous donner ou de nous refuser comme il lui plaira ses grâces extraordinaires et ses lumières particulières. pour la possession desquelles on devrait avoir beaucoup plus d'appréhension et d'éloignement que d'inclination et de désir : de peur que l'amour-propre, la curiosité, la vanité, la propre complaisance, l'orgueil, et la présomption spirituelle, ne viennent à s'y glisser et à s'y établir à notre perdition ; précautions que notre Auteur a très-soigneusement remarquées et inculquées, et selon quoi il s'est réglé lui-même.

Cet Auteur était Allemand de nation, né dans la Lusace l'an 1575 ; Protestant Lutherien de religion, paysan de naissance et cordonnier de profession, quoique, depuis que Dieu l'eut illuminé pour la troisième fois, et incité à coucher ses lumières par écrit, il ait beaucoup moins travaillé de son métier que de sa plume, qui nous a laissé trente traités, tant petits que grands, sans compter celui de ses lettres. Ils sont tous, à la réserve d'un seul, sur le Dernier Jugement, qui est perdu, imprimés en Allemand, en divers lieux et en divers temps, quelques-uns du vivant de l'auteur : mais la plus grande part de ses écrits ne parut qu'après sa mort, qui arriva l'an 1624. Le noble et savant Franckenberg en a fait une relation, aussi bien que de sa vie, que l'on trouve à la tête de l'Édition de ses œuvres, réimprimées ensemble à Amsterdam en 1682. Mais la dernière et la plus exacte Édition de ses œuvres est celle de I. G. Gichtels, en 40. et 80., 1730, qui est très soigneusement rédigée. Franckenberg, le même qui sous le nom de Fr. à Monte publia en Latin à Amsterdam, 1647, l'Abregé de la Théologie Mystique de Hugo de Palma, en fit de même d'un autre petit traité de notre auteur, qui parut en Latin l'an 1650, sous le titre Metapsychica de Cælesti et Terrestri Mysterio : et un juriconsulte nommé Werdenhagen en avait déjà fait autant des 40 Questions de l'âme qui parurent au jour l'an 1632, à Amsterdam, sous le titre de Psychologia Vera J. B. T., deux livres, tous deux trop obscurs et trop dénués d'éclaircissements nécessaires, aussi bien que le livret Theologia Christianæ juxta Principia J. Bohemii idea brevior, de l'an 1687, pour pouvoir servir aux commençans ou aux savans du siècle d'introduction aux principes de cet Auteur. Celui qui a écrit le traité Exercitatio Theoreticorum Copernico-Cælestium Mathematico-Physico-Theologica, imprimé à Hambourg, 1689, (qui est le même qui publia à Francfort en 1691, sous le nom de Johannes Mathæi une Apologie Allemande pour l'Auteur, contre M. Holzhäusen, ministre Lutherien de Francfort) a bien mieux réussi dans la troisième partie de son Exercitation. Quant aux traductions de ses livres en Français, c'est ce que ne saurait souffrir la fausse délicatesse de cette langue, qui, pour s'accommoder aux esprits mols et féminins, s'est laissé imposer pour loi de ne rien dire qui paraisse tant soit peu obscur aux lecteurs les plus négligens, sous peine que cela ne passe pour du galimatias. comme passera sans doute la traduction du plus obscur de ses livres, Signatura Rerum, qu'on publia il y a environ cinquante ans (1650) en Français à Francfort sous le titre de Miroir Temporel de l'Eternité, traduction qui en effet n'est pas une pièce fort considérable.

again, you cannot see the kingdom of heaven ; or, as St. Paul says, If any man seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise.

Herein lies that simple child-like way to the highest wisdom, which no sharp reason or worldly learning can reach unto ; nay it is foolishness to reason, and therefore so few go the way to find it. The proud sophisters and rational wiselings of this world have always trampled it under foot with scorn and contempt, and have called it enthusiasm, madness, melancholy, whimsy, sublime nonsense, fancy, etc. ; but wisdom is justified of her children.

Indeed, every Christian is not fit for, or capable of, the knowledge of the eternal and temporal nature in its mysterious operation : neither is the proud, covetous world worthy to receive a clear manifestation of it ; and therefore the only wise God has locked up the jewel in his blessed treasury, which none can open but those that have the key : which is this, viz. Ask, and it shall be

Les dons de cet Auteur sont si singulières, qu'on chercheroit inutilement ailleurs plusieurs écrivains originaux du même fonds et caractère que lui ; je dis originaux c'est à dire, qui ayant puisé ces vérités de source et d'expérience dans eux-mêmes. Car pour d'autres qui aient écrit sur ses principes et qui en aient déduit des conclusions applicables à plusieurs sujets, il y en a qui l'ont fait, et signamment Frankenberg ; Keym, auteur de l'Oculus eternitatis mal attribué par l'imprimeur à ce premier ; l'auteur de la Voie à la Vie Eternelle, caché sous le nom de Desiderius Philadelphus, et encore quelques autres de ses Disciples, qui ont tous écrit en Alleman. Cependant entre les anciens un qui en approche est le Pœmandre, qu'on attribue à droit ou à tort à Mercurius Trismegiste, et qu'un Ami ou Disciple de Jacob Boeme traduisit et publia en Flamen l'an 1652. Sur l'édition Grecque et Latine de Patritius, beaucoup meilleure que l'édition de Ficinus et que celle dont se servit le Duc de Candale pour faire celle, qu'il fit imprimer en François avec de très-belles notes et en très-belle forme à Bordeaux en 1579. Paracelse, Weigelius, Sperber, Sclei, Franc, Georgius, Venetus, van Helmont, Pere et fils, Scotus Erigena, et encore quelques Ecrivains Cabalistes en approchent quelquefois en certaines choses, à peu près comme fait l'auteur de l'Harmonie du Monde (imprimée à Paris en 1675) que les curieux pourront consulter s'ils veulent voir une manière de philosophe qui approche beaucoup plus près de celle de notre auteur, que de la vulgaire soit Aristotélicienne soit Cartesienne. Ajoutez y Postellus, dont Frankenberg publia en 1646, à Amsterdam un petit livret Clavis absconditorum, à la fin duquel se trouve un Catalogue des écrits très-rare de cet Auteur non commun.

Il n'y a rien, au reste, de plus ridicule que de prétendre comme quelques uns, que J. Boème ait tiré ses connoissances de Paracelse. Il pourroit bien s'être conformé à lui en quelques termes et manières de s'exprimer ; mais il n'y a rien du tout dans Paracelse ni de ses trois principes, ni des sept formes de la nature spirituelle et corporelle, qui sont pourtant les vrais et uniques principes de J. Boème, lequel on ne sauroit lire avec quelque discernement sans s'apercevoir et sentir qu'il ne parle pas d'emprunt, et que tout lui vient de source et d'origine."

We close this note, by presenting a SYSTEMATIC DIGEST of the general contents of this Author's wonderful writings, in twenty divisions, viz.—

I.—Concerning the understanding possessed by this author, and of his Writings ; also of the Art and Method how a man may attain to the comprehension of the same.

II.—Of the eternal UNITY of the divine Life, and of the necessity of an Opposition therein, and of the Eternal Overcoming of the same.

III.—Of the Seven Forms of Nature, and of the Three Persons in the Godhead ; as also of the Three Principles of the Divine Life.

IV.—In what sense the World has eternally been in God ; and in what manner the Creation has proceeded from him.

V.—Of the creation of Angels, and of their nature and constitution ; as also of the Fall of Lucifer and its consequences.

VI.—Of the Restoration of Nature in the Six Days of the Creation ; and of the making of Man.

VII.—Of the original Glory of Man, of the high distinction assigned to him, and of his falling into Sin.

VIII.—Of the present constitution of Nature, or of the so-called Third Principle.

IX.—Of the present Constitution of Man in general, and of the present method of his Propagation in particular.

X.—Of the Government of the Son of God over mankind before his appearance in the flesh, and of the Sacrifices of the Old Testament.

XI.—Of the Incarnation of the Son of God, and of the dignity of the Virgin Mary.

XII.—Of the Redemption (or releasing) of Mankind through the active and passive obedience of the Saviour. [A release implies that the party had bound itself by a misdirection of its own will, shutting itself up in a false and unlawful centre, from which enclosure the grace delivers it. By the misdirection of the will and the inability of the sinner to reverse the act, the sovereign goodness of God is rendered most evident, which otherwise in the very nature of things could never have been known. The origin of evil proves and establishes the eternal sole dominion of Good.]

XIII.—Of the written Word of God, and of the Contention about it, and of the proper Use of the same.

XIV.—Of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and their Use.

XV.—Of the Election of Grace, and concerning the predestination of man to Happiness or Damnation.

XVI.—Of the Forgiveness of Sin, of true Faith, and of the being Born-again.

XVII.—Of the inward Life of the New-born, and their constant conflict with Sin.

XVIII.—Of the social life of Christians upon earth, and of the coming Fall of Babel, and of the Time of the LILY [when the kingdom of Grace and Nature are ONE, which is promised to come to pass on the earth.]

XIX.—Of Death, and of the state of the Soul after Death.

XX.—Of the Resurrection of the Body, of the Judgment, and of ETERNAL LIFE.

These divisions are translations from Dr. Hamburgel's German doctrine of Jakob Böhme, Munich 1844 ; but whose representations and notices therein of the Holy Ghost are more worthy of a more rationalist, than of one who apprehended the true given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you; your heavenly Father will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him, if they seek, knock, ask, as the importunate widow, or diligent housewife, sought for what she wanted.

This is the true theosophic school wherein this Author learned the first rudiments and principles of wisdom, and in which we must take our degrees, if we would understand his deep writings. For we must know that the sons of Hermes, who have commenced in the high school of true magic and theosophy, have always spoken their hidden wisdom in a mystery, and have so couched it under shadows and figures, parables and similies, that none can understand their obscure yet clear writings, but those who are constituted by nature for it, and have had admittance into the same school, and have tasted of the feast of Pentecost.

And this does not seem at all strange to the children of divine Mercury; for the mysteries of philosophy, divinity, and theosophy, must not be profaned, and laid open to the view of the outward astral reason, which turns all to its selfish pride, covetousness, and cunning hypocrisy; and therefore a parabolical or magical phrase or dialect is the best and plainest habit and dress that mysteries can have to travel in up and down this wicked world. And thus parables have a double and different respect and use; for as they conceal and hide secrets from the rude and vulgar, who are not able or patient to bear any thing but what suits with their common conceits and opinions, so likewise they sweetly lead the mind of the true searcher into the depths of wisdom's councils. They are as the cloudy pillar of Moses: they have a dark part, and they have a light part; they are dark to the Egyptians, the Pharisaical sons of sophistry, but light to the true Israel, the children of the mystery.

And therefore whoever will be a nursling of SOPHIA, and learn to understand and speak the language of wisdom, must begin at the beginning, as already set forth, he must be born again of and in the Word of wisdom, Christ Jesus. The immortal seed, the Divine essence, which God breathed into his paradisaical soul, must be revived, and he must become one again with that which he was in God before he was a creature, and then his eternal spirit may enter into that which is within the veil, and see not only the literal, but the moral, allegorical, and analogical meaning of the wise, and their dark sayings. He will then be fit to enter, not only into Solomon's porch, the outer court of natural philosophy, sense and reason, but likewise into the inward court of holy and spiritual exercises, in divine understanding and knowledge; and so he may step into the most inward and holiest place of theosophical mysteries, into which none are admitted but those who have received the high and holy union.

But now to hint to the reader what this book contains, though indeed the Spirit of wisdom cannot be delineated with pen and ink, no more than a sound can be painted, or the wind grasped in the hollow of the hand. Herein the author deciphers and represents in a lively manner the signature of all things, and gives the contents of eternity and time, and glances at all mysteries.

Herein the author sets forth fundamentally the birth, sympathy, and antipathy of all beings; how all beings originally arise out of one eternal mystery, and how that same mystery begets itself in itself from eternity to eternity; and likewise how all things, which take their original out of this eternal mystery, may be changed into evil, and again out of evil into good; with a clear and manifest demonstration how man has turned himself out of the good into the evil, and how his transmutation is again out of the evil into the good. Moreover, herein is declared the outward cure of the body: how the outward life may be freed from sickness by its likeness or assimilate, and be again introduced into its first essence; where, also, by way of parable and similitude, the philosopher's stone is vividly described for the temporal cure, and along with it the Holy Corner Stone, Christ alone, for the everlasting cure, regeneration and perfect restitution, of all true, faithful, eternal souls. In a word, the author's intent is to declare the inward power and property by the outward sign; for nature has given marks and notes to every thing, whereby it may be known; and this is the language of nature, which signifies for what every thing is good and profitable. And herein lies the mystery, or central science of the high philosophical work in the true Spagiric art, which consummates the cure, not only for the body, but for the soul.

But let the reader know, that the sharp speculation of his own reason will not be able to pry into the depth of this book, but rather bring him into a maze of doubtful notions, wherein he will bewilder himself, and then lay the blame on the author, whose phrase, he will say, is tedious and strange. And therefore the understanding lies only in the manifestation of that Spirit which, in the day of Pentecost, gave forth the true sense and meaning of all languages in one. Now if that Spirit rules and dwells in the reader, then he may understand this author in the deepest ground, according to his creaturely constellation, both in the eternal and temporal nature; but if not, these things will be but as a relation of mysticism and chimeras to him, just as the history of colours is to one born blind.

The author thus concludes this book:—"I have faithfully, with all true admonition, represented to the reader what the Lord of all beings has given me; he may behold himself in this looking-glass within and without, and so he shall find what and who he is. Every reader, be he good or bad, will find his profit and benefit therein; it is a very clear gate of the great mystery of all beings. By glosses, commentaries, curiosity, and self-wit, none shall be able to reach or apprehend it in his own ground; but it may very well meet and embrace the true seeker, and create him much profit and joy, yea, be helpful to him in all natural things, provided he applies himself to it aright, and seeks in the fear of God, seeing it is now a time of seeking; for a LILY blossoms upon the mountains and valleys in all the ends of the earth: he that seeketh findeth."

(XXI§.)—SIXTY-TWO EPISTLES, being the REMAINDER of the AUTHOR'S WRITINGS; Wherein are contained Plain Instructions concerning the Highly Precious Knowledge of DIVINE and NATURAL WISDOM, and the Way of its Attainment.

NOTE.—These Epistles inform us what this author was, and whence he had his great knowledge, and upon what ground and centre it is founded; and likewise how we may come really to understand the aim and meaning of his writings, and effectually find the excellent use thereof.

It would be too large in this place to speak of that foundation and stedfast Byss which this author's writings contain, whereby true philosophy may be restored to its original purity: for by the knowledge of the Centre of all Beings therein opened, we may learn rightly to understand what Time and Eternity is, together with the science of the NOTHING and ALL; moreover, whence the inward radical ens, working essence, true subsistence, and full existence of every thing proceedeth; and also to what end every thing hath such an essence, life, power, virtue, form, colour, and then whither it goeth, and what it shall be hereafter in eternity; also, we come to see how it is that all things proceed out of God, subsist in God, and again return to God, and so obtain the right knowledge of ourselves and of God in nature. And from this centre ariseth the true knowledge of the Three Principles, and also of the threefold, or triune life of man, whereby the deepest, darkest, and hardest queries that can arise within the mind of man, or come under the reach of any imagination or thought, may be rightly understood and determined. Which surely must needs greatly advance the arts and sciences, conducing to the attainment of the universal tincture and signature, whereby the different secret qualities and virtues that are hid in all visible and corporeal things, as metals, minerals, plants, and herbs, etc., may be immediately made known, drawn forth, and applied to their right natural use.

There are many uncommon words used in these treatises, not, however, for the purpose of coining words to amuse the mind only, but to convey as fitly as possible the author's intent, though still the full expression of his meaning may not have always been attained. For as nature did open its knowledge in him, so likewise its language. There may exist a proper and peculiar idea in some of his words not fully expressed in the translator's renderings, yet the sense is in general truly given. Words, indeed, are but vehicula rerum; they are formed to express things, and not bare sounds or empty words. He that rightly understands the ground of the Cabala and Magic, and knows how the language of nature speaks in every tongue, might very excellently interpret this author; but the bare letter of his writings, though never so lucidly rendered, will not give the understanding of them: that can only be by the spirit of regeneration in Christ, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Deity; though indeed, all things in this world come by childlike steps to their perfection.

So far, then, with respect to the several Treatises comprising the revelation of the mystery, or espoused writings of the subject of the proposed biography, and containing a demonstration of all the theoretical and practical doctrines of Christianity, as designated orthodox in all ages.

And what more, it may be asked, requires to be granted to a divinely-illuminated understanding, for the strict demonstration of truth, than the definitions, postulates, and axioms of metaphysics, which, however hitherto unknown, inadequately apprehended, or the reasoning thereupon considered to be inferior in power of conviction, must necessarily be strictly analogous to those of Euclid Mathematicæ.

For truth is ONE eternal and indivisible; the NOTHING and the ALL. Its unseen root is everywhere. All material form implies immaterial life preceding and generating it. Even all the axioms and demonstrations of geometry (pure mathematics) are only sensible evidence of purely mental, and, therefore, everlasting verities. Those verities begin with a point, but geometers are obliged to deny to that point any assignable magnitude, though it be the only visible beginning of all that afterwards be viewed and measured.

From that point all magnitude and varied form takes its origin.

That point implies an invisible mind and power to give its visible position, place and evidence. Thence, from its own first manifested and all comprehending centre, does the invisible and otherwise unknown all-generating power commence the flow or fluxion of life, whereby the varied forms of life come forth to view and corporisation. The invisible ONE is God. The point of evidence of his existence is the WORD of God. The fluxions and developments of the point are first, things invisible to us here, thence, by degradation through wilful disobedience, things visible, gross, and material, which, nevertheless, still depend on their invisible roots and origin, into which, by absorption and consumption, they will return, when that origin shall awaken and rouse everywhere throughout creation its latent energy. Then things which are made shall be shaken, that things which cannot be shaken may remain. We then, receiving a kingdom which cannot be shaken, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire."

We propose to conclude the present Section by a few extracts from the writings of the subject of the proposed Biography, containing a popular illustration of the nature of his espoused writings above described, and set forth in his own masterly, easy and classic style of diction, as also a description of their special character, and of their wonderful author,—so that what with these extracts, and the notes and observations appended to them, and the general portraiture of the works themselves which has been presented in the foregoing pages, the obloquy which envy, prejudice, or stupidity have succeeded (with the indiscriminating portion of the public,) in heaping upon the author's name and writings, may be for ever extinguished, and both they and those of the subject of our proposed biography* be henceforth seen in their true light and real character.

1.—Was there no NATURE, there could be no Creature, because the life of every creature is, and can be nothing else, but the life of that nature out of which it was created, and in which it has its being. Eternal beings must have their qualities, nature, form, and manner of existence out of eternal nature, and temporal beings out of temporary nature: Was there no eternity, there could be no time; was there nothing infinite, there could be nothing finite; therefore we have here

* As will have been already observed, the ultimate object of the present enlarged advertisement or treatise, is the production of an elevated classic and religious biography of Law, one that shall be worthy of such an estimable character, towering genius, master scholar, and divine philosopher, and which may serve as an introduction to a New Edition of his entire Works; which has long been a desideratum to English literature. With a view to render such a work as complete as possible, in all its details, the writer has, for some time past, been collecting together information respecting his personal character and private life; besides having purchased from the present family of Law, at King's Cliff, all his remaining MSS. in their possession, (which had descended to them from Mrs. Hestor Gibbon, the before-mentioned friend and companion of Law, and his sole legatee), as well as from other parties, in whose families they had been treasured up, numerous similar original documents and correspondence. The writer avails himself of the present opportunity to state, that he should feel particularly obliged for any information respecting the habits, occupations, and location, etc., of the above celebrated individual, during the years 1713—16, also, during the period of the Bangorian controversy; also, during the years 1719—27, and 1732—37; as well as for the loan or sight of any documents or letters in his hand-writing, (and, judging from the number of his correspondents, there must have been great numbers of the latter, which probably now exist in the possession of private individuals,)—as likewise of Freher, or other authors in MS. of the early part of the last century, who have treated upon the philosophy contained in the writings of Teutonicus. Such communications may be kindly addressed to "R. Y. Teutonicus," and left at 24, Ludgate-street, London, whence they will be duly forwarded to the writer, who will take care that they are faithfully returned.

two great fundamental truths that cannot be shaken; first, that there is and must be an eternal nature, because there is a nature that is temporary, and that it must be that to eternal creatures, which temporal nature is to temporal creatures. Secondly, that everywhere and in all worlds, nature must stand between God and the creature, as the foundation of all mutual intercourse; God can transact nothing with the creature, nor the creature have any communion with God, but in and by that nature in which it stands.

I hope no one will here ask me for Scripture proofs of this, or call these truths nostrums, because they are not to be found in the same form of expression in some particular text of Scripture. Where do the holy writings tell us, that a thing cannot be and not be at the same time? or that every consequence must arise from premises? And yet the Scripture is continually supposing both these truths, and there could be no truth in the Scripture, or anywhere else, if these things were not undeniable.

There is nothing said of man throughout all Scripture, but what supposes him to stand in nature under a necessity of choosing something that is natural, either life or death, fire or water. There is nothing said of God with relation to creatures, but what supposes him to be the God of nature, manifesting himself in and through nature, calling, assisting, and directing every thing to its highest natural state. Nature is the scene of his providence, and all the variety of his governing attributes display themselves by his various operations in and through nature: therefore it is equally certain, that what God does to any creature, must be done through the medium of nature; and also what the creature does toward God, must be done in and through the powers of that nature in which it stands. No temporary creature can turn to God, or reach after him, or have any communion with him, but in and according to that relation which temporary nature bears to God; nor can any eternal beings draw near to or unite with God in any other manner than that in which

[The Bangorian Controversy.—If the reader, being a person of experience, strict impartiality, and solid judgment in religious things, peruse herewith “Burnet’s Answer to these Letters,” he will easily arrive at a clear perception of the true and the false of all the questions discussed in this most important Christian controversy. For our author, despite his captivating logic, rhetoric, and erudition, and notwithstanding the praise bestowed upon these Letters by the ‘high church’ party and reviewers, must not be sanctioned beyond the bounds of justice and experience.]

IV.—Remarks upon the ‘Fable of the Bees,’ with a Postscript on Bayle, 1725.

XVI.—A Short but Sufficient Confutation of Dr. Warburton’s ‘Projected Defence,’ (as he calls it) ‘of Christianity,’ in a Letter to the Bishop of London, Dr. Sherlock, 1757.—[This is a beautiful popular exemplification of the deep knowledge couched in the Works of BEHMEN. And though it may be considered but as the product of a few little dashes of the Author’s pen, the whole Christian learned world may safely be challenged to produce its equal in the same number of pages, in respect to rhetorical power, profound Christian science, and evangelical sentiment.]

XVII.—An Humble, Earnest, and Affectionate Address to the Clergy. 1761. [Completed only a few days before the Author’s decease; and terminating with ‘Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.’ with which words he closed his personal ministry.]

eternal nature is united with him. Would you know, why no Omnipotence of God can create temporal animals but out of temporary nature, nor eternal animals but out of eternal nature: it is because no Omnipotence of God can produce a visible triangle, but out of, and by three visible lines; for, as lines must be before there can be any lineal figures, so nature must be before there can be natural creatures.

2.—Every thing that is in being is either God, or nature, or creature; and every thing that is not God is only a manifestation of God; for as there is nothing, neither nature nor creature, but what must have its being in and from God, so everything is, and must be, according to its nature, more or less a manifestation of God. Everything, therefore, by its form and condition, speaks so much of God, and God in everything speaks and manifests so much of himself. Temporary nature is this beginning created system of sun, stars, and element; it is temporary nature, because it begins and has an end, and therefore is only a temporary manifestation of God, or God manifested according to transitory things.

3.—Properly and strictly speaking, nothing can begin to be: the beginning of every thing is nothing more than its beginning to be in a new state. Thus time itself does not begin to be, but duration, which always was, began to be measured by the earth's turning round, or the rising and setting of the sun; and that is called the beginning of time, which is, properly speaking, only the beginning of the measure of duration: thus it is with all temporal nature, and all the qualities and powers of temporal beings that live in it. No quality or power of nature then began to be, but such qualities and powers as had been from all eternity, began then to be in a new state. Ask what time is; it is nothing else but something of eternal duration become finite, measurable, and transitory. Ask what fire, light, darkness, air, water, and earth are; they are, and can be nothing else, but some eternal things become gross, finite, measurable, divisible, and transitory. For if there could be a temporal fire that did not spring out of eternal fire, then there might be time that did not come out of eternity.

It is thus with every temporary thing and the qualities of it; it is the beginning of nothing, but only of a new state of something that existed before: therefore all temporary nature is a product, offspring, or out-birth of eternal nature, and is nothing else but so much of eternal nature changed from its eternal to a temporal condition. Fire did not begin to be, darkness did not begin to be, light did not begin to be, water and earth did not begin to be, when this temporary world first appeared, but all these things came out of their eternal state, into a lower, divided, compacted, created, and transitory state. Hearing, seeing, tasting, smelling, feeling, did not then begin to be, when God first created the creatures of this world; they only came to be qualities and powers of a lower and more imperfect order of beings, than they had been before.

Figures, and their relations, did not then begin to be, when material circles and squares, etc., were first made, but these figures and relations began then to appear in a lower state than they had done before: and so it must be said of all temporal nature, and everything in it. It is only something of eternal nature separated, changed, or created into a new temporary state and condition.

4.—Now it may be asked, why was eternal Nature thus degraded, debased, and changed from its eternal state of perfection? Will any one say, that God of his own will changed eternal nature, which is the glorious manifestation of his power and godhead, the seat of his holy residence, his majestic kingdom of heaven, into this poor miserable mixture of good and evil, into this impure state of division, grossness, death, and darkness? No. It is the highest of all absurdities to say so. Now we sufficiently know from Scripture, that a whole hierarchy, or host of angels, renounced their heavenly life, and therefore raised up a kingdom that was not heavenly. Could they not have inflamed and disordered outward nature in which they lived, they could not have destroyed the heavenly nature in themselves: for everything must be according to the state of that world in which it lives; and therefore the state of outward nature, and the state of inward nature in the angels, must stand and fall together; and as sure as a whole kingdom of angels lost their heavenly life, so sure is it that their whole kingdom lost its heavenly state and condition. And therefore it is an undeniable truth, founded on Scripture evidence, that some part of eternal nature was changed from its first state of glory and perfection, before the creation of temporary nature; therefore in the creation of this poor, gross, disordered, perishable, material world, one of these two things was done, either God took the spoiled part of heaven or eternal nature, and created it into this temporary state of good and evil; or he degraded and brought down some part of the kingdom of heaven from its glory and perfection, into this mixture of good and evil, order and disorder, in which the world stands. He could not do this latter, without bringing evil into nature, as the devil had done, and therefore we may be sure he did not do it; but if he did the former, then the creation of this lower world was a glorious act, and worthy of the infinite goodness of God; it was putting an end to the devil's working evil in nature, and it was putting the evil that was brought into nature in a way of being finally overcome, and turned into good again. Will any one now call these things whimsical speculations? Can anything be thought of more worthy of God, more conformable to nature, or more consonant to all revealed religion? But perhaps you will say, how could the angels spoil or destroy that glorious kingdom of eternal nature in which they dwell? It may be answered, how could it possibly be otherwise? How could they live in eternal nature, unless nature without them, and nature within them, mutually mixed and qualified with each other? Would you have such mighty spirits, with their eternal energies, have less power in that nature or kingdom in which they dwell, than a kindled piece of coal hath in this world? For every piece of coal set on fire, adds so much heat to outward nature, and so far alters and changes the state of it.

5.—Now, let it be supposed, not only that a piece of coal, but that the whole of every thing in this world, that could either give or receive fire, was made to burn, what effect would it have upon the whole frame of nature? Would not the whole state of things, the regions, places, and divisions of the elements, and all the order of temporal nature, be quite destroyed.

When, therefore, every angelical life kindled itself in wrath, and became thereby divided, darkened, and separated from God, the same kindling, darkening, dividing, and confusion must be brought forth in their natural kingdom, because they lived in nature, and could have neither love nor wrath, but such as they could exert in and by the powers of nature?

Now all fire, wherever it is, is either a fire of wrath, or a fire of love: fire, not overcome or governed by light, is the fire of wrath, which only tears in pieces, consumes and devours, all that it can lay hold of, and it wills nothing else. But light is the fire of love, it is meek, amiable, full of kind embraces, lovingly spreading itself, and giving itself with all its riches into everything that can receive it. These are the two fires of eternal nature, which were but one in heaven, and can be only one wherever heaven is. And it was the separation of these two fires that changed the angels into devils, and made their kingdom a beginning of hell.

Now either of these two fires, wherever it is kindled, in animate or lifeless things, communicates its own kind of heat in some degree to outward nature, and so far alters and changes the state of it. The wrath of a man and the wrath of a tempest do one and the same thing to outward nature, alter its state in the same manner, and only differ in their degree of doing it.

Fire kindled in a material thing can only communicate with the materiality of nature; but the fire of a wrathfully inflamed man, being a fire both of body and soul, communicates a twofold heat; it stirs up the fire of outward nature, as fire does in a coal, and it stirs up the wrath of hell as the devils do.

The fire of love, kindled by the light and Spirit of God, in a truly regenerated man, communicates a twofold blessing: it outwardly joins with the meek light of the sun, and helps to overcome the wrath of outward nature; it inwardly co-operates with the power of good angels, in resisting the wrath and darkness of hell. And it would be no folly to suppose, that if all human breath was become a mere, unmixed wrath, that all the fire in outward nature would immediately break forth, and bring that dissolution upon outward nature which will arise from the last fire. Therefore it is necessary that a whole kingdom of angels should kindle the same wrath and disorder in outward nature that was in themselves: for being in eternal nature, and communicating with it, as temporal beings do in temporal nature, what they did in themselves must be done in that nature or kingdom in which they lived, and moved, and had their being.

What a powerful fire there is in the wrath of a spirit, may be seen by the effects of human wrath; one sudden thought shall, in a moment, discolour, poison, inflame, swell, distort, and agitate the whole body of a man. Whence also is it, that a diseased body infects the air, or that malignant air infects a healthful body? Is it not because there is and must be an inseparable qualifying, mixing, and uniting betwixt nature and those creatures that live in it? Now all diseases and malignities, whether in nature or creature, all proceed from the sinful motions of the will and desires of the creature. This is as certain as that death, and all that leads to it, is the sole product of sin; therefore it is a certain truth, that all the disorder that ever was, or can be in nature, arises from that power which the creature hath in and upon nature; and therefore as sure as a whole host of heavenly beings raised up a fiery, wrathful, dark nature in themselves, so sure is it that the same wrathful, fiery, dark disorder was raised up in that kingdom, or nature, in which they had their being.

6.—Now the Scriptures nowhere say in express words, that the place of this world was the place of the angels that fell, and that their fallen, spoiled, and disordered kingdom, was by the power of God changed or created into this temporary state of things in which we live; this is not expressly said, because it is plainly implied, and fully signified to us by the most general doctrines of Scripture; for if we know, both from nature and Scripture, that this world is a mixture of good and evil, do not we enough know, that it could only be created out of that which was good and evil? And if we know that evil cannot come from God, if we know that the devil had actually brought it forth before the creation of this world, are we not enough told, that the evil which is in this world, is the evil that was brought forth into nature by the devil, and that therefore the matter of this world is that very materiality which was spoiled by the fallen angels? How can we need a particular text of Scripture to tell us, that the place of this world was the place of the angels before their fall, when the whole tenor of Scripture tells us that it is the place of their habitation now? For how could they have, or find, darkness, but in that very place where they had extinguished the light? What could they have to do with us, or we with them, but that we are entered into their possessions, and have their kingdom made over to us? How could they go about amongst us as roaring lions, seeking whom they may devour, but that our creation has brought us among them? They cannot possibly be any where but where they fell, because they can live nowhere but in the evil which they have brought forth; they can have no wrath and darkness but where they broke off from light and love; they can communicate with no outward nature but that which fell with them, and underwent the same change as they did; therefore, though St. Jude saith with great truth, that they left their own habitation, yet it is only as they left their own angelical nature, not departed from it into a distant place, but deformed and changed it; so that the heaven that was within them and without them is equally left, because both within them and without them they have no habitation but a fiery darkness broken off from the light of God.

And therefore as man by his creation is brought into a power of commerce with those fallen angels, who must live, and could only act in that part of nature which they had deformed, it is plain, that this creation placed him in that system of things which was formed and created out of their fallen kingdom, because they can act, or be acted upon, nowhere else.

7.—And this is the one true and only reason why there is good and evil throughout all temporal nature and creature; it is because all this temporary nature is a creation out of that strife of evil against good which the fallen angels had brought into their kingdom. No subtle evil serpent could have been generated, no tree of knowledge of good and evil could have sprung out of the earth, but because nature in this world was that part of eternal nature which the fallen angels had corrupted, and therefore a life made up of good and evil could be brought forth by it. Evil and good were in the angelical kingdom as soon as they set their wills and desires contrary to God and the Divine life. Had God permitted them to go on, their whole kingdom had been like themselves, all over one unmixed evil, and so had been incapable of being created into a redeemable state; but God put a stop to the progress of evil in their kingdom; he came upon it whilst it was in strife, and *compact*ed or created it all into a new, temporary, material state and condition; whence these two things followed: first, that the fallen angels lost their power over it, and could no farther kindle their own fire in it, but were as chained prisoners in an extent of darkness, which they could neither get out of nor extend any farther: secondly, this new creation, being created out of this begun strife, stood as yet in the birth of life, and so became capable of being assisted and blessed by God, and finally, at the end of time, restored to its first heavenly state.

Now the good and evil that is in this world is that same good and evil, and in the same strife, that it was in the kingdom of the fallen angels, only with this happy difference, there it was under the devil's power, and in a way to be wholly evil; here it is in a new compacted or created state, under the providence and blessing of God, appointed to bring forth a new kind of life, and display the wonders of Divine love, till such time as a new race of angelical creatures, born in this mixture of good and evil, shall be fit to receive the kingdom of Lucifer restored to its first glory?

Is there any part of the Christian religion that does not confirm it? Is there any part of the Christian religion, that is not made more intelligible, more beautiful, and edifying by it? Is there any difficulty of outward nature that is not totally removed and satisfied by it?

How was the philosophy of the ancient sages perplexed with the state of nature? They knew God to be all goodness, love, and perfection, and so knew not what to do with the misery of human life and the disorders of outward nature, because they knew not how this nature came into its present state, or from whence it was descended. But had they known that temporal nature, all that we see in this whole frame of things, was only the sickly defiled state of eternal things, put into a temporary state of recovery, that time and all transitory things were only in this war and strife, to be finally delivered from all the evil that was brought into eternal nature, their hearts must have praised God for this creation of things as those morning stars did, that shouted for joy when it was first brought forth.

8.—From this true knowledge of the state, and nature, and place of this creation, what a reasonableness, wisdom, and necessity does there appear in the hardest sayings, precepts, and doctrines of the Gospel! He that thus knows what this world is, has great reason to be glad that he is born into it, and yet still greater reason to rejoice, in being called out of it, preserved from it, and shown how to escape with the preservation of his soul. The evils that are in this world are the evils of hell, that are tending to be nothing else but hell; they are the remains of the sin and poison of the fallen angels: the good that is in this world are the sparks of life that are to generate heaven and gain the restoration of the first kingdom of Lucifer. Who therefore would think of any thing, desire any thing, endeavour any thing, but to resist evil in every kind, under every shape and colour? Who would have any views, desires, and prayers after any thing, but that the life and light of heaven may rise up in himself, and that God's kingdom may come, and his will be done in all nature and creature?

Darkness, light, fire and air, water and earth, stand in their temporary created distinction and strife, for no other end, with no other view, but that they may obtain the one thing needful,—their first condition in heaven: and shall man that is born into time for no other end, on no other errand, but that he may be an angel in eternity, think it hard to live as if there were but one thing needful for him? What are the poor politics, the earthly wisdom, the ease, sensuality, and advancements of this world for us, but such fruits as must be eaten in hell? To be swelled with pride, to be fattened with sensuality, to grow great through craft, and load ourselves with earthly goods, is only living the life of beasts, that we may die the death of devils. On the other hand, to go starved out of this world, rich in nothing but heavenly tempers and desires, is taking from time all that we came for, and all that can go with us into eternity.

9.—But to return to the farther consideration of nature. As all temporary nature is nothing else but eternal nature brought out of its kindled, disordered strife, into a created or compacted distinction of its several parts, so it is plain that the whole of this world, in all its working powers, is nothing else but a mixture of heaven and hell. There cannot be the smallest thing, or the smallest quality of any thing in this world, but what is a quality of heaven or hell discovered under a temporal form: every thing that is disagreeable to the taste, to the sight, to our hearing, smelling, or feeling, has its root, and ground, and cause, in and from hell, and is as surely in its degree the working or manifestation of hell in this world, as the most diabolical malice and wickedness is; the stink of weeds, of mire, of all poisonous corrupted things, shrieks, horrible sounds, wrathful fire, rage of tempests, and thick darkness, are all of them things that had no possibility of existence, till the fallen angels disordered the state of their kingdom; therefore everything that is disagreeable and horrible in this life, everything that can afflict and terrify our senses, all the kinds of natural and moral evil, are only so much of the nature, effects and manifestation of hell. For hell and evil are only two words for one and the same thing. The extent of one is the extent of the other, and all that can be ascribed to the one must be ascribed to the other. On the other hand all that is sweet, delightful, and amiable in this world, in the serenity of the air, the fineness of seasons, the joy of light, the melody of sounds, the beauty of colours, the fragrance of smells, the splendor of precious stones, is nothing else but heaven breaking through the veil of this world, manifesting itself in such a degree, and darting forth in such variety so much of its own nature. So that heaven and hell are not only as near you, as constantly showing and proving themselves to all your senses, as day and night, but night itself is nothing else but hell breaking forth in such a degree, and the day is nothing else but a certain opening of heaven, to save us from the darkness that arises from hell.

O man! consider thyself; here thou standest in the earnest perpetual strife of good and evil, all nature is continually at work to bring about the great redemption; the whole creation is travelling in pain, and laborious working, to be delivered from the vanity of time; and wilt thou be asleep? Everything thou hearest, or seest, says nothing, shows nothing to thee, but what either eternal light or eternal darkness hath brought forth. For as day and night divide the whole of our time, so heaven and hell divide all our thoughts, words, and actions. Stir which way thou wilt, do or design what thou wilt, thou must be an agent with the one or with the other. Thou canst not stand still, because thou livest in the perpetual workings of temporal and eternal nature: if thou workest not with the good, the evil that is in nature carries thee along with it. Thou hast the height and depth of eternity in thee, and therefore, be doing what thou wilt, either in the closet, the field, the shop, or the church, thou art sowing that which grows, and must be reaped in eternity. Nothing of thine can vanish away; but every thought, motion, and desire of thy heart, has its effect, either in the height of heaven or the depth of hell. And as time is upon the wing to put an end to the strife of good and evil, and bring about the last great separation of all things into their eternal state, with such speed art thou making haste, either to be wholly an angel or wholly a devil. O! therefore awake, watch and pray, and join with all thy force with that goodness of God, which has created time and all things in it, to have a happy end in eternity.

10.—Temporal nature, opened to us by the Spirit of God, becomes a volume of holy instruction to us, and leads us into all the mysteries and secrets of eternity. For as everything in temporal nature is descended out of that which is eternal, and stands as a palpable visible outbirth of it, so when we know how to separate the grossness, death, and darkness of time from it, we find what it is in its eternal state. Fire, and light, and air in this world, are not only a true resemblance of the Holy Trinity in Unity, but are the Trinity itself in its most outward lowest kind of existence or manifestation; for there could be no fire, fire could not generate light, air could not proceed from both, these three could not be thus united, and thus divided, but because they have their root and original in the tri-unity of the Deity. Fire compacted, created, separated from light and air, is the elemental fire of this world: fire uncreated, uncompacted, unseparated from light and air, is the heavenly fire of eternity: fire kindled in any material thing is only fire breaking out of its created compacted state; it is nothing else but the awakening the spiritual properties of that thing, which being thus stirred up, strive to get rid of that material creation under which they are imprisoned: thus every kindled fire, with all its rage and fierceness, tears and divides, scatters and consumes that materiality under which it is imprisoned; and were not these spiritual properties imprisoned in matter, no material thing could be made to burn. And this is another proof, that the materiality of this world is come out of a higher and spiritual state; because every matter upon earth can be made to discover spiritual properties concealed in it, and is indeed a compaction of nothing else. Fire is not, cannot be, a material thing, it only makes itself visible and sensible by the destruction of matter. Matter is its death and imprisonment, and it comes to life but by being able to agitate, divide, shake off, and consume that matter which held it in death and bondage; so that every time you see a fire kindled, you see nature striving, in a low degree, to get rid of the grossness of this material creation, and to do that which can alone be done by the last fire, when all the inward spiritual properties hid in everything, in rocks, and stones, and earth, in sun, and stars, and elements, shall by the last trumpet be awakened and called forth. And this is a certain truth, that fire could nowhere now be kindled in any material thing, but for this reason, because all material nature was created to be restored, and stands by divine appointment in a fitness and tendency to have its deliverance from this created state by fire; so that every time you see a piece of matter dissolved by fire, you have a full proof that all the materiality of this world is appointed to a dissolution by fire; and that then (O, glorious day!) sun and stars, and all the elements, will be delivered from vanity, will be again that one eternal, harmonious, glorious thing which they were before they were compacted into material distinctions and separations.

11.—The elements of this world stand in great strife and contrariety, and yet in great desire of mixing and uniting with each other; and hence arise both the life and death of all temporal things. And hereby we plainly know that the elements of this world were once one undivided thing; for union can nowhere be desired, but where there has first been a separation. As sure, therefore, as the elements desire each other, so sure is it that they have been parted from each other, and are only parts of some one thing that has been divided. When the elements come to such a degree of union, a life is produced; but because they have still a contrariety to each other, they soon destroy again that same life which they had built, and therefore every four-elementary life is short and transitory.

Now from this undeniable state of nature we are told these following great truths: 1. That the four elements are only four parts of that which, before the creation of this world, was only a one element, or one undivided power of life. 2. That the mortality of this life is wholly and solely owing to the divided state of the elements. 3. That the true immortal life of nature is only there to be found, where the four elements are only one thing, mere unity and harmony; where fire and air, water and earth, have a much more glorious union than they have in diamonds and precious stones. For in the brightest diamonds the four elements still partake of their divided state, though to our eye they appear as only one glorious thing; but the beauty of the diamond is but a shadow, a low specimen of that glory which will shine through all nature, when fire and air, water and earth, shall be again that one thing which they were before the fall of angels and the creation of this world. 4. That the body of Adam (being formed for immortality,) could not possibly have the nature, or be made out of the divided state of the elements. The letter of Scripture absolutely demonstrates this; for if sickness, sorrow, pain, the trouble of heat and cold, all so many forerunners of death, can only be where the elements are in division and contrariety; and if, according to Scripture, these calamities did not, could not, possibly touch Adam till he fell, then it is plain from Scripture that, before his fall, the division and contrariety of the elements was not in him: and that was his paradisaical nature, in and by which he stood in a state of superiority over all the elements of this world. 5. That the body of Adam lost its one elementary glory and immortality, and then first became gross, dark, heavy flesh and blood, under the power of the four elements, when he lusted to eat, and actually did eat of that tree, which had its good and evil from the divided state of the elements. 6. Hence we also know, with the greatest certainty, the mystery of the resurrection of the body, that it consists wholly and solely in the reducing the four-elementary body of this world to its first one elementary state, and then every one has that same body raised again that died, and all that Adam lost is restored. For if the body is mortal, and dies because it is become a body of the four elements, it can only be raised immortal, by having its four elements reduced again into one. And here lies the true sameness of the body that died and that which rises again. But to proceed:

12.—As all the four elements, by their desiring, and wanting to be united together, prove, that they are only four grossly-divided out-births of that which before was only one heavenly harmonious element, so every single element fully demonstrates the same thing; for every single element, though standing in its created contrariety to every other, has yet in its own divided state all the four elements in itself: thus the air has every thing in it that is in the earth; and the earth has in itself everything that is in fire, water, and air, only in a different mixture and compaction. Were it not so, had not every element in some degree the whole nature of them all, they could not possibly mix and qualify with one another; and this may well pass for a demonstration, that that out of which the four elements are descended, was one harmonious union of them all, because every one of the four has now, and must have in its divided state, all the four in itself, though not in equality: for if the four must be together, though unequally lodged in every single element, it is plain the four must have been one harmonious thing, before they were brought into four unequal separations. And therefore, as sure as there are four warring disagreeing elements in time, so sure is it that that which is now in this fourfold division, was and is in eternity one, in an heavenly harmonious union, keeping up an eternal, joyful, glorious life in eternal nature, as its four broken parts bring forth a poor, miserable, transitory life in temporal nature.

13.—All matter in this world is only the materiality of heaven thus altered. The difference between matter in this world, and matter in the other world, lies wholly and solely in this; in the one it is dead, in the other it is living materiality. It is dead materiality in this world, because it is gross, dark, hard, heavy, divisible, etc. It is in this state of death, because it is separated or broken off from the eternal light, which is the true life or the power of life in everything.

In eternal nature or the kingdom of heaven, materiality stands in life and light; it is the light's glorious body, or that garment wherewith light is clothed, and therefore has all the properties of light in it, and only differs from light as it is its brightness and beauty, as the holder and displayer of all its colours, powers, and virtues. But the same materiality in this world, being created or compacted into a separation from fire united with light, is become the body of death and darkness, and is therefore gross, thick, dark, heavy, divisible, etc.; for death is nothing else but the shutting up, or shutting out the united power of fire and light. This is the only death that ever did, or can happen to any thing, whether earthly or heavenly. Therefore every degree of hardness, and darkness, stiffness, etc. is a degree of death; and herein consists the deadness of the materiality of this world. When it shall be raised to life, that is when the united power of fire and light shall kindle itself through all temporal nature, then hardness, darkness, divisibility, etc. will be all extinguished together.

That the deadness of the earth may, and certainly will be brought to life by the united power of fire and light, is sufficiently shown us by the nature and office of the sun. The sun is the united power of fire and light, and therefore the sun is the raiser of light out of the deadness of the earth; but because fire and light as united in the sun is only the virtue of temporary fire and light, so it can only raise a short and fading transitory life. But as sure as you see, that fire and light united in the sun can change the deadness of the earth into such a beautiful variety of a vegetable life, so sure are you, that this dark gross earth is in its state of death and darkness, only for this reason, because it is broken off from the united power of fire and light: for as sure as the outward operation of the fire and light of the sun can change the deadness of the earth into a degree of life, so sure is it that the earth lies in its present deadness, because it is separated from its own eternal fire and light: and as sure as you see that the fire and light of the sun can raise a temporal life out of the earth, so sure is it that the united power of eternal fire and light can, and will turn all that is earthly into its first state of life and beauty. For the sun of this world, as it is the union of temporal fire and light, has no power, but as it is the outward agent, or temporary representative of eternal fire and light, and therefore it can only do that in part, and imperfectly in time, which by the eternal fire and light will be wholly and perfectly done in eternity. And therefore every vegetable life, every beauty, power, and virtue which the sun calls forth out of the earth, tells us, with a divine certainty, that there will come a time when all that is hid in the deadness, grossness, and darkness of the earth, will be again called up to a perfection of life, and glory of beauty.

14.—How has the Philosophy of the schools been puzzled with the divisibility of matter! It is because human reason, the mistress of the schools, partakes of the deadness of the earth; and the soul of man must first have the light of eternal life rise up in it, before he can see or find out the truths of nature. Human reason knew nothing of the death of the matter, or the nature and reason of its temporary creation, and so thought death and divisibility to be essential to matter; but the light of God tells every man this infallible truth, that God made not death in any thing, that he is a God of life, and therefore everything that comes from him, comes into a state of life. Matter is thick, hard, heavy, divisible, and the like, only for a time, because it is compacted or created into thickness, hardness, and divisibility only for a time: these are only the properties of its temporal created state, and therefore are no more essential to it than the hardness of ice is essential to water. Now, that the creation of the matter of this world is nothing else but a compaction, that all the elements are separated compactings of that which before was free from such a compaction, is plain from Scripture. For we are told, that all the material things and elements of this world are to have their created state and nature taken from them, by being dissolved or melted: but if this be a Scripture truth, then it is equally true from Scripture, that their creation was only a compaction, and a compaction of something that stood before, according to its own nature, absolutely free from it. Mortality, corruptibility, and divisibility, are not essential properties, but temporary accidents, they are in things, as diseases and sickness are, and are as separable from them; and that is the true reason why this mortal can put on immortality, this corruptible can put on incorruptibility, and this divisible put on indivisibility: for when the four elements shall be dissolved and loosed from their separate compaction from one another, when fire and air, water and earth, shall be a one much more glorious and harmonious thing than they are now in the brightest diamond, then the divisibility of this redeemed materiality will be more impossible to be conceived, than the distance between fire and water in a diamond.

15.—The reason why all inanimate things of this world tend towards their utmost perfection in their kind, lieth wholly and solely in this ground; it is because the four elements of this world were once the one element of the kingdom of the fallen angels; and therefore nature in this world is always labouring after its first perfection of life, or as the Scripture speaks, the whole creation travaileth in pain, and groaneth to be delivered from its present vanity: and therefore it is, that all vegetables and fruits naturally grasp after every kind and degree of perfection they can take in; endeavouring, with all their power, after that first perfection of life which was before the fall of the angels. Every taste, and colour, and power, and virtue, would be what it was before Lucifer kindled his dark, fiery, wrathful kingdom; but as this cannot be, so when every fruit and flower has worked itself as far towards a heavenly perfection as it can, it is forced to wither and rot, and become a witness to this truth, that neither flesh nor blood, nor fruit, nor flower, can reach the kingdom of God.

16.—All the misery and imperfection that are in temporary nature arise from the divided state of the elements: their division is that which brings all kinds and degrees of death and hell into this world, and yet there being in a certain degree in one another, and always endeavouring after their first union, is so much of the nature and perfection of heaven still in them. The death that is in this world, consists in the grossness, hardness, and darkness of its materiality. The wrath that is in this world consists in the kindled division of its qualities, whence there arise a contrary motion and fermentation in all its parts, in which consist both the life and death of all its creatures. This death and this wrath are the nature of hell in this world, and are the manifestation of the disorders which the fallen angels have occasioned in Nature. The heaven in this world began when God said, let there be light, for so far as light is in anything, so much it has of heaven in it, and of the beginning of a heavenly life: this shows itself in all things of this world, chiefly in the life-giving power of the sun, in the sweetness and meekness of qualities and tempers, in the softness of sounds, the beauty of colours, the fragrance of smells, and richness of tastes, and the like; as far as anything is tinctured with light, so far it shows its descent from heaven, and its partaking of something heavenly and paradisaical. Again, love or desire of union is the other part of heaven that is visible in this world. In things without life it is a senseless desire, a friendly mixing and uniting of their qualities, whereby they strive to be again in that first state of unity and harmony, in which they existed before they were kindled into division by Lucifer. In rational creatures, it is meekness, benevolence, kindness, and friendship among one another: and thus far they have heaven and the Spirit of God in them, each in their sphere, being and doing that to one another, which the divine love is and does to all.

Again, the reason why man is naturally taken with beautiful objects, why he admires and rejoices at the sight of lucid and transparent bodies, and the splendor of precious stones, why he is delighted with the beauty of his own person, and is fond of his features when adorned with fine colours, has this only true ground,—it is because he was created in the greatest perfection of beauty, to live among all the beauties of a glorious paradise: and therefore man, though fallen, has this strong sensibility, and reaching desire after all the beauties that can be picked up in fallen nature. Had not this been his case, had not beauty and light, and the glory of brightness been his first state by creation, he would now no more want the beauty of objects, than the ox wants to have his pasture enclosed with beautiful walls and painted gates. Every vanity of fallen man shows our first dignity, and the vanities of our desires are so many proofs of the reality of that which we are fallen from. Man wants to see himself in riches, greatness, and power, because human nature came first into the world in that state; and therefore what he had in reality in paradise, that he is vainly seeking for, where he is only a poor prisoner in the valley and shadow of death.

17.—All beings, that are purely of this world, have their existence in, and dependence upon temporal nature. God is no maker, creator, or governor of any being or creature of this world, immediately, or by himself, but he creates, upholds, and governs all things of this world, by, and through, and with temporal nature: as temporary nature is nothing else but eternal nature separated, divided, compacted, made visible, and changeable for a time, so heaven is nothing else but the beatific visibility, the majestic presence of the abyssal, unsearchable, triune God: it is that light with which the Scripture saith, God is decked as with a garment, and by which he is manifested and made visible to heavenly eyes and beings; for Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as they are the triune God, deeper than the kingdom of heaven or eternal nature, are invisible to all created eyes; but that beatific visibility and outward glory, which is called the kingdom of heaven, is the manifestation of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in, and by, and through the glorious union of eternal fire, and light, and spirit. In the kingdom of heaven these are three and one, because their Original, the Holy Trinity, is so; and we must call them by the names of fire, and light, and spirit, because all that we have of fire, and light, and spirit in this world, has its whole nature directly from them, and is indeed nothing else but the fire, and light, and spirit of eternity, brought into a separated, compacted, temporal state. So that to speak of a heavenly fire has no more grossness and offence in it, than when we speak of a heavenly life, a heavenly light, or heavenly spirit; for if there is a heavenly light and spirit, there must of all necessity be a heavenly fire; and if these things were not in heaven in a glorious state of union, they never could have been here in this gross state of a temporal compaction and division: so that as sure as there are fire, and light, and air in this world, in a divided, compacted, imperfect state, in which consists the life of temporary nature and creatures, so sure is it, that fire, and light, and spirit, are in the kingdom of heaven, united in one perfection of glory, in which consists the beatific visibility of God, the Divine nature as communicable to heavenly beings.

18.—The kingdom of heaven stands in this threefold life, where three are one, because it is a manifestation of the Deity, which is three and one; the Father has his distinct manifestation in the fire, which is always generating the light; the Son has his distinct manifestation in the light, which is always generated from the fire; the Holy Ghost has his manifestation in the spirit, that always proceeds from both, and is always united with them.

It is this Eternal Unbeginning Trinity in Unity of fire, light, and spirit, that constitutes eternal nature, the kingdom of heaven, the heavenly Jerusalem, the divine life, the beatific visibility, the majestic glory and presence of God. Through this kingdom of heaven, or eternal nature, is the invisible God, the incomprehensible Trinity eternally breaking forth, and manifesting itself in a boundless height and depth of blissful wonders, opening and displaying itself to all its creatures in an infinite variation and endless multiplicity of its powers, beauties, joys, and glories. So that all the inhabitants of heaven are for ever knowing, seeing, hearing, feeling, and variously enjoying all that is great, amiable, infinite, and glorious in the Divine nature!

Nothing ascends, or comes into this kingdom of heaven, but that which descended or came out of it; all its inhabitants must be innate guests, and born out of it.

19.—God considered in himself, as distinct from this eternal nature or kingdom of heaven, is not the immediate creator of any angels, spirits, or divine beings; but as he creates and governs all temporal beings in, and by, and out of temporal nature, so he creates and governs all spiritual and heavenly beings in, and by, and out of eternal nature: this is as absolutely true, as that no being can be temporal but by partaking of temporal nature; nor any being eternal but by partaking of the eternal divine nature; and therefore, whatever God creates, is not created immediately by himself, but in and by, and out of that nature in which it is to live, and move, and have its being, temporal beings out of temporal nature, and eternal beings out of the heavenly kingdom of eternal nature: And hence it is, that all angels, and the souls of men, are said to be born of God, sons of God, and partakers of the Divine nature, because they are formed out of that eternal nature, which is the unbeginning majesty of God, the kingdom of heaven, or visible glory of the Deity. In this eternal nature, which is the majestic clothing, or glory of the Triune God, manifested in the glorious Unity of divine fire, light, and spirit, have all the created images of God, whether they be angels or men, their existence, union, and communion with God; because fire, and light, and spirit, have the same union and birth in the creature as in the creator: and hence it is, that they are so many various mirrors of the Deity, penetrated with the majesty of God, receiving and returning back communications of the life of God. Now in this ground, that is, in this consideration of God, as manifesting his Holy Trinity through nature and creature, lieth the solid and true understanding of all that is so variously said of God, both in the Old and New Testament, with relation to mankind as to their creation, fall, and redemption. God is to be considered throughout as the God of Nature, only manifesting himself to all his creatures in a variety of attributes in and by nature, creating, governing, blessing, punishing, and redeeming them according to the powers, workings and possibilities of nature. Fire, light, and spirit in harmonious union, are the substantial glory, the beatific manifestation of the triune God, visible and communicable to creatures formed out of it. All intelligent holy beings were by God formed and created out of, and for the enjoyment of this kingdom of glory, and had fire and light, and spirit, as the triune glory of the created being: and herein consisted the infinite love, goodness, and bounty of God to all his creatures: it was their being made creatures of this fire, light, and spirit, partakers of that same nature in which the Holy Trinity had stood from all eternity gloriously manifested. And thus they were creatures, subjects, and objects of the Divine love; they came into the nearest, highest relation to God: they stood in, and partook of, his own manifested nature, so that the outward glory and majesty of the triune God, was the very form, and beauty, and brightness of their own created nature. Every creature which thankfully, joyfully, and absolutely gave itself up to this blessed union with God, became absolutely fixed in its first created glory, and incapable of knowing anything but love, and joy, and happiness in God to all eternity: thus in this state all angels and men came first out of the hands of God. But seeing light proceeds from fire by a birth, and the spirit from both, and seeing the will must be the leader of the birth, Lucifer and Adam could both do as they did, Lucifer could will strong might and power, to be greater than the light of God made him, and so he brought forth a birth of might and power, that was only mighty wrath and darkness, a fire of nature broken off from its light. Adam could will the knowledge of temporal nature, and so he lost the light and spirit of heaven for the light and spirit of this world: and had man been left in this state of temporary nature, without a redeemer, he must, when the light of this world had left him, have found himself in the same absolute wrath and darkness of nature, which the fallen angels are in.

20.—Now after these two falls of two orders of creatures, the Deity itself came to have new and strange names, new and unheard of tempers and inclinations of wrath, fury, and vengeance ascribed to it. I call them new, because they began at the fall; I call them strange, because they were foreign to the Deity, and could not belong to God in himself: thus God is, in the Scriptures, said to be a consuming fire. But to whom? to the fallen angels, and lost souls. But why, and how is he so to them? it is because those creatures have lost all that they had from God but fire; and therefore God can only be found and manifested in them as a consuming fire. Now is it not justly said, that God, who is nothing but infinite Love, is yet in such creatures only a consuming fire, and that though God be nothing but Love, yet they are under the wrath and vengeance of God, because they have only that fire in them, which is broken off from the light and love of God, and so can know, or feel nothing of God, but his fire in them? as creatures they can have no life but what they have in and from God; and therefore that wrathful life which they have, is truly said to be a wrath of God upon them. And yet it is as strictly true, that there is no wrath in God himself, that he is not changed in his temper towards the creatures, that he does not cease to be one and the same infinite fountain of Goodness, infinitely flowing forth in the riches of his love upon all and every life; but the creatures have changed their state in nature, and so the God of nature can only be manifested in and to them, according to their own state in nature: and this is the true ground of rightly understanding all that is said of the wrath and vengeance of God in and upon the creatures. It is only in such a sense, as the curse or unhappiness of God may be said to be upon them, not because any thing cursed or unhappy can be in, or come from God, but because they have made that life, which they must have in God, to be mere curse and unhappiness to them: for every creature that lives must have its life in and from God, and therefore God must be in every creature; this is as true of devils, as of holy angels: but how is God in them? why, only as he is manifested in nature. Holy angels have the triune life of God in them, therefore God is in them all, love, goodness, majesty, and glory, and theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Devils have nothing of this triune life left in them, but the fire of eternal nature broken off from all light and joy; and, therefore, the light that they can have in and from God is only a life of wrath and darkness, and theirs is the kingdom of hell: and because this life is a strength of life which they must have in and from God, and which they cannot take out of his hands, therefore is their cursed, miserable, wrathful life, truly and justly said to be the curse, and wrath, and vengeance of God in and upon them, though God himself can no more have wrath and vengeance, than he can have mischievous and malice in him: for this is a glorious twofold truth, that from God, considered as in himself, nothing can come from eternity to eternity but infinite love, goodness, happiness, and glory; and also that infinite love, goodness, happiness, and glory, are and will be for ever and ever flowing forth from him in the same boundless, universal, infinite manner; he is the same infinitely overflowing fountain of love, goodness, and glory after, as before the fall of any creatures; his Love, and the infinite workings of it, can no more be lessened, than his power can be increased by any outward thing; no creature, or number of creatures can raise any anger in him; it is as impossible, as to cast terror, or darkness and pain into him, for nothing can come into God from the creature, nothing can be in him, but that which the Holy Trinity in Unity is in itself. All creatures are products of the infinite triune love of God; nothing willed, and desired, and formed them, but infinite love; and they have all of them all the happiness, beauty, and excellency that an infinitely powerful love can reach out to them: the same infinite Love continues still in its first creating goodness, willing, desiring, working, and doing nothing with regard to all creatures but what it willed, did, and desired in the creation of them: this God, over nature and creature, darts no more anger at angels when fallen, than he did in the creation of them: they are not in hell because Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are angry at them, and so cast them into a punishment which their wrath had contrived for them; but they are in wrath and darkness, because they have done to the light, which infinitely flows forth from God, as that man does to the light of the sun, who puts out his own eyes: he is in darkness, not because the sun is darkened towards him, has less light for him, or has lost all inclination to enlighten him, but because he has put out that birth of light in himself, which alone made him capable of seeing in the light of the sun. It is thus with fallen angels; they have extinguished in themselves that birth of light and love, which was their only capacity for that happiness, which infinitely and everywhere flows forth from God; and they no more have their punishment from God himself, than the man who puts out his eyes has his darkness from the sun itself. —

21.—God, considered in himself, as the holy triune God, is not the immediate fountain and original of creatures: but God, considered as manifesting himself in, and through nature, is the creator, father, and producer of all things. The hidden Deity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is from eternity to eternity, manifested, made visible, perceivable, sensible, in the united glory of fire, light, and spirit; this is the beatific presence, the glorious out-birth of the Holy Trinity; this is that eternal, universal nature, which brings God into all creatures, and all creatures into God, according to that degree and manner of life which they have in nature: for the life of creatures must stand in nature, and nature is nothing else but God made manifest, visible, and perceptible; and, therefore, the life of every creature, be it what it will, a life of joy or wrath, is only so much of God made manifest in it, and perceptible by it, and thus is God in some creatures only a God of wrath, and in others, only a God of glory and goodness.

No creature can have life, or live, and move and have its being in God, but by being formed out of, and living in this manifestation of Nature. Thus far hell and heaven, angels and devils, are equally in God, that is, they equally live, move, and have their being in that eternal nature, which is the eternal manifestation of God: the one have a life of glory, majesty, and love, and bliss; the other a life of horror, fire, wrath, misery, and darkness. Now all this could not possibly be, there could be no room for this distinction between creatures standing in nature, the one could not possibly have a life of majestic bliss and glory, the other of fiery horror and darkness, but because the holy triune God is manifested in the united glory and bliss of fire, light, and spirit. For the creatures could only divide that which was in Nature to be divided, they could only divide that which was united and divisible; and, therefore, as sure as heaven is a splendorous light of blissful majesty, as sure as hell is a place of fiery wrath and darkness, so sure is it from the Scriptures, that the eternal nature, which is from God, or a manifestation of God, is a nature of united fire, light, and spirit, otherwise, some creatures could not have the blissful glory of light, and others a horrible fiery darkness for their separate portions.

All, therefore, that has been said of an eternal nature or kingdom of heaven, consisting of united fire, light, and spirit, is not only to be looked upon as an opinion well grounded, and sufficiently discovered by the light of nature, but as a fundamental truth of revealed religion, fully established by all that is said in the Scriptures both of heaven and hell. For if God was not manifested, visible, perceptible, and communicable, in and by this united fire, and light and spirit, how could there be a heaven of glorious majesty? If this fire of heaven could not be separated, or broken off from its heavenly light, how could there be a hell in nature? or, how could those angels which lost the light of heaven, have thereby fallen into a state of hellish darkness or fire? Is not all this the greatest of demonstrations that the holy Trinity of God is, and must be manifested in nature, by the union of fire, light, and spirit? And is not this demonstration wholly taken from the very letter of the most plain doctrines of Scripture?

Hell and wrath could have no possibility of existence, but because the light, and majesty, and glory of heaven, must of all necessity have its birth in and from the fire of nature. An angel could not have become a devil, but because the angelic light and glory had, and must have its birth in and from the fire of life. And thus as a devil was found, where angelic light and glory had its existence, so a hell was found, where heavenly glory was before; and as the devil is nothing but a fire spirit broken off from its angelical light and glory, so hell is nothing but the fire of heaven separated from its first light and majesty.

And here we have plainly found TWO WORLDS in eternity; not possible to be two, nor ever known to be two, but by such creatures, as have in their own natures, by their own self motion, separated the fire of eternal nature from its eternal light, spirit, and majesty. And this is also the beginning or first opening of the wrath of God in the creature; which is, in other words, only the beginning, or first opening of pain and misery in the creature, or the origin of a hellish, tormenting state of life.

22.—And here, in this dark wrathful fire of the fallen creature, do we truly find that wrath, and anger, and vengeance of God, that cleave to sin, that must be quenched, atoned, and satisfied, before the sinner can be reconciled to God; that is, before it can have again that triune life of God in it, which is its union with the holy Trinity of God, or its regaining the kingdom of heaven in itself.

Some have objected, that by thus considering the fallen soul as a dark wrathful fire spirit, for this reason,—because it has lost the birth of the Son and Holy Spirit of God in it, that this casts reproach upon God the Father, as having the nature of such a soul in him. But this is a groundless objection; for this state of the soul casts no more reproach upon the first, than upon the second and third persons of the holy Trinity. The fallen soul, that has lost the birth of the Son and Holy Spirit of God in it, cannot be said to have the nature of the Father left in it. This would be blasphemous nonsense, and is no way founded on this doctrine. But such a soul must be said to have a nature from the Father, left in it, though a spoiled one, and this because the Father is the origin, fountain, and creator of all kind of existence: Hell and the devils have their nature from Him, because every kind of creature must have what it has of life and being from their nature from Him, and the devils have not therefore the nature of the Father in them. If it be asked, what the Father is, as he is the first person in the sacred Trinity, the answer must be, that as such he is the Generator of the Son and Holy Spirit: this is the nature of the Father: where this generating is not, there is not the nature of the Father. Is it not therefore highly absurd to charge this doctrine with ascribing the nature of the Father to the fallen soul, which asserts the soul to be fallen, for this reason, because it has quite lost and extinguished all power and ability for the birth of the Son and Holy Spirit in it? How could it be more roundly affirmed, or more fully proved, that the fallen soul hath not the nature of the Father left in it. But to proceed:—

which is here used to denote the true nature and state of the soul. For both nature and Scripture speak continually the same language. For wherever there is mention of life, light, or love in the Scriptures, there fire is necessarily supposed, as being that in which all life, and light, and love, must necessarily arise; and therefore the Scriptures speak as often of fire, as they do of life, and light, and love; because the one necessarily includes the other. For all life, whether it be vegetable, sensitive, animal, or intellectual, is only a kindled fire of life in such a variety of states; and every dead insensitive thing is only so, because its fire is quenched, or shut up in a hard compaction. If, therefore, we will speak of the true ground of the fallen state of men and angels, we are not at liberty to think of it under any other idea, or speak of it in any other manner, than as the darkened fire of their life, or the fire of their life unable to kindle itself into light and love. Do not the Scriptures strictly confine us to this idea of hell? So that it is not any particular philosophy, or affected singularity of expression, that makes me speak in this manner of the soul, but because all nature and Scripture force us to confess that the root of all and every life stands, and must necessarily stand, in the properties of fire.

The holy Scriptures also speak much of fire, in the ideas which they give us both of the divine nature, and of created spirits, whether they be saved or lost; the former as becoming flames of heavenly light and love, the latter as dark firebrands of hell.*

No description is or can be given us, either of heaven or hell, but where fire is necessarily signified to be the ground and foundation both of the one and of the other. Why do all languages, however distant and different from one another, all speak of the coldness of death, the coldness of insensibility? Why do they all agree in speaking of the warmth of life, the heat of passions, the burnings of wrath, the flames of love? It is because it is the voice or dictate of universal nature, that fire is the root or seat of life, and that all the varieties of human tempers are only the various workings of the fire of life.—It ought to be no reason why we should think grossly of fire, because it is seen in so many gross things of this world? For how is it seen in them? Why only as a destroyer, a consumer, and refiner of all grossness; as a kindler of life, and light, out of death and darkness. So that in all the appearances of fire, even in earthly things, we have reason to look upon it as something of a heavenly, exalting, and glorious nature; as that which disperses death, darkness, and grossness, and raises up the power and glory of every life.

If you ask what fire is in its first, true, and unbeginning state, not yet entered into any creature; it is the power and strength, the glory and majesty of eternal nature; it is that which generates, enriches, brightens, strengthens, and displays the light of heaven. It is that which makes the eternal light to be majestic, the eternal love to be flaming: for the strength and vivacity of fire, must be both the majesty of light and the ardour of love. It is the glorious out-birth, the true representative of God the Father, eternally generating his only Son, Light, and Word.

If you ask what fire is in its own spiritual nature; it is merely a desire, and has no other nature than that of a working desire, which is continually its own kindler. For every desire is nothing else but its own striking up, or its own kindling itself into some kind and degree of fire. And hence it is that Nature (though reduced to great ignorance of itself) has yet forced all nations and languages to speak of its desires as cool, warming, or burning, etc., because every desire is, so far as it goes, a kindled fire. And it is to be observed, that fire could have no existence or operation in material things, but because all the matter of this world has in it more or less of spiritual and heavenly properties compacted in it, which continually desire to be delivered from their material imprisonment. And the stirring up the desire of these spiritual properties is the kindling of that heat, and glance, and light, in material things, which we call fire, and is nothing else but their gloriously breaking, and triumphantly dispersing that hard compaction in which they were imprisoned. And thus does every kindled fire, as a flash or transitory opening of heavenly glory, show us in little and daily, but true instances, the triumph of the last fire, when all that is spiritual and heavenly in this world shall kindle and separate itself from that, which must be the death and darkness of hell.

Now the reason why there are spiritual properties in all the material things of this world, is only this, it is because the matter of this world is the materiality of the kingdom of heaven, brought down into a created state of grossness, death, and imprisonment, by occasion of the sin of those angels who first inhabited the place or extent of this material world.

Now these heavenly properties, which were brought into this created compaction, lie in a continual desire to return to their first state of glory; and this is the groaning of the whole creation to be delivered from vanity, which the apostle speaks of. And in this continual desire lieth the kindling, and all the possibility of kindling any fire in the things of this world. Quench this desire, and suppose there is nothing in the matter of this world that desires to be restored to its first glory, and then all the breaking forth of fire, light, brightness, and glance, in the things of this world, is utterly quenched with it, and it would be the same impossibility to strike fire, as to strike sense and reason out of a flint.—

24.—You will perhaps say, though this be a truth, yet it is more speculative than edifying, more fitted to entertain the curiosity, than to assist the devotion of Christians. But stay awhile, and you shall see it is a truth full of the most edifying instruction, and directly speaking to the heart.

For if every desire is in itself, in its own essence, the kindling of fire, then we are taught this great practical lesson, that our own desire is the kindler of our own fire, the former and raiser of that life which leads us. What our desire kindles, that becomes the fire of our life, and fits us either for the majestic glories of the kingdom of God, or the dark horrors of hell: so that our desire is all, it does all, and governs all, and all that we have and are must arise from it, and therefore it is that the Scripture saith, keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life.

We are apt to think that our imaginations and desires may be played with, that they rise and fall away as nothing, because they do not always bring forth outward and visible effects. But, indeed, they are the greatest reality we have, and are the true formers and raisers of all that is real and solid in us. All outward power that we exercise in the things about us, is but as a shadow, in comparison of that inward power that resides in our will, imagination, and desires; these communicate with eternity, and kindle a life* which always reaches either heaven or hell. This strength of the inward man makes all that is the angel, and all that is the devil in us, and we are neither good nor bad, but according to the working of that which is spiritual and invisible in us. Now our desire is not only thus powerful and productive of real effects, but it is always alive, always working and creating in us, I say creating, for it has no less power, it perpetually generates either life or death in us. And here lies the ground of the great efficacy of prayer, which when it is the prayer of the heart, the prayer of faith, has a kindling and creating power, and forms and transforms the soul into everything that its desires reach after: It has the key to the kingdom of heaven, and un-

* Here we obtain a clear view of the ground and nature of 'ENTHUSIASM.'—In will, imagination, and desire, as already observed, consists the life, or fiery driving of every intelligent creature. And as every intelligent creature is its own self-mover, so every intelligent creature has a power of kindling and inflaming its will, imagination, and desire, as it pleases, with shadows, fictions, or realities; with things carnal or spiritual, temporal or eternal. And this kindling of the will, imagination, and desire, when raised into a ruling degree of life, is properly that which is to be understood by enthusiasm: and therefore enthusiasm is, and must be of as many kinds as those objects are which can kindle and inflame the wills, imaginations, and desires of men. And to appropriate enthusiasm to religion, is the same ignorance of Nature, as to appropriate love to religion; for enthusiasm, a kindled, inflamed spirit of life, is as common, as universal, as essential to human nature, as love is? It goes into every kind of life as love does, and has only such a variety of degrees in mankind as love hath. And here we may see the reason, why no people are so angry at religious enthusiasts, as those that are the deepest in some enthusiasm of another kind.

He whose fire is kindled from the divinity of Tully's rhetoric, who travels over high mountains to salute the dear ground that Marcus Tullius Cicero walked upon; whose noble soul would be ready to break out of his body if he could see a desk, a rostrum from whence Cicero had poured forth his thunder of words, may well be unable to bear the dulness of those who go on pilgrimages only to visit the sepulchre whence the Redeemer of the world rose from the dead, or who grow devout at the sight of a crucifix, because the Son of God hung as a sacrifice thereon.

He whose heated brain is all over painted with the ancient hieroglyphics; who knows how and why they were this and that, better than he can find out the customs and usages of his own parish; who can clear up every thing that is doubtful in antiquity, and yet be forced to live in doubt about that which passes in his own neighbourhood; who has found out the sentiments of the first philosophers with such certainty, as he cannot find out the real opinions of any of his contemporaries; he that has gone thus high into the clouds, and dug thus deep into the dark for these glorious discoveries, may well despise those Christians, as brain-sick visionaries, who are sometimes finding a moral and spiritual sense in the bare letter and history of Scripture facts.

It matters not what our wills and imaginations are employed about; wherever they fall and love to dwell, there they kindle a fire, and that becomes the flame of life, to which everything else appears as dead, and insipid, and unworthy of regard. Hence it is that even the poor species of fops and beaux have a right to be placed among enthusiasts, though capable of no other flame than that which is kindled by tailors and peruke-makers. All refined speculatists, as such, are great enthusiasts; for being devoted to the exercise of their imaginations, they are so heated into a love of their own ideas, that they seek no other summum bonum. The grammarians, the critic, the poet, the connoisseur, the antiquary, the philosopher, the transcendentalist, the politician, are all violent enthusiasts, though their heat is only a flame from straw, and therefore they all agree in appropriating enthusiasm to religion. All ambitious, proud, self-conceited persons, especially if they are scholars, are violent enthusiasts; and their enthusiasm is an inflamed self-love, self-esteem, and self-seeking. This fire is so kindled in them, that everything is nauseous and disgusting to them, that does not offer incense to that idol which their imagination has set up in themselves. All atheists are dark enthusiasts; their fire is kindled by a will and imagination turned from God into a gloomy depth of nothingness, and therefore their enthusiasm is a dull burning fire, that goes in and out through hopes and fears of they know not what there is to come. All professed infidels are remarkable enthusiasts; they have kindled a bold fire from a few faint ideas, and therefore they are all zeal, and courage, and industry, to be constantly blowing it up. A Tyndal and a Collins are as inflamed with the notions of infidelity, as a St. Bennet and St. Francis with the doctrines of the Gospel.

Enthusiasts therefore we all are, as certainly as we are men; and consequently, enthusiasm is not a thing blameable in itself, but is the common condition of human life in all its states; and every man that lives either well or ill, is that which he is, from that prevailing fire of life, or driving of our wills and desires, which is properly called Enthusiasm. You need not, then, go to a cloister, the cell of a monk, or to a field preacher, to see enthusiasts; they are everywhere, at balls locks all its treasures ; it opens, extends, and moves that in us which has its being and motion in and with the Divine nature, and so brings us into a real union and communion with God.

Long offices of prayer, sounded only from the mouth, or impure hearts, may year after year be repeated to no advantage : they leave us to grow old in our own poor, weak state. These are only the poor prayers of heathens, who, as our Lord said, think to be heard by their much speaking. But when the eternal springs of the purified heart are stirred, when they stretch after that God from whence they came, then it is that what we ask we receive, and what we seek we find. Hence it is that all those great things are by the Scriptures attributed to faith, that to it all things are possible ; that it heals the sick, saves the sinner, can remove mountains, and that all things are possible to him that believeth ; it is because the working of will and desire is the first eternal source of all power,—that from which everything is kindled into that degree of life in which it standeth ; it is because will and desire, in us, are creaturely offsprings of that first Will and Desire which formed and governs all things ; and therefore when the creaturely power of our will, imagination, and desire leaves off its working in vanity, and gives itself wholly unto God in a naked and implicit faith, in the divine operation upon it, then it is that it does nothing in vain,—it rises out of time into eternity,—is in union and communion with God, and so all things are possible to it. Thus is this doctrine so far from being vainly speculative, that it opens to us the ground, and shows us the necessity and excellence of the greatest duties of the gospel.—

25.—Now as all desire throughout nature and creature is but one and the same thing, branching itself out into various kinds and degrees of existence and operation, so there is but one fire throughout all nature and creature, standing only in different states and conditions. The fire that is in the light of the sun, is the same fire that is in the darkness of the flint : that fire which is the life of our bodies is the life of our souls ; that which tears wood in pieces is the same which upholds the beauteous forms of angels : it is the same fire that burns straw, that will at last melt the sun ; the same fire, that brightens a diamond, is darkened in a flint : it is the same fire that kindles life in an animal, that kindled it in angels ; in an angel it is an eternal fire of an eternal life, in an animal it is the same fire brought into a temporary condition, and therefore can only kindle a life that is and masquerades, at court and the exchange : they sit in all coffee-houses, and cant in all assemblies. The beau and the coquet have no magic, but where they meet enthusiasts. The mercator, the tailor, the bookseller, have all their wealth from them ; the works of a Bayle, a Shaftsbury, and a Cicero, would lose four-fifths of their astonishing beauties, had they not keen enthusiasts for their readers.

That which concerns us, therefore, is only to see with what materials our prevailing fire of life is kindled, and in what species of enthusiasts it truly places us. For either the flesh or the spirit, either the wisdom from above, or the wisdom of this world, will have its fire in us : and we must have a life that governs us, either according to the sensuality of the beast, the subtlety of the serpent, or the holiness of the angel.—Enthusiasm is not blameable in religion, when it is true Religion that kindles it. We are created with *will*s and desires for no other end, but to love, adore, desire, serve, and co-operate with God ; and therefore the more we are inflamed in this motion of our wills and desires, the more we have of a God-like, divine nature and perfection in us. Religious enthusiasm is not blameable, when it is a strong persuasion, a firm belief of a continual operation, impression, and influence from above, when it is a total resignation to, and dependence upon the immediate inspiration and guidance of the Holy Spirit, in the whole course of our lives ; this is as sober and rational a belief, as to believe that we always live, and move, and have our being in God. Both nature and Scripture demonstrate this to be the true spirit of a religious man. Nature tells every one, that we can only be heavenly by a spirit derived from heaven, as plainly as it tells us, that we can only be earthly by having the spirit of this world breathing in us. The Gospel teaches no truth so constantly, so universally as this, that every good thought and good desire are the work of the Holy Spirit. And therefore both nature and Scripture demonstrate, that the one only way to piety, virtue, and holiness, is to prepare, expect, and resign ourselves up wholly to the influence and guidance of the Holy Spirit, in every thing that we think, or say, or do. The moment any one departs from this faith, or loses this direction of his will and desire, so far, and so long, he goes out of the one only element of all holiness of life.—There is nothing that so sanctifies the heart of man, that keeps us in such habitual love, prayer, and delight in God ; nothing that so kills all the roots of evil in our nature, that so renews and perfects all our virtues, that fills us with so much love, goodness, and good wishes to every creature, as this faith, that God is always present in us with his Light and Holy Spirit. When the heart has once learnt thus to find God, and knows how to live everywhere, and in all things, in this immediate intercourse with him, seeing him, loving him, and adoring him in everything, trusting in him, depending upon him for his continual Light and Holy Spirit : when it knows that this faith is infallible, that by thus believing, it thus possesses all that it believes of God ; then it begins to have the nature of God in it, and can do nothing but flow forth in love, benevolence, and good will towards every creature ; it can have no wish towards any man, but that he might thus know, and love, and find God in himself, as the true beginning of heaven and the heavenly life in the soul.

On the other hand, no error is so hurtful to the soul, so destructive of all the ends of the Gospel, as to be led from this faith and entire dependence upon the Holy Spirit of God within us, or to place our recovery in anything else, but in the operation of the Light and Holy Spirit of God upon the soul. It is withdrawing men not only from the easiest, the most natural, the most fruitful, but the only possible source of all light and life. For every man, as such, has an open gate to God in his soul : he is always in that temple where he can worship God in spirit and truth. Every Christian, as such, has the first fruits of the Spirit, a seed of Life, which is his call and qualification to be always in a state of inward prayer, faith, and holy intercourse with God. All the ordinances of the gospel, the daily sacramental service of the church, is to keep up, and exercise, and strengthen, this faith ; to raise us to such an habitual faith and dependence upon the Light and Holy Spirit of God, that by thus seeking and finding God in the institutions of the church, we may be habituated to seek him and find him ; to live in his light, and walk by his Spirit in ALL the actions of our ordinary life. This is the ENTHUSIASM in which every good Christian ought to ENDEAVOUR TO LIVE AND DIE.

temporary : The same fire, that is mere wrath in a devil, is the sweetness of flaming love in an angel ; and the SAME FIRE, WHICH IS THE MAJESTIC GLORY OF HEAVEN, MAKES THE HORROR OF HELL.

The following extract speaks for itself. That portion of it, however, which more properly belongs to this place, commences with "Nature is at first only spiritual," and ends with "from one and the same cause."

You had no occasion to make any apology for the manner of your letter to me ; for though you very well know, that I have as utter an aversion to waste my time and thoughts in matters of theological debate, as in any contentions merely of a worldly nature, as knowing that the former are generally as much, if not more, hurtful to the heart of man than the latter ; yet, as your objections rather tend to stir up the powers of love, than the wrangle of a rational debate, so I consider them only as motives and occasions of edifying both you and myself with the truth, the power, and divine blessedness of ~~the Spirit of Love~~ the Spirit of Love.

You say, "There is nothing in all my writings that has more affected you than that spirit of love that breathes in them ; and that you wish for nothing so much as to have a living sensibility of the power, life, and religion of Love. But you have this grand objection often rising in your mind : that this doctrine of pure and universal Love may be too refined and imaginary ; because you find, that however you like it, yet you cannot attain to it, or overcome all that in your nature which is contrary to it, do what you can ; and so are only able to be an admirer of that Love which you can not lay hold of."

Thus stands your objection, which will fall into nothing, as soon as you look at it from a right point of view : which will then be, as soon as you have found the true ground of the nature, power and necessity of the blessed Spirit of love.

Now, ~~therefore~~ the Spirit of Love has this original. GOD, as considered in himself, in his holy being, before anything is brought forth by him, or out of him, is only an eternal Will to All Goodness. This is the one eternal, immutable God, that from eternity to eternity changeth not, that can be neither more nor less, nor anything else, but an eternal will to all the goodness that is in himself, and can come from him. The creation of ever so many worlds, or systems of creatures, adds nothing to, nor takes anything from, this immutable God : he always was, and always will be, the same immutable will to all goodness. So that as certainly as he is the Creator, so certainly is he the blesser of every created thing, and can give nothing but blessing, goodness, and happiness, from himself, because he has in himself nothing else to give. It is much more possible for the sun to give forth darkness, than for God to do, or be, or give forth, anything but blessing and goodness. Now this is the ground and original of the Spirit of love in the creature ; it is and must be a will to all goodness, and you have not the Spirit of love till you have this will to all goodness at all times, and on all occasions. You may indeed do many works of Love, and delight in them, especially at such times as they are not inconvenient to you, or contradictory to your state, or temper, or occurrences in life. But the Spirit of love is not in you, till it is the spirit of your life, till you live freely, willingly, and universally, according to it. For every spirit acts with freedom and universality according to what it is. It needs no command to live its own life, or be what it is, no more than you need bid wrath be wrathful. And therefore when Love is the Spirit of your life, it will have the freedom and universality of a spirit ; it will always live and work in love, not because of this or that, here or there, but because the Spirit of love can only love, wherever it is or goes, or whatever is done to it. As the sparks know no motion, but that of flying upwards, whether it be in the darkness of the night, or in the light of the day ; so the Spirit of love is always in the same course ; it knows no difference of time, place, or persons ; but whether it gives or forgives, bears or forbears, it is equally doing its own delightful work, equally blessed from itself. For the Spirit of love, wherever it is, is its own blessing and happiness, because it is the truth and reality of GOD in the soul ; and therefore is in the same joy of life, and is the same good to itself, everywhere, and on every occasion.

Oh ! sir, would you know the blessing of all blessings ? it is this God of Love dwelling in your soul, and killing every root of bitterness which is the pain and torment of every earthly, selfish love. For all wants are satisfied, all disorders of nature are removed, no life is any longer a burden, every day is a day of peace, everything you meet becomes a help to you, because everything you see or do is all done in the sweet, gentle element of Love. For as Love has no by-ends, wills nothing but its own increase, so everything is as oil to its flame ; it must have that which it wills, and cannot be disappointed, because everything naturally helps it to live in its own way, and to bring forth its own work. The Spirit of love does not want to be rewarded, honoured, or esteemed ; its only desire is to propagate itself, and become the blessing and happiness of everything that wants it. And therefore it meets wrath, and evil, and hatred, and opposition, with the same one will, as the light meets the darkness, only to overcome it with all its blessings. Did you want to avoid the wrath and ill-will, or to gain the favor of any persons, you might easily miss of your ends ; but if you have no will but to all goodness, everything you meet, be it what it will, must be forced to be assistant to you. For the wrath of an enemy, the treachery of a friend, and every other evil, only helps the Spirit of love to be more triumphant, to live its own life, and find all its own blessings in a higher degree. Whether, therefore, you consider perfection or happiness, it is all included in the Spirit of love, and must be so, for this reason,—because the infinitely perfect and happy God is mere LOVE, an unchangeable will to all goodness ; and therefore every creature must be corrupt and unhappy, so far as it is led by any other will than the one will to all goodness. Thus you see the ground, the nature, and perfection of the Spirit of love.

Let me now, in a word or two, show you the necessity of it : now the necessity is absolute and unchangeable. No creature can be a child of God, but because the goodness of God is in it ; nor can it have any union or communion with the goodness of the Deity, till its life is a Spirit of love. This is the only one band of union betwixt God and the creature. All besides this, or that is not this, call it by what name you will, is only so much error, fiction, impurity, and corruption, got into the creature ; and must of all necessity be entirely separated from it, before it can have that purity and holiness which alone can see God, or find the divine life. For as God is an immutable will to all goodness, so the divine will can unite or work with no creaturely will, but that which willet with him only that which is good. Here the necessity is absolute; nothing will do instead of this will; all contrivances of holiness, all forms of religious piety signify nothing without this will to all goodness. For as the will to all goodness is the whole nature of God, so it must be the whole nature of every service, or religion, that can be acceptable to him. For nothing serves God, or worships and adores him, but that which wills and worketh with him. For God can delight in nothing but his own will and his own Spirit, because all goodness is included in it, and can be nowhere else. And therefore every man that followeth an own will, or an own spirit, forsaketh the one will to all goodness; and whilst he doth so, hath no capacity for the Light and Spirit of God. The necessity therefore of the Spirit of love, is what God himself cannot dispense with in the creature, no more than he can deny himself, or act contrary to his own holy being. But as it was his will to all goodness, that brought forth angels, and the spirits of men, so he can will nothing in their existence, but that they should live and work, and manifest that same Spirit of love and goodness which brought them into being. Everything, therefore, but the will and life of Goodness, is an apostacy in the creature, and is rebellion against the whole nature of God. [How it is to be obtained, is set forth in J. B.'s "Way to Christ, Discovered;" but here the truth, the power, the necessity of it only is declared.]

There is no peace, nor ever can be, for the soul of man, but in the purity and perfection of its first created nature; nor can it have its purity and perfection in any other way, than in and by the Spirit of love. For as Love is the God that created all things, so Love is the purity, the perfection, and blessing of all created things; and nothing can live in God but as it lives in Love. Look at every vice, pain, and disorder in human nature, it is, in itself, nothing else but the spirit of the creature turned from the universality of Love to some self-seeking or own will in created things. So that Love alone is, and only can be, the cure of every evil; and he that lives in the purity of Love, is risen out of the power of evil, into the freedom of the one spirit of heaven. The schools have given us very accurate definitions of every vice, whether it be covetousness, pride, wrath, envy, etc., and shown us how to conceive them as notionally distinguished from one another. But the christian has a much shorter way of knowing their nature and power, and what they all are, and do, in and to himself. For, call them by what names you will, or distinguish them with ever so much exactness, they are all, separately and jointly, just that same one thing, and all do that same one work, as the scribes, the pharisees, hypocrites, and rabble of the Jews, who crucified Christ, were all but one and the same thing, and all did one and the same work, however different they were in outward names. If you would therefore have a true sense of the nature and power of pride, wrath, covetousness, envy, etc., they are in their whole nature nothing else but the murderers and crucifiers of the true Christ of God; not as the high priests did many hundred years ago, nailing his outward humanity to an outward cross, but crucifying afresh the Son of God, the holy Immanuel, who is the Christ that every man crucifies as often as he gives way to wrath, pride, envy, or covetousness, etc. For every temper or passion that is contrary to the nature of Christ, and keeps the holy Immanuel from coming to life in the soul, is, in the strictest truth of the words, a murderer and killer of the Lord of life. And where pride, and envy, and hatred, etc., are suffered to live, there the same thing is done, as when Christ was killed, and Barabbas was saved alive. The Christ of God was not then first crucified, when the Jews brought him to the cross; but Adam and Eve were his first real murderers; for the death which happened to them in the day that they did eat of the earthly tree, was the death of the Christ of God, or the divine life in their souls. For Christ had never come into the world as a second Adam to redeem it, had he not been originally the life, and perfection, and glory of the first Adam. And (N.B.) he is our atonement and reconciliation with God, because, by and through him, brought to life in us, we are set again in that first state of holiness, and have Christ again in us, as our first father had at his creation. For had not Christ been our first father, as a birth of life in him, Adam had been created a mere child of wrath, in the same impurity of nature, in the same enmity with God, and in the same want of an atoning Saviour, as we are at this day.—For God can have no delight or union with any creature, but because his well-beloved Son, the express image of his person, is found in it.—This is as true of all unfallen, as of all fallen creatures; the one are redeemed, and the other want no redemption, only through the life of Christ dwelling in them. For as the word, or Son of God, is the creator of all things, and by him everything is made that was made, so everything that is good and holy in unfallen angels is as much through his living and dwelling in them, as everything that is good and holy in redeemed man is through him. And he is just as much the preserver, the strength, and glory, and life, of all the thrones and principalities of heaven, as he is the righteousness, the peace, and redemption of fallen man.

This Christ of God hath many names in Scripture; but they all mean only this, that he is, and alone can be, the light, and life, and holiness, of every creature that is holy, whether in heaven or on earth. Wherever Christ is not, there is the wrath of nature, or Nature left to itself, and its own tormenting strength of life, to feel nothing in itself but the vain, restless contrariety of its own working properties. This is the one only origin of hell, and every kind of curse and misery in the creature. It is Nature without the Christ of God, or the Spirit of love, ruling over it. And here you may observe, that wrath has in itself the nature of hell; and that it can have no beginning or power in any creature, but so far as it has lost the Christ of God. And when Christ is everywhere, wrath and hatred will be nowhere. Whenever, therefore, you willingly indulge wrath, or let your mind work in hatred, you not only work without Christ, but you resist him, and withstand his redeeming power over you; you do in reality what those Jews did, when they said, "We will not have this man to reign over us." FOR CHRIST NEVER WAS, NOR CAN BE, IN ANY CREATURE, BUT PURELY AS A SPIRIT OF LOVE.

In all the universe of Nature, nothing but heaven and heavenly creatures ever had, or could have, been known, had every created will continued in that state in which it came forth out of, and from God. For God can will nothing in the life of the creature but a creaturely manifestation of his own goodness, happiness, and perfection. And therefore, where this is wanted, the fact is certain, that the creature hath changed and lost its first state that it had from God. Everything, therefore, which is the vanity, the wrath, the torment, and evil of man, or any intelligent creature, is solely the effect of his will turned from God, and can come from nothing else. Misery and wickedness can have no other ground or root; for whatever wills and works with God, must of all necessity partake of the happiness and perfection of God.

This, therefore, is a certain truth, that hell and death, curse and misery, can never cease, or be removed from the creation, till the will of the creature is again as it came from God, and is only a Spirit of love, that willet nothing but goodness. All the whole fallen creation, stand it never so long, must groan and travail in pain; this must be its purgatory, till every contrariety to the Divine will is entirely taken from every creature:

Which is only saying, that all the powers and properties of Nature are a misery to themselves, can only work in disquiet and wrath, till the birth of the Son of God in them brings them under the dominion and power of the Spirit of love.

Thus, sir, you have seen the original immutable ground and necessity of the SPRIT OF LOVE. It is no imaginary refinement, or speculative curiosity; but is of the highest reality, and most absolute necessity. It stands in the immutability and perfection of God; and not only every intelligent creature, be it what and where it will, but every inanimate thing, must work in vanity and disquiet, till it has its state in, and works under the Spirit of love. For as Love brought forth all things, and all things were what they were, and had their place and state, under the working power of Love; so everything that has lost its first created state, must be in restless strife and disquiet till it finds it again.

There is no sort of strife, wrath, or storm, in outward nature, no fermentation, vegetation, or corruption, in any elementary things, but what is a full proof, and real effect of this truth; viz. that Nature can have no rest, but must be in the strife of fermentation, vegetation, and corruption, constantly doing and undoing, building and destroying, till the Spirit of love has rectified all outward Nature and brought it back again into that glassy sea of unity and purity, in which St. John beheld the throne of God in the midst of it. For this glassy sea, which the beloved apostle was blessed with the sight of, is the one transparent, heavenly element, in which all the properties and powers of Nature move and work in the unity and purity of the one will of God, only known as so many endless forms of triumphing light and love. For the strife of properties, of thick against thin, hard against soft, hot against cold, etc., had no existence till angels fell; that is, till they turned from God to work with nature. This is the original of all the strife, division, and materiality in the fallen world.

No fluid in this world ferments, but because there is some thickness and contrariety in it, which it would not have. And it ferments only for this reason, to have an unity and clearness in itself, which its nature wants to have. Now when you see this in any fluid, you see the work of all fallen nature, and the same that everything else is doing, as well as it can, in its own way; it is in a restless working and strife after an unity and purity, which it can neither have, nor forbear to seek. And the reason why all things are doing thus, is this,—because all the elements of this world, before they were brought down into their present state, had their birth and existence in the unity and purity of the heavenly glassy sea; and therefore must be always in some sort of strife and tendency after their first state, and doomed to disquiet till it is found.

This is the desire of all fallen nature in this world; it cannot be separated from it; but every part must work in fermentation, vegetation, and corruption, till it is restored to its first unity and purity under the Spirit of love.

Every son of fallen Adam is under this same necessity of working and striving after something that he neither is nor hath; and for the same reason; because the life of man has lost its first unity and purity, and therefore must be in a working strife, till all contrariety and impurity is separated from it, and it finds its first state in God. All evil as well as good men, all the wisdom and folly of this life, are equally a proof of this. For the vanity of wicked men in their various ways, and the labours of good men in faith and hope, etc., proceed from the same cause; viz. from a want and desire of having and being something that they neither are nor have. The evil seek wrong, and the good seek right; but they both are seekers, and for the same reason: because their present state has not that which it wants to have. And this must be the state of human life, and of every creature that has fallen from its first state, or has something in it that it should not have. It must do as the polluted fluid does, it must ferment and work, either right or wrong, to mend its state. The muddled wine always works right to the utmost of its power, because it works according to nature; but if it had an intelligent free will, it might work as vainly as man does; it might continually thicken itself, be always stirring up its own dregs, and then it would seek for its purity, just as well as the soul of man seeks for its happiness in “the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life.” All which must of the same necessity fall away from the heart of man before it can find its happiness in God, as the dregs must separate from the wine before it can have its perfection and clearness.

Purification, therefore, is the one thing necessary, and nothing will do in the stead of it. But man is not purified till every earthly, wrathful, sensual, selfish, partial, self-willing temper, is taken from him. He is not dying to himself, till he is dying to these tempers; and he is not alive in God, till he is dead to them. For he wants purification, only because he has these tempers; and therefore he has not the purification which he wants, till they are all separated from him. It is the purity and perfection of the divine nature that must be brought again into him; because in that purity and perfection he came forth from God, and could have no less, as he was a child of God, that was to be blessed by a life in him, and from him. For nothing impure or imperfect in its will and working, can have any union with God: nor are you to think that these words, the purity and perfection of God, are too high to be used on this occasion; for they only mean, that the will of the creature, as an offspring of the Divine Will, must will and work with the will of God, for then it stands and lives truly and really in the purity and perfection of God; and whatever does not thus, is at enmity with God, and cannot have any union of life and happiness with him, and in him.

Now, nothing wills and works with God but the Spirit of love; because nothing else works in God himself. The Almighty brought forth all Nature for this only end, that boundless Love might have its infinity of height and depth to dwell and work in; and all the striving and working properties of nature are only to give essence and substance, life and strength, to the invisible, hidden Spirit of love, that it may come forth into outward activity, and manifest its blessed powers; that creatures born in the strength, and out of the powers of nature, might communicate the Spirit of love and goodness, give and receive mutual delight and joy to and from one another. All below this state of Love, is a fall from the one life of God, and the only life in which the God of love can dwell. Partiality, self, mine, thine, etc., are tempers that can only belong to creatures that have lost the power, presence, and spirit of the universal good. They can have no place in heaven, nor can be anywhere, but because heaven is lost. Think not, therefore, that the Spirit of pure, universal Love, which is the one purity and perfection of heaven, and all heavenly natures, has been, or can be, carried too high, or its absolute necessity too much asserted. For it admits of no degrees of higher or lower, and is not in being till it is absolutely pure and unmixed, no more than a line can be straight till it is absolutely free from all crookedness. [Such is the doctrine of 'perfect love,' or 'death to self,' or 'christian perfection,' which spiritual christians are to aim at and attain unto as the end of their religious profession.]

All the design of christian redemption is, to remove everything that is unheavenly, gross, dark, wrathful, and disordered, from every part of this fallen world. And when you see earth and stones, storms and tempests, and every kind of evil, misery, and wickedness, you see that which Christ came into the world to remove, and not only to give a New-birth to fallen man, but also to deliver all outward nature from its present vanity and evil, and set it again in its first heavenly state. Now, if you ask, how came all things into this evil and vanity? It is, because they have lost the blessed Spirit of love, which alone makes the happiness and perfection of every power of nature. Look at grossness, coldness, hardness, and darkness; they never could have any existence, but because the properties of Nature must appear in this manner, when the Light of God is no longer dwelling in them.—

NATURE IS AT FIRST ONLY SPIRITUAL: it has in itself nothing but the spiritual properties of the desire, which is the very being and ground of nature. But when these spiritual properties are not filled and blessed, and all held in one will, by the Light and Love of God ruling in them, then something is found in nature which never should have been found; viz., the properties of nature in a state of visible, palpable division and contrariety to each other. And this new state of the properties of nature is the first beginning, and birth, and possibility, of all that contrariety that is to be found betwixt hot and cold, hard and soft, thick and thin, etc., all which could have had no existence, till the properties of Nature lost their first unity, and purity, under the light and love of God, manifested and working in them. And this is the one true Origin of all the materiality of this earthly system, and of every struggle and contrariety, that is found in material things. Had the properties of Nature been kept by the creature, in their first state, blessed and overcome with the Light and Love of heaven dwelling and working in them, no wrath or contrariety could ever have been known by any creature; and had not wrath and contrariety entered into the properties of Nature, nothing thick, or hard, or dark, etc., could ever have been found, or known in any place. Now everything that you see, and know of the things of this world, shows you, that matter began only in and from the change of the spiritual properties of Nature; and that matter is changed and altered, just as the Light and purity of heaven is more or less in it.

How comes the flint to be in such a state of hard, dark compaction? It is because the meekness and fluidity of the light, air, and water, of this world, have little or no existence in it. And therefore, as soon as the fire has unlocked its hard compaction, and opened in it the light, and air, and water of this world, it becomes transparent glass, and is brought so much nearer to that first glassy sea in which it once existed. For the light, and air, and water of this world, though all of them in a material state, yet have the most of the first heavenly nature in them; and as these are more or less, in all material things, so are they nearer or farther from their first heavenly state. And as fire is the first deliverer of the flint from its hard compaction, so the last universal fire must begin the deliverance of this material system, and fit everything to receive that Spirit of light and love, which will bring all things back again to their first glassy sea, in which the Deity dwelleth, as in his throne. And thus, as the earthly fire turns flint into glass, so earth will become heaven, and the contrariety of four divided elements will become one transparent brightness of glory, as soon as the last fire shall have melted every grossness into its first undivided fluidity, for the Light, and Love, and majesty of God to be all in all in it. How easy and natural is it to suppose all that is earth and stones to be dissolved into water, the water to be changed into air, the air into æther, and the æther rarified into light? Is there anything here impossible to be supposed? And how near a step is the next, to suppose all this changed, or exalted into that glassy sea, which was everywhere, before the angels fell? What now is become of hard, heavy, dead, divisible, corruptible matter? Is it annihilated? No: and yet nothing of it is left; all that you know of it is gone, and nothing but its shadowy idea will be known in eternity. Now as this shows you, how matter can lose all its material properties, and go back to its first spiritual state, so it makes it very intelligible to you, how the sin of angels, which was their sinful working in and with the properties of nature, could bring them out of their first spirituality into that darkness, grossness, and chaos, out of which God raised this material system. See now, sir, how unreasonably you once told me, that our doctrine must suppose the eternity of matter; for throughout the whole, you might easily have seen, that it neither does nor can suppose it, but demonstrates the impossibility of it; shows the true origin of matter, that it is no older than sin; could have no possibility of beginning to be, but from sin; and therefore must entirely vanish, when sin is entirely done away.

If matter, said you, be not made out of nothing, then it must be eternal. Just as well concluded, as if you had said, if snow, and hail, and ice, are not made out of nothing, then they must be eternal. And if your senses did not force you to know how these things are created out of something, and are in themselves only the properties of light, and air, and water, brought out of their first state into such a compaction and creation, as is called snow, hail, and ice, your rational philosophy would stand to its noble conclusion, that they must be made out of nothing. Now every time you see snow, or hail, or ice, you see in truth and reality the creation of matter, or how this world came to be of such a material nature as it is! For earth and stones, and every other materiality of this world, came from some antecedent properties of nature by that same creating power, or flat of God, as turns the properties of light, and air, and water, into the different materialities of snow, hail, and ice.

The first property of NATURE, which is in itself a constraining, attracting, compressing, and coagulating power, is that working power from whence comes all thickness, darkness, coldness, and hardness; and this is the creator of snow, and hail, and ice, out of something that before was only the fluidity of light, air, and moisture. Now this same property of nature, directed by the will of God, was the flat, and creating power, which, on the first day of this world, compacted, coagulated or created, the wrathful properties of fallen nature in the angelic kingdom into such a new state, as to become earth, and stones, and water, and a visible heaven. And the new state of the created heaven, and earth, and stones, and water, etc., came forth by the flat of God, or the working of the first property of nature, from the properties of fallen nature; just as snow, and ice, and hail, come forth by the same flat, from the properties of light, air and water. And the created materiality of heaven, earth, stones, and water, have no more eternity in them, than there is in snow, or hail, or ice; but are only held for a time, in their compacted or created state, by the same first astringing property of nature, which for a time holds snow, and hail, and ice, in their compacted state.

Now here you see with the utmost certainty, that all the matter, or materiality of this world, is the effect of sin, and could have its beginning from nothing else. For as thickness, hardness, and darkness, (which is the essence of matter), is the effect of the wrathful predominant power of the first property of nature, and as no property of nature can be predominant, or known as it is in itself, till nature is fallen from its harmonious unity, under the Light and Love of God dwelling in it, so you have the utmost certainty, that where matter, or (which is the same thing) where thickness, darkness, hardness, etc., are found, there the will of the creature has turned from God, and opened a disorderly working of Nature without God.

Therefore, as sure as the materiality of this world standeth in the predominant power of the first attracting, astringing property of nature, or in other words, is thickness, darkness, hardness, etc., so sure is it, that all the matter of this world has its beginning from sin, and must have its end, as soon as the properties of nature are again restored to their first unity, and blessed harmony, under the Light and Spirit of God.

It is no objection to all this, that Almighty God must be owned to be the true creator of the materiality of this world. For God only brought or created it into this materiality, out of the fallen sinful properties of nature, and in order to stop their sinful working, and to put them into a state of recovery. He created the confused chaos of the darkened, divided, contrary properties of spiritual nature, into a farther, darker, harder, coagulation, and division, that so the fallen angels might thereby lose all power over them; and that this new materiality might become a theatre of redemption, and stand its time under the dominion of the Lamb of God, till all the wrath, and grossness, and darkness, born of the sin of angels, was fitted to return to its first heavenly purity.

And thus, though God is the creator of the materiality of this world, yet seeing he created it out of that wrath, division, and darkness which sin had opened in nature, this truth stands firm, that sin alone is the father, first cause, and beginner, of all the materiality of this world; and that when sin is removed from nature, all its materiality must vanish with it. For when the properties of nature are again in the unity of the one will of Light and Love, then hot and cold, thick and thin, dark and hard, with every other property of matter, must give up all their distinction, and all the divided elements of this world lose all their materiality and division in that first heavenly spirituality of a glassy sea, from whence they fell.

Now as all the whole nature of matter, its grossness, darkness, and hardness, is owing to the unequal, predominant working of the first property of nature, which is an attracting, astringing, and compressing desire; so every spiritual evil, every wicked working, and disorderly state of any intelligent being, is all owing to the same disorderly, predominant power of the first property of nature, doing all that inwardly in the spirit of the creature, which it does in an outward grossness, darkness, and hardness. Thus, when the desire (the first property of nature) N.B. in any intelligent creature, leaves the unity and universality of the Spirit of love, and contracts or shuts up itself in an own will, own love, and self-seeking, then it does all that inwardly and spiritually in the soul, which it does in outward grossness, hardness, and darkness. And had not own will, own love, and self-seeking, come into the spirit of the creature, it never could have found, or felt, any outward contrariety, darkness, or hardness: for no creature can have any other outward nature, but that which is in the same state with its inward spirit, and belongs to it, as its own natural growth.

Modern metaphysics has no knowledge of the ground and nature either of spirit or body; but supposes them not only without any natural relation, but essentially contrary to one another, and only held together in a forced conjunction by the arbitrary will of God. Nay, if you were to say, that God first creates a soul out of nothing, and when that is done, then takes an understanding faculty, and puts it into it, after that adds a will, and then a memory, all is independently made, as when a tailor first makes the body of a coat, and then adds sleeves or pockets to it; were you to say this, the schools of Descartes, Malebranche, or Locke, would have nothing to say against it. And the thing is unavoidable; for all these philosophers were so far from knowing the ground of Nature, how it is a birth from God, and all Creatures a birth from nature, through the working will of God in and by the powers of Nature, as they were so far from knowing this, as to hold a creation out of nothing; so they were necessarily excluded from every fundamental truth concerning the origin either of body or spirit, and their true relation to one another. For a creation out of nothing leaves no room for accounting why anything is, as it is.—Now every wise man is supposed to have respect to Nature in everything that he would have joined together; he cannot suppose his work to succeed, unless this be done. But to suppose God to create man with a body and soul, not only not naturally related, but naturally impossible to be united by any powers in either of them, is to suppose God acting and creating man into an unnatural state; which yet he could not do, unless there was such a thing as nature antecedent to the creation of man. And how can Nature be, or have anything, but what it is, and has, from God? Therefore, to suppose God to bring any creature into an unnatural state, is to suppose him acting contrary to himself, and to that nature which is from him.

Yet all the metaphysics of the schools does this; it supposes God to bring a soul and a body together, which have the utmost natural contrariety to each other, and can only affect, or act upon one another by an arbitrary will of God, willing the body and soul, held together by force, should seem to do that to one another, which they have no natural or possible power to do. But the true Philosophy of this matter, (known only to the soul that by a New-birth from above has found its first state in and from God,) is this: namely, that NATURE is a BIRTH or MANIFESTATION OF THE TRINE INVISIBLE DEITY. And as it could only come into existence as a birth from God, so every Creature, or beginning thing, can only come forth as a birth from and out of Nature, by the will of God, willing it to come forth in such a birth. And no creature can have, or be, anything, but by and ac-according to the working powers of Nature: and therefore, strictly speaking, no creature can be, or be put into an unnatural state. It may indeed lose or fall from its natural perfection, by the wrong use or working of its will; but then its fallen state is the natural effect of the wrong use of its will, and so it only has that which is natural to it.

The truth of the matter is this, there neither is, nor can be, anything, nor any effect in the whole universe of things, but by the way of birth. For as the working will is the first cause, or beginner, of everything, so nothing can proceed farther, than as it is driven by the will, and is a birth of it. And therefore nothing can be in anything, but what is natural to its own working will, and the true effect of it. Everything that is outward in any being, is only a birth of its own spirit; and therefore all body, whether it be heavenly, or earthly, or hellish, has its whole nature and condition from its own inward spirit; and no spirit can have a body of any other properties, but such as are natural to it, as being its own true outward state. For body and spirit are not two separate, independent things, but are necessary to each other, and are only the inward and outward conditions of one and the same being. [As fundamentally declared in J. B.'s "Signatura Rerum."]

Every creaturely spirit must have its own body, and cannot be without it; for its body is that which makes it manifest to itself. It cannot be said to exist as a creature, till in a body, because it can have no sensibility of itself, nor feel, nor find either that it is, or what it is, but in and by its own body. Its body is its first knowledge of its something and somewhere.*

And now, sir, if you ask why I have gone into this detail of the origin and nature of body and spirit, when my subject was only concerning the Spirit of love, it is to show you, that grossness, darkness, contrariety, disquiet, and fermentation, must be the state of the body and spirit, till they are both made pure and luminous by the Light and Love of heaven manifested in them. All dark-

* This philosophy will be found presented in another form, in the following letter of the same writer, to a brother clergyman, which for its practical character and excellency, is given at length: "My dear brother,—Live as you now do, in such activity of spirit, and multiplied ways of being good, and though you were to live half a century longer, you would stick in the same mire, and end your life in the same complaints as filled your last letter to me. You tell me, that after all the great change you have made in your life, you find nothing of that inward good and satisfaction which you have so much expected, and more especially since you have been a reader of the books recommended by me.

But, sir, you quite mistake the matter, you have not changed your life; for that which is, and only can truly be called your life, is in the same state it was when I first knew you.—Nothing is your life, whether it be good or bad, but that which wills and hungers in you; and your own life neither is, nor can be, any thing else but this. Therefore, nothing reaches your life, or can make a real change in it, from bad to good, from falseness to truth, but the right will and the right hunger. Practise as many rules as you will, take up this or that new opinion, be daily reading better and better books, follow this or that able man, the bread of life is not there. Nothing will be fed in you but the vanity and self-conceited righteousness of your own old man. And thus it must be with you, till all that is within you is become one will and one hunger after that which angels eat in heaven.

But now, if will and hunger are the whole of every natural life, then you may know this great truth with the utmost certainty, namely, that eating is the one preservation of every life, from the highest angel in heaven, to the lowest living creature on earth. That which the life eats not, that the life has not. Now everything that lives on earth is a birth or production of the astral elementary fire, light, and spirit, to which water is always essential; and it continues in life, tastes and enjoys the good of its life, no longer than these powers and virtues of the stars and elements are essentially and continually eaten by it.

It is just so with the immortal, heavenly life of the soul, it is a birth of those same powers, in their highest glory, in the invisible world; a world, where the triune deity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, brings forth a triune glorious habitation for itself of fire, light, and spirit, opening an infinity of wonders, births, and beauties, in a chrysal transparent sea, called the kingdom of heaven.

Out of these powers, or out of this kingdom of heaven, are the births of all holy angelic creatures; nothing lives or moves in them, but that fire, light, and spirit, which comes as a birth from Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and nothing feeds, keeps up, and exalts this heavenly fire, light, and spirit, but the hidden, inconceivable, supernatural trinity, which is before, and deeper than all nature, and can only manifest itself, and communicate its goodness, by such an outward birth of its own unapproachable glory.—And here you may find a glorious meaning of those words of our Lord, saying, "My kingdom is not of this world," because it is a kingdom of those heavenly powers of the triune God, which give food and nourishment, purity and perfection to the fire, light, and spirit of those divine creatures, which are to be holy as he is holy, perfect as he is perfect, in his own heavenly kingdom.

Here, therefore, in this spiritual eating of that same invisible food, which gives life, and perfection of life to all the angels of God, and not in any human contrivances, or activity of your own, are you to place your all as to the change of your life: it all consists in the right hunger, and the right food, and in nothing else.—

The fall of Adam, and the origin of all sin and misery, began in his lust and hunger after the knowledge of good and evil in the kingdom of this world. By this he left and lost the food which heaven gives. He died to all the influences and enjoyments of his first fire, light, and spirit, which were his vital union with God in the kingdom of heaven. All the evil that was hid in this earthly creation, and its numerous creatures, opened and diffused itself with all the power of a poisonous food, through his whole soul and body. But in all this, nothing more came upon him, or was done to him, than that which his own hunger had eat.—Here you have the fullest demonstration, how every change in the life of man is, and only can be made, namely, by hungering and eating. Adam had not fell, had known no death or extinction of that heavenly fire, light, and spirit, which was his first birth in God, but because he hungered after the state of the animal life in this world, which has no other fire, light, and spirit in it, but that which gives a transitory life, of diverse, contrary lusts and appetites, to all the beasts, birds, and insects.

ness, grossness, and contrariety, must be removed from the body before it can belong to heaven, or be united with it; but these qualities must be in the body, till the soul is totally dead to self, partiality, and contrariety, and breathes only the Spirit of universal Love, because the state of the body has nothing of its own, or from itself, but is solely the outward manifestation of nothing else but that which is inwardly in the soul. Every animal of this world has nothing in its outward form or shape; every spirit, whether heavenly or hellish, has nothing in the nature and state of its body, but that which is the form and growth of its own inward spirit. As no number can be anything else, but that which the unities contained in it make it to be, so no body of any creature can be anything else, but the coagulation, or sum total, of those properties of nature that are coagulated in it. And when the properties of nature are formed into the band of a creaturally union, then is its body brought forth, whether the spirit of the creature be earthly, heavenly, or hellish.

Nature, or the first properties of life, are in a state of the highest contrariety, and the highest want of something which they have not. This is their whole nature, and they have nothing else in them. And this is their true ground and fitness to become a life of triumphing joy and happiness; viz., when united in the possession of that which they seek for in their contrariety. And if life, in its first root, was not this depth of strife, this strength of hunger, and sensibility of want, the fullness of heavenly joy could not be manifested in it.

You are not a stranger to the mystery of the SEVEN PROPERTIES OF NATURE, which we have often spoken of; and therefore I shall shorten the matter, and only say so much of them as may be of service to our present subject.

NATURE, whether eternal or temporal, is that which comes not into being for its own self, or to be that, which it is in itself, but for the sake of something that it is not, and has not. And this is

This is the doctrine of the Old Testament, concerning the power of hunger and eating in the first Adam.—On the other hand, in conformity to this, and in full proof of the truth of it, that it must have been so, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, in the New Testament has declared, that hunger and eating is that alone which can help fallen man to that first heavenly fire, light, and spirit, with the spiritual flesh and blood that belonged to it, saying again and again, in a variety of the strongest expressions, this great truth, “that except a man eat his flesh and drink his blood, he hath no life in him,” that is, no life of that celestial body and blood which Adam lost, and which alone can live in the fire, light, and spirit of heaven.—

EVERY SPIRIT that is creaturely, and EVERY DESIRE OF THE SPIRIT, HAS ALWAYS SOMETHING BODILY AS ITS OWN BIRTH. No spiritual creature can begin to be but by beginning to be bodily. For creaturely existence and bodily existence is the same thing; the spirit is not, cannot be in the form of a creature, till it has its body: and its body is the manifestation of spirit, both to itself and other beings.

Live in the love, the patience, the meekness, and humility of Christ, and then the celestial, transparent, spiritual body of Christ's flesh and blood is continually forming itself, and growing in, and from, and about your soul, till it comes to the fullness of the stature in Christ Jesus; and this is your true, substantial, vital, eating the flesh, and drinking the blood of Christ, which will afterwards become your body of glory to all eternity.—And though your astral reason, and outward senses, whilst you are in Adam's bodily flesh, know nothing of this inward body of Christ, yet there it is as surely as you have the love, the patience, the meekness, and humility of Christ; for where the true spirit of Christ is, there is his true spiritual body.

On the other hand, live to selfishness, to diabolical pride, wrath, envy, and covetousness, and then nothing can hinder these tempers from forming within you such a spiritual body to your soul, as that which devils have, and dwell, and work in.

Be as unwilling as you will, through learned wisdom, or fear of enthusiasm, to believe this, your unbelief can last no longer than till Adam's flesh and blood leave you, and then as sure as your soul lives, you will and must have it living, either in the spiritual body of fallen angels, or in the spiritual body of the redeeming Jesus.—Oh, sir, trifle away no more time in many matters, your first spiritual body must come again. Without it, you are the very man that came to the marriage feast, not “having on the wedding garment.” He was bound hands and feet, and cast into utter darkness, that is, he was the chained prisoner of his own dark, hellish, spiritual body, which had been all his life growing up in him, from that which his soul had daily eat and hungered after, and so was become those very chains of darkness, under which the fallen angels are reserved unto the judgment of the great day.

Now there is no being saved, or preserved from this body of chains and darkness, but by the one hunger and thirst after righteousness that is in Christ Jesus, and by eating that which begets heavenly, spiritual flesh and blood to the soul. The two trees of paradise, with their two fruits, viz. of death to the eater of one, and life to the eater of the other, were infallible signs, and full proofs, that from the beginning to the end of the world, death and life, happiness and misery, can proceed from nothing else but that which the lust and hunger of the soul chooseth for its food.—

Now spiritual eating is by the mouth of desire, and desire is nothing else but will and hunger, therefore, that which you will and hunger after, that you are continually eating, whether it be good or bad, and that, be it which it will, forms the strength of your life, or, which is the same thing, forms the body of your soul. If you have many wills and many hungers, all that you eat is only the food of so many spiritual diseases, and burdens your soul with a complication of inward distempers. And under this working of so many wills it is, that religious people have no more good or health and strength from the true religion, than a man who has a complication of bodily distempers, has from the most healthful food. For no will or hunger, be it turned which way it will, or seem ever so small or trifling, is without its effect. For as we can have nothing but as our will works, so we must have always some effect from it. It cannot be insignificant, because nothing is significant but that which it does.—

Do not now say, that you have this one will and one hunger, and yet find not the food of life by it. For as sure as you are forced to complain, so sure it is that you have it not. “Not my will, but thine be done;” when this is the one will of the soul, all complaints are over, then it is that patience drinks water of life out of every cup; and to every craving of the old man, this one hunger continually says, “I have meat to eat that ye know not of.”

the reason why nature is only a desire; it is because it is for the sake of something else; and is also the reason why nature in itself is only a torment, because it is only a strong desire, and cannot help itself to that which it wants, but is always working against itself.

Now a desire that cannot be stopped, nor get that which it would have, has a threefold contrariety, or working, in it, which you may thus conceive, as follows: the first and peculiar property, or the one only will of the desire, as such, is to have that, which it has not; and all that it can do towards having it, is to act, as if it were seizing it; and this is it, which makes the desire to be a magic compressing, inclosing, or astringing; because that is all that it can do towards seizing of that which it would have. But the desire cannot thus magically astringe, compress, or strive to inclose, without drawing or attracting: but drawing is motion, which is the highest contrariety and resistance to compressing, or holding together. And thus the desire, in its magical working, sets out with two contrary properties, inseparable from one another, and equal in strength; for the motion has no strength, but as it is the drawing of the desire; and the desire only draws in the same degree as it wills to compress and astringe; and therefore the desire, as astringing, always begets a resistance equal to itself.

Now from this great and equally strong contrariety of the two first properties of the desire, magically pulling, as I may say, two contrary ways, there arises, as a necessary birth from both of them, a third property, which is emphatically called a wheel, or whirling anguish of life. For a thing that can go neither inward nor outward, and yet must be, and move under the equal power of both of them, must whirl, or turn round; it has no possibility of doing anything else, or of ceasing to do that. And this whirling contrariety of these inseparable properties is the great anguish of life, and may properly be called the hell of nature; and every lesser torment which any man finds “Thy kingdom come, thy will be done,” is the one will and one hunger that feeds the soul with the life-giving bread of heaven. This will is always fulfilled, it cannot possibly be sent empty away, for God’s kingdom must manifest itself with all its riches in that soul which wills nothing else; it never was, nor can be lost, but by the will that seeks something else.—Hence you may know, with the utmost certainty, that if you have no inward peace, if religious comfort is still wanting, it is because you have more wills than one. For the multiplicity of wills is the very essence of fallen nature; and all its evil, misery, and separation from God lie in it; and as soon as you return to, and allow only this one will, you are returned to God, and must find the blessedness of his kingdom within you.

Give yourself up to ever so many good works, read, preach, pray, visit the sick, build hospitals, clothe the naked, etc. yet if anything goes along with these, or in the doing of them you have any thing else that you will and hunger after, but that God’s kingdom may come, and his will be done, they are not the works of the new-born from above, and so cannot be his life-giving food. For the new creature in Christ is that one will and one hunger that was in Christ; and therefore where that is wanting, there is wanting that new creature which alone can have his conversation, which alone can daily eat and drink at God’s table, receiving in all that it does continual life from “every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.”—

From what word, and from what mouth of God? Why, only from that hidden, supernatural power of the triune Deity, which speaks and breathes continual nourishment to that heavenly fire, light, and spirit, in and from which all that are about the throne of God have their inward joy above all thought, and their outward glory, that can only be figured or hinted to us by pearls, sapphires, and rainbow beauties.

It is from this power of the triune God, working in the fire, light, spirit, and spiritual water, or body of your new-born creature, that all the good, and comfort, and joy of religion, which you want, are to be found, and found by nothing but the resurrection of that divine and heavenly nature which came forth in the first man.

Do not take these to be too high flown words, for they are no higher than the truth; for if that which is in you is not as high as heaven, you will never come there.—That heavenly fire, light, and spirit, which make the angelic life to be all divine, must as certainly be your inward likeness to God; and that which God is and works in angels, that he must be and work in you, or you can never be like to, or equal with them, as Christ has said.—To be outwardly glorious as they are, you must stay till this corruptible shall have put on incorruption; but to have the same inward glory of the same celestial fire, light, and spirit, burning, shining, and breathing in your inward man as angels have, belongs to you, as born at first of the triune breath of the living God, and born again of Christ out of Adam’s death, to have and be all that by a wonder of redemption, which was your divine birthright, at first, by a wonder of creation.—

And now, my dear friend, choose your side; would you be honourable in church or state, put on the whole armour of this world, praise that which man praises, clothe yourself with all the graces and perfections of the belles lettres, and be an orator, and critic, as fast as ever you can, and above all, be strong in the power of flattering words.

But if the other side is your choice; would you be found in Christ, and know the power of his resurrection: would you taste the powers of the world to come, and find the continual influences of the triune God feeding and keeping up his divine life in your triune soul, you must give up all for that one will and one hunger, which keeps the angels of God in their full feasts of ever new, and never ceasing delights, in the nameless, boundless riches of eternity.

Think it not hard, or too severe a restraint, to have but one will and one hunger; it is no harder a restraint than to be kept from all that can bring forth pain and sorrow to your soul; no greater severity than to be excluded from every place but the kingdom of God. For to have but this one will, and one hunger, is to have every evil of life, and all enemies put under your feet. It is to have done with every thing that can defile, betray, disappoint, or hurt that eternal nature, which must have its life within you.—On the other hand, every thing that is not the effect and fruit of this one will, and one hunger, but added to your life by a selfish will, and worldly hunger, must sooner or later be torn from you by the utmost smart, or become food for that gnawing worm which dieth not.—

Do you ask, how you are to come at this one will, and one hunger? I refer you to no power of your own, and yet refer you to that which is within yourself.

in this mixed world, has all its existence and power from the working of these three properties : for life can find no troublesome motions, or sensibility of distress, but so far as it comes under their power, and enters into their whirling wheel.

Now here you may observe, that as this whirling anguish of life is a third state, necessarily arising from the contrariety of the two first properties of the desire; so in this material system, every whirling, or orbicular motion of any body, is solely the effect or product of the contrariety of these two first properties. For no material thing can whirl, or move round, till it is under the power of these two properties; that is, till it can neither go inwards nor outwards, and yet is obliged to move; just as the whirling anguish of the desire then begins, when it can neither go inwards, nor outwards, and yet must be in motion.

And this may be again another strict demonstration to you, that all the matter of this world is from spiritual properties, since all its workings and effects are according to them : for if matter does nothing but according to them, it can be nothing, but what it is, and has from them.

Here also, that is, in these three properties of the desire, you see the ground and reason of the three great laws of matter and motion, lately discovered, and so much celebrated; and need no more to be told, that the illustrious Sir Isaac ploughed with Behmen's heifer, when he brought forth the discovery of them. In the mathematical system of this great philosopher, these three properties, attraction, equal resistance, and the orbicular motion of the planets as the effect of them, etc., are only treated of as facts and appearances, whose ground is not pretended to be known. But in our Behmen, the illuminated instrument of God, their birth and power in eternity is opened; their eternal beginning is shown, and how and why all worlds, and every life of every creature, whether it be heavenly, earthly, or hellish, must be in them, and from them; and can have no nature either spi-

Angels in heaven are not good and happy by anything they can do to themselves, but solely by that which is done to them.—Now that Holy Spirit which does God's will in heaven, and is the goodness and happiness of all its inhabitants, that same Spirit is every man's portion upon earth, and the gift of God within him.—It is but lost labour to strive by any power of your reason, or self-activity, to work up this one will and one hunger within you, or to kindle the true ardency of a divine desire by any thing that your natural man can do. This is as impossible, as for fallen Adam to have been his own redeemer, or a dead man to give life to himself.—The one will and one hunger, which alone can eat the true nourishment of the divine life, is nothing else but the divine nature within you, which died in Adam no other death, but that of being suppressed and buried for a while under a load and multiplicity of earthly wills.

Hence it is that nothing can put an end to this multiplicity of wills in fallen man, which is his death to God, nothing can be the resurrection of the divine nature within him, which is his only salvation, but "the cross" of Christ; not that wooden cross on which he was crucified, but that cross on which he was crucified through the whole course of his life in the flesh. It is our fellowship with him on this cross, through the whole course of our lives, that is our union with him; it alone gives power to the divine nature within us, to arise out of its death, and breathe again in us in one will and one hunger after nothing but God.—

To be like-minded with Christ, is to live in every contrariety to self, the world, the flesh, and the devil, as he did; this is our belonging to him, our being one with him, having life from him, and washing our robes in the blood of the Lamb. For then, and then only, are we washed and cleansed by his blood, when we drink his blood; and we drink his blood, when we willingly drink of the cup that he drank of.

Again, not to be like-minded with Christ, is to be separated from him. To have another mind than he had, is to be in the state of those who crucified him. Such as the Redeemer was, such are they that are redeemed. As Adam was, such are they that are born of him. Life from Adam, and life from Christ, is the one single thing that makes the one our destroyer, the other our redeemer.—But to have done; cast not about in your mind how you are to have the one will and one hunger which is always eating at God's table, and continually fed with the bread of life; the thing is already done to your hands. "I am the way, the truth, and the life," saith Christ: the same as if he had said, the way is no where, the truth is no where, the life is no where, but in me. What room therefore, for any learned contrivances, or further inquiry about the matter? Follow Christ in the denial of all the wills of self, and then all is put away that separates you from God : [persevere in importunate prayer,] and the heaven-born new creature will come to life in you, which alone knows and enjoys the things of God, and has his daily food of gladness in that manifold BLESSED, and BLESSED, which Christ preached on the mount.

Tell me, then, no more of your new skill in Hebrew words, of your Paris editions of all the ancient fathers, your complete collection of the councils, commentators, and church historians, etc., etc. Did Christ mean anything like this when he said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life?" Did the apostle mean anything like this, when he said, "No man can call Jesus, Lord, but by the Holy Ghost?" Great, good, and divine teachers, you say, were many of the fathers. I say nothing to it, but that much more great, good, and divine is He, who is always teaching within you, ever standing and knocking at the door of your heart, with the words of eternal life.

You, perhaps, may ask, why do I go on writing books myself, if there is but one true and divine teacher? I answer, Though there is but one bridegroom that can furnish the blessing of the marriage feast, yet his servants are sent out to invite the guests. This is the unalterable difference between Christ's teaching, and the teaching of those who only publish the glad tidings of him. They are not the bridegroom, and therefore have not the bridegroom's voice. They are not the light, but only sent to bear witness of it. And as the baptist said, "He must increase, but I must decrease:" so every faithful teacher saith of his doctrine, it must decrease and end as soon as it has led the scholar to the true teacher.

All that I have wrote for near thirty years, has been only to show, that we have no master but Christ, nor can have any living, divine knowledge but from his holy nature born and revealed in us. Not a word in favour of JACOB BEHMEN, but because, above every writer in the world, he has made all that is found in the kingdom of grace, and the kingdom of nature, to be ONE CONTINUAL DEMONSTRATION that dying to self, to be born again of Christ, is the ONE ONLY POSSIBLE SALVATION OF THE SONS OF FALLEN ADAM.

ritual or material, no kind of happiness or misery, but according to the working power and state of these properties.

All outward nature, all inward life, is what it is, and works as it works, from this unceasing, powerful attraction, resistance, and whirling.

Every madness and folly of life is their immediate work, and every good spirit of wisdom and love has all its strength and activity from them. They equally support darkness and light; the one could have no powers of thickness and coldness, the other no powers of warmth, brightness, and activity, but by and through these three properties acting in a different state. Not a particle of matter stirs, rises, or falls, separates from, or unites with, any other, but under their power. Not a thought of the mind, either of love or hatred, of joy or trouble, of envy or wrath, of pride and covetousness, can rise in the spirit of any creature, but as these properties act and stir in it.

The next and following properties, viz., the fourth, called fire; the fifth, called the form of light and love; and the sixth, sound, or understanding; only declare the gradual effects of the entrance of the Deity into the three first properties of Nature, changing or bringing their strong wrathful attraction, resistance, and whirling, into a life and state of triumphing joy, and fullness of satisfaction; which state of peace and joy in one another, is called the seventh property, or state of nature. And this is what BERNARD means by his Ternarius Sanctus, which he so often speaks of, as the only place from whence he received all that he said and writ: he means by it the holy Manifestation of the Triune God in the seven properties of Nature, or kingdom of heaven. And from this manifestation of God in the seven properties of nature, or kingdom of heaven, he most wonderfully opens, and accounts for all that was done in the six first working days of the creation, showing how every of the six active properties had its peculiar day's work, till the whole ended, or rested, in the sanctified, paradisaical sabbath of the seventh day, just as nature doth in its seventh property.—

And now, sir, you may see, in the greatest clearness, how everything in this world, everything in the soul and body of man, absolutely requires the one redemption of the Gospel. There is but one nature in all created things, whether spiritual or material; they all stand and work upon the same ground; viz., the three first properties of Nature. That only which can illuminate the soul, that alone can give brightness and purity to the body. For there is no grossness, darkness, and contrariety, in the body, but what strictly proceeds from the same cause, that makes selfishness, wrath, envy, and torment, in the soul; it is but one and the same state and working of the same three first properties of nature. All evil, whether natural or moral, whether of body or spirit, is the sole effect of the wrath and disorder of the spirits of nature, working in and by themselves. And all the good, perfection, and purity, of everything, whether spiritual or material, whether it be the body or spirit of man, or angel, is solely from the power and presence of the supernatural Deity dwelling and working in the properties of nature. For the properties of nature are in themselves nothing else but a mere hunger, want, strife, and contrariety, till the fulness and riches of the Deity, entering into them, unites them all in one will, and one possession of Light and harmonious Love; which is the one redemption of the Gospel, and the one reason why nothing else but the Heart, or Son, or Light of God, can purify nature and creature from all the evil they are fallen into.

For nothing can possibly deliver the soul from its selfish nature, and earthly passions, but that one power that can deliver matter from its present material properties, and turn earth into heaven; and that for this plain reason; because soul and body, outward nature, and inward life, have but one and the same evil in them, and from one and the same cause.

The unbeliever, therefore, who looks for life and salvation through the use of his reason, acts contrary to the whole nature of everything that he sees, and knows of himself, and of the nature and state of this world. For, from one end of it to the other, all its material state, all its gross divided elements, declare, that they are what they are, because the light and love of heaven is not working and manifest in them; and that nothing can take darkness, materiality, rage, storms, and tempests, from them, but that same heavenly Light and Love which was made flesh, to redeem the fallen humanity first, and after that the whole material system.

Can the unbeliever, with his reason, bring the light of this world into the eyes of his body? If not, how comes it to be less absurd, or more possible, for reason to bring heavenly light into the soul? Can reason hinder the body from being heavy, or remove thickness and darkness from flesh and blood? Yet nothing less than such a power, can possibly help the soul out of its fallen and earthly state. For the grossness of flesh and blood is the natural state of the fallen soul; and therefore nothing can purify the soul, or raise it out of its earthly, corrupt state, but that which hath all power over all that is earthly and material in nature.

To pretend, therefore, that reason may have sufficient power to remove all hellish depravity and earthly lusts from the soul, whilst it has not the least power over sweet or sour in any one particle of matter in the body, is as highly absurd, as if a man should pretend, that he has a full power to alter the inward, invisible, vegetable life of a plant, but none at all over its outward state, colour, leaves, or fruit. The deist, therefore, and not the christian, stands in need of continual miracles to make good his doctrine. For reason can have no pretence to amend or alter the life of the soul, but so far as it can show, that it has power to amend and alter the nature and state of the body.

The unbelieving Jews said of our Lord, "How can this man forgive sins?" Christ showed them how, by appealing to that power which they saw he had over the body: "Whether (says he) is it easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk?" But the delusion of the unbelieving deist is greater than that of the Jew. For the deist sees, that his reason has no power over his body; can remove no disease, blindness, deafness, or lameness, from it; and yet will pretend to have power enough from his reason, to help the soul out of all its evil; not knowing that body and soul go hand in hand, and are nothing else but the inward and outward state of one and the same life; and that therefore he only, who can say to the dead body of Lazarus, "Come forth," can say to the soul, "Be thou clean." The unbeliever or deist, therefore, if he pleases, may style himself a natural, or a moral philosopher, but with no more truth than he can call himself an healer of all the maladies of the body. And for a man to think himself a moral philosopher, because he has made a choice collection of syllogisms, in order to quicken and revive a Divine goodness in the soul; or that no redeemer need come from heaven, because human reason, when truly left to itself, has great skill in chopping of logic; may justly be deemed such an ignorance of the nature of things, as is seldom found in the transactions of illiterate and vulgar life. But this by the by.—

To return to our chief subject: the sum of all that has been said, is this: all evil, be it what it will; all misery of every kind, is in its birth, working, and extent, nothing else but Nature left to itself, and under the divided workings of its own hunger, wrath, and contrariety; and therefore no possibility for the natural, earthly man to escape eternal hunger, wrath, and contrariety, but solely in the way as the gospel teacheth, by denying and dying to self. On the other hand, all the goodness and perfection, all the happiness, glory, and joy, that any intelligent, divine creature can be possessed of, is, and can be, from nothing else, but the invisible, uncreated Light and Spirit of God manifesting itself in the properties of the creaturely life, filling, blessing, and uniting them all in one love, and joy of life.

And thus again: no possibility of man's attaining to any heavenly perfection and happiness, but only in the way of the gospel, by the union of the divine and human nature, by man's being "born again from above," of the Word and Spirit of God. There is no possibility of any other way, because there is nothing can possibly change the first properties of life into an heavenly state, but the presence, and working power of the Deity united with, and working in them. And therefore the "Word was made flesh," and must of all necessity be made flesh, if man is to have an heavenly nature. Now, as all evil, sin, and misery, have no beginning, nor power of working, but in the manifestation of nature in its divided, contrary properties; so it is certain, that man has nothing to turn to, seek, or aspire after, but the lost Spirit of Love. And therefore it is, that God only can be his Redeemer; because God only is Love; and Love can be nowhere else, but in God, and where God dwelleth and worketh.

Now, the difficulty which you find in attaining to this purity, and universality of the Spirit of love, is because you seek for it, as I once told you, in the way of reasoning: you would be possessed of it only from a rational conviction of the fitness and amiableness of it. And as this clear idea does not put you immediately into the real possession of it, your reason begins to waver; and suggests to you, that it may be only a fine notion, that has no ground but in the power of imagination. But this, sir, is all your own error, and as contrary to nature, as if you would have your eyes do that, which only your hands or feet can do for you. The Spirit of love is a spirit of nature and life; and all the operations of nature and life are according to the working powers of nature; and every growth and degree of life can only arise in its own time and place from its proper cause, and as the genuine effect of it. Nature and life do nothing by chance, or accidentally, but everything in one uniform way. Fire, air, and light, do not proceed sometimes from one thing, and sometimes from another; but wherever they are, they are always born in the same manner, and from the same working in the properties of nature. So in like manner, Love is an immutable birth, always proceeding from the same cause, and cannot be in existence till its own true parents have brought it forth.

How unreasonable would it be, to begin to doubt whether strength and health of body were real things, or possible to be had, because you could not by the power of your reason take possession of them! Yet this is as well as to suspect the PURITY and PERFECTION of LOVE to be only a notion, because your reason cannot bring forth its birth in your soul. For reason has no more power of altering the life and properties of the soul, than of altering the life and properties of the body. That, and that only can cast devils and evil spirits out of the soul, that can say to the storm, "Be still;" and to the leper, "Be thou clean."

The birth of Love is a form or state of life, and has its fixed place in the fifth form of nature. The three first properties, or forms of Nature, are the ground or band of life, that is in itself only an extreme hunger, want, strife, and contrariety. And they are in this state, that they may become a proper fuel for the fourth form of nature, viz. the fire to be kindled in them. You will, perhaps, say, What is this fire? What is its nature? And how is it kindled? And how is it, that the hunger, and anguishing state of the properties, are a fitness to be a fuel of this fire? It may be answered, This hunger and anguish of nature, in its first forms, is its fitness to be changed into a life of light, joy, and happiness: and that for this reason, because it is in this hunger and anguish, only because God is not in it. For as nature comes from God, and for this only end, that the Deity may manifest heaven in it, it must stand in an hunger, and anguishing state, till the Deity is manifested in it. And therefore its hunger and anguish is its true fitness to be changed into a better state: and this is its fitness for the birth of the fire; for the fire means nothing, and is nothing else but that which changes them into a better state. Not as if fire was a fourth, distinct thing, that comes into them from without, but is only a fourth state, or condition, into which the same properties are brought.

The fire then is that, which changes the properties into a new and heavenly state: therefore the fire does two things; it alters the state of Nature, and brings heaven into it: and therefore it must work from a twofold power; the Deity and nature must both be in it. It must have some strength from nature, or it could not work in nature; it must have some strength from the Deity, or it could not overcome, and change Nature into a Divine life. Now all this is only to show you, that the fire can only be kindled by the entrance of the Deity, or supernatural God, into a conjunction or union with nature. And this conjunction of the Deity and nature maketh, or bringeth forth, that state, or form of life, which is called, and truly is fire: first, because it does that in the spiritual properties of nature, which fire doth in the properties of material nature: and, secondly, because it is that alone, from which every fire in this world, whether in the life of animal, or vegetable, or inanimate matter, has its source, and power, and possibility of burning. The fire of this world overcomes its fuel, breaks its nature, alters its state, and changes it into flame and light. But why does it do this? Whence has it this nature and power? It is because it is a true outbirth of the eternal fire, which overcomes the darkness, wrath, and contrariety of nature, and changes all its properties into a life of light, joy, and glory. Not a spark of fire could be kindled in this world, nor a ray of light come from any material fire, but because material nature is, in itself, nothing else but the very properties of eternal nature, standing for a time in a material state, or condition; and therefore they must work in time, as they do in eternity; and consequently there must be fire in this world, it must have the same birth, and do the same work, in its material way, which the eternal fire hath, and doth, in spiritual nature.

And this is the true ground and reason why everything in this world is delivered, as far as it can be, from its earthly impurity, and brought into its highest state of existence, only by fire; it is because the eternal fire is the purifier of eternal Nature, and the opener of every perfection, light, and glory, in it. And if you ask, why the eternal fire is the purifier of eternal nature, the reason is plain; it is because the eternal fire has its birth, and nature, and power, from the entrance of the pure, supernatural Deity into the properties of nature, which properties must change their state, and be what they were not before, as soon as the Deity entereth into them. Their darkness, wrath, and contrariety is driven out of them, and they work, and give forth only a life and strength of light, and joy, and glory. And this twofold operation, viz., on one hand taking from nature its wrathful workings, and on the other hand, opening a glorious manifestation of the Deity in them, is the whole nature and form of the fire, and is the reason why from eternity to eternity it is, and must be, the purifier of eternal nature; namely, as from eternity to eternity changing nature into a kingdom of heaven. Now every fire in this world does, and must do, the same thing in its low way, to the utmost of its power, and can do nothing else. Kindle fire where, or in what, you will, it acts only as from and by the power of this eternal purifying fire; and therefore it breaks and consumes the grossness of everything, and makes all that is pure and spirituous to come forth out of it; and therefore purification is its one only work through all material nature, because it is a real oulbirth of that eternal fire, which purifies eternal nature, and changes it into a mere heaven of glory.

The eternal fire is called a fourth form, or state of Nature; because it cannot exist but from the first three, and hath its work in the fourth place, in the midst of the seven forms, changing the three first into the three last forms of nature; that is, changing them from their natural into an heavenly state. So that, strictly speaking, there are but three forms of nature, in answerableness to the threefold working of the Triune Deity. For the three last are not three new or different properties, but are only the three first brought into a new state, by the entrance of the triune Deity into conjunction with them. Which entrance of the supernatural Deity into them, is the consuming of all that is bad in them, and turning all their strength into a working life of light, joy, and heavenly glory; and therefore has the justest title to be called fire, as having no other nature and operation in it, but the known nature of fire, and also as being that, from which every fire in this world has all its nature and power of doing as it doth. —

You once, as I remember, objected to my speaking so much [See the last Extract] of the "fire of life," as thinking it too gross an expression to be taken in its literal meaning, when mention is made of the eternal fire, or the fire in animal life. But, sir, fire has but one nature through the whole universe of things; and material fire has not more or less of the nature of fire in it, than that which is in eternal nature; because it has nothing, works nothing, but what it has, and works from thence. How easy was it for you to have seen, that the fire of the soul, and the fire of the body, had but one nature? How else could they unite in their heat? How easy also to have seen, that the fire of animal life was the same fire that burns in the kitchen? How else could the kitchen fire be serviceable to animal life? What good could it do you to come to a fire of wood, where you wanted to have the heat of your own life increased? In animal life, the fire is kindled and preserved in such a degree, and in such circumstances, as to be life, and the preservation of life; and this is its difference from fire kindled in wood, and burning it to ashes. It is the same fire, only in a different state, that keeps up life, and consumes wood; and has no other nature in the wood, than in the animal. Just as in water that has only so much fire in it, as to make it warm, and water that is by fire made boiling hot, the same nature and power of fire is in both, but only in a different state. Now will you say, that fire is not to be literally understood, when it only makes water to be warm, because it is not red and flaming, as you see it in a burning coal? Yet this would be as well as to say, that fire is not literally to be understood in the animal life, because it is so different from that fire, which you see burning in a piece of wood.

And thus, sir, there is no foundation for any objection to all that has been said of fire. It is one and the same great power of God in the spiritual and material world: it is the cause of every life, and the opener of every power of nature; and its one great work through all nature and creature, animate and inanimate, is purification and exaltation; it can do nothing else, and that for this plain reason, because its birth is from the entrance of the pure Deity into nature; and therefore must, in its various state and degrees, be only doing that, which the entrance of the Deity into nature does. It must bring every natural thing into its highest state. —

But to go back now to the Spirit of love, and show you the time and place of its birth, BEFORE WHICH, IT CAN HAVE NO EXISTENCE IN YOUR SOUL, do what you will, to have it.

The fire, you see, is the first overcomer of the hungry, wrathful, self-tormenting state of the properties of Nature; and it only overcomes them, because it is the entrance of the pure Deity into them; and therefore that which overcomes them, is the light of the Deity. And this is the true ground and reason, why every right-kindled fire must give forth light, and cannot do otherwise. It is because the eternal fire is only the effect or operation of the supernatural light of the Deity entering into nature; and therefore fire must give forth light, because it is itself only a power of the light; and light can be nowhere in nature, but as a fifth form, or state of nature, brought forth by the fire. And as light thus brought forth, is the first state that is lovely, and delightful in nature, so the Spirit of love has only its birth in the light of life, and can be nowhere else. For the properties of life have no common good, nothing to rejoice in, till the light is found, and therefore no possible beginning of the Spirit of love till then.

The shock that is given to the three first properties of [eternal] Nature, [the ground of the soul,] by the amazing light of the Deity breaking in upon them, is the operation of the fire, that consumes, or takes away, the wrathful strength and contrariety of the properties, and forces each of them to shrink, as it were, away from itself, and come under the power of this new-risen light.*

* For a modern example and illustration of this operation of God upon the soul, diversified, it may be, according to the complexion of the individual, the reader might refer to the biographies of Rogers, Bramwell, and others, who have sought and found God, (so as to be 'quite clear' in the 'blessing of pardon' and the 'witness of the Spirit,') by the good old Gospel-importunate, Jacob-like-wrestling way to Christ, described in Behmen's "Book of True Repentance." And, indeed, may that not be said to be the only sure and direct way to God. But how few religious people have made the trial of it; and who, without stopping at first manifestations, but receiving them only as Divine incentives, have gone on, by the self-same sure, direct, and simple process, to realize the true glory of the kingdom of Christ, viz: PURITY of Heart, of Will, of Intellect, of LOVE, being DEAD TO SELF. — "BE EARNEST, EARNEST!" is the motto to the Symbol attached to Behmen's WAY TO CHRIST, in the German Edition.

Here all strife of enmity and wrathful contrariety in the properties must cease, because all united in the Love of the light, and all equally helping one another to an higher enjoyment and delight in it. They are all one triune will, all doing the same thing; viz. all rejoicing in the one love of the light. And HERE IT IS, in this delightful unity of operation, THAT THE SPIRIT OF LOVE IS BORN, in the fifth property, or light of life; and cannot possibly rise up in any creature, till the properties of its life are brought into this fifth state, thus changed, and exalted into a new sensibility of life. Let me give you this similitude of the matter; fancy to yourself a man shut up in a deep cave under ground, without ever having seen a ray of the light, his body all over tortured with pain, his mind distracted with rage, himself whirling and working with the utmost fury and madness, he knows not what; and then you have an image of the first properties of life, as they are in themselves, before the fire had done its work in them:

Fancy this man suddenly struck, or all surrounded, with such a glare of light, as, in the twinkling of an eye, stopped, or struck dead, every working of every pain and rage, both in his body and mind; and then you have an image of the operation of the fire, and what it does to the first properties of nature. Now as soon as the first terror of the light has had its fiery operation, and struck nothing dead, but every working sensibility of distress, fancy this man, as you now well may, in the sweetest peace of mind, and bodily sensations, blessed in a new region of light, giving joy to his mind, and gratification to every sense; and then the transports, the overflowings of Love and delight in this new state, may give you an image [of the New-birth and] how the Spirit of love is, and must be born, when fire and light have overcome, and changed the state of the first properties of nature, and never, till then, can have any existence in any creature, nor proceed from any other cause.—Thus, sir, you may sufficiently see, how vainly you attempt to possess yourself of the Spirit of love by the power of your reason; and also what a vanity of all vanities there is in the religion of the unbelievers and deists, who will have no other perfection, or divine life, but what they can have from their reason; as great a contradiction to nature, as if they would have no life or strength of body, but that which can be had from their faculty of reasoning. For reason can no more alter or exalt any one property of life in the soul, and bring it into its perfect state, than it can add one cubit to the stature of the body. The perfection of every life is no way possible to be had; but as every flower comes to its perfection; viz., from its own seed and root, and the various degrees of transmutation, which must be gone through, before the flower is found. IT IS STRICTLY THUS WITH THE PERFECTION OF THE SOUL; all its properties of life must have their true natural birth, and growth, from one another. The first, as its seed and root, must have their natural change into an higher state; must, like the seed of the flower, pass through death into life, and be blessed with the fire, and light, and spirit of heaven, in their passage to it; just as the seed passes through death into life, blessed by the fire, and light, and air of this world, till it reaches its last perfection, and becomes a beautiful, sweet-smelling flower. And to think that the soul can attain its perfection any other way, than by the change and exaltation of its first properties of life, just as the seed has its first properties changed and exalted, till it comes to have its flower, is a total ignorance of the nature of things. For as whatever dies, cannot have a death particular to itself, but the same death in the same way, and for the same reasons, that any other creature, whether animal or vegetable, ever did or can die; so every life, and degree of life, must come into its state and condition of life in the same way, and for the same reasons, as life, and the perfection of life, comes into every other living creature, whether in heaven, or on earth. Therefore the deist's religion, or reason, which is to raise the soul to its true perfection, is so far from being the religion of nature, that it is quite unnatural, and declared to be so by every working in nature. For since reason can neither give life, nor death, to any one thing in nature, but everything lives, or dies, according to the working of its own properties; everything, dead and alive, gives forth a demonstration, that nature asks no counsel of reason nor stays to be directed by it.

Hold it therefore for a certain truth, that you can have no good come into your soul, but only by the one way of a birth from above, from the entrance of the Deity into the properties of your own soulish life. NATURE MUST BE SET RIGHT, ITS PROPERTIES MUST ENTER INTO THE PROCESS OF A NEW-BIRTH, IT MUST WORK TO THE PRODUCTION OF LIGHT, [as indicated in Behmen's Way to Christ, in the tract of "True Repentance,"] BEFORE THE SPIRIT OF LOVE CAN HAVE A BIRTH IN YOU. For Love is delight, and delight cannot arise in any creature, till its nature is in a delightful state, or is possessed of that, in which it must rejoice. And this is the reason why God must become man; it is because a birth of the Deity must be found in the soul, giving to nature all that it wants, or the soul can never find itself in a delightful state, and only working with the Spirit of love. For whilst the soul has only its natural life, it can only be in such a state, as nature, without God, is in; viz., a mere hunger, want, contrariety, and strife, for it knows not what. Hence is all that variety of blind, restless, contrary passions, which govern and torment the life of fallen man. It is because all the properties of nature must work in blindness, and be doing they know not what, till the light of God is found in them. Hence also it is, that that which is called the wisdom, the honour, the honesty, and the religion, of the natural man, often does as much hurt to himself, and others, as his pride, ambition, self-love, envy, or revenge; and are subject to the same humour and caprice; it is because nature is no better in one motion than in another, nor can be so, till something supernatural is come into it. We often charge men, both in church and state, with changing their principles; but the charge is too hasty; for no man ever did, or can change his principles, but by a birth from above. The natural, called in Scripture the old man, is steadily the same in heart and spirit, in everything he does, whatever variety of names may be given to his actions. For self can have no motion but what is selfish, which way soever it goes, or whatever it does, either in church or state. And be assured of this, that nature in every man, whether he be learned or unlearned, is this very self, and can be nothing else, till a birth of the Deity is brought forth in it. There is therefore no possibility of having the Spirit of love, or any divine goodness, from any power of nature, or working of reason. It can only be had in its own time and place; and its time and place is nowhere, but where nature is overcome by a birth of the life of God in the properties of the soul. And thus you see the infallible truth, and absolute necessity, of Christian redemption; it is the most demonstrable thing in all nature.—The Deity must become man, take a birth in the fallen nature, be united to it, become the life of it, or the natural man must of all necessity be for ever and ever in the hell of his own hunger, anguish, contrariety, and self-torment; and all for this plain reason, because nature is, and can be, nothing else, but this variety of self-torment, till the Deity is manifested and dwelling in it.

And now, sir, you see also the absolute necessity of the gospel doctrine of "the cross;" viz. of DYING TO SELF, as the ONE ONLY WAY TO LIFE IN GOD. This "cross," or dying to Self, is the one morality that does man any good. Fancy as many rules as you will, of modelling the moral behaviour of man, they all do nothing, because they leave nature still alive; and therefore can only help a man to a feigned, hypocritical art of concealing his own inward evil, and seeming to be not under its power. And the reason why it must be so, is plain; it is because Nature is not possible to be reformed; it is immutable in its workings, and must be always as it is, and never any better or worse, than its own untought workings are. It can no more change from evil to good, than darkness can work itself into light. The one work, therefore, of morality, is the one doctrine of THE CROSS; viz. to resist and deny nature, that a supernatural power, or Divine goodness may take possession of it, and bring a new Light into it.*

In a word, there are, in all the possibility of things, but two states, or forms of life; the one is Nature, and the other is God manifested in nature; and as God and nature are both within you, so you have it in your power, to live and work with which you will; but are under a necessity of doing either the one, or the other. There is no standing still, life goes on, and is always bringing forth its realities, which way soever it goeth.—You have seen, that the properties of nature are, and can be, nothing else in their own life, but a restless hunger, disquiet, and blind strife, for they know not what, till the property of light and love has got possession of them. Now when you see this, you see the true state of every natural man, whether he be Cesar or Cato, whether he gloriously murders others, or only stabs himself, blind nature does all the work, and must be the doer of it, till the Christ of God is born in him. For the life of man can be nothing else, but an hunger of covetousness, a rising up of pride, envy and wrath. a medley of contrary passions, doing and undoing it knows not what, because these workings are essential to the properties of nature; they must be always hungering, and working one against another, striving to be above one another,

* THERE IS NO NEED OF A NUMBER OF PRACTICES, OR METHODS, in this matter. For to DIE TO SELF, or to come from under its power, is not, cannot be done by any active resistance we can make to it by the powers of nature. For Nature can no more overcome or suppress itself, than wrath can heal wrath. So long as Nature acts, nothing but natural works are brought forth, and therefore the more labour of this kind, the more nature is fed and strengthened with its own food.

But the one true way of dying to Self, is most simple and plain, it wants no arts, or methods, no cells, monasteries, or pilgrimages, it is equally practicable by every body, it is always at hand, it meets you in every thing, it is free from all deceit, and is never without success.

If you ask what this one, true, simple, plain, immediate, and unerring way is; it is the way of patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God. This is the truth and perfection of dying to self: it is no where else, nor possible to be in any thing else, but in this state of heart.

Theogenes.—The excellency and perfection of these virtues, I readily acknowledge; but alas, sir, how will this prove the way of overcoming self to be so simple, plain, immediate, and unerring as you speak of? For is it not the doctrine of almost all men, and all books, and confirmed by our own woeful experience, that much length of time, and exercise, and variety of practices and methods are necessary, and scarce sufficient to the attainment of any one of these four virtues?

Theophilus.—When Christ our Saviour was upon earth, was there anything more simple, plain, immediate, unerring, than the way to him? Did scribes, pharisees, publicans, and sinners, want any length of time, or exercise of rules, and methods, before they could have admission to him, or have the benefit of faith in him?

Theogenes.—I don't understand, why you put this question, nor do I see how it can possibly relate to the matter before us.

Theophilus.—It is not only relates to, but is the very heart and truth of the matter before us: it is not appealed to, by way of illustration of our subject, but it is our subject itself, only set in a truer and stronger light. For when I refer you to patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God, as the one simple, plain, immediate, and unerring way of dying to self, or being saved from it: I call it so, for no other reason, but because you can as easily and immediately, without art or method, by the mere turning and faith of your mind, have all the benefit of these virtues, as publicans and sinners by their turning to Christ, could be helped, and saved by him.

Theogenes.—But, good sir, would you have me then believe, that my turning and giving up myself to these virtues, is as certain and immediate a way of my being directly possessed, and blessed by their good power, as when sinners turned to Christ to be helped and saved by him? Surely this is too short a way, and has too much of miracle in it, to be now expected.

Theophilus.—I would have you STRICTLY TO BELIEVE ALL THIS in the fullest sense of the words. And also to believe, that the reasons why you, or any one else, are for a long time vainly endeavoring after, and hardly ever attaining these first-rate virtues, is because you seek them in the way they are not to be found, in a multiplicity of human rules, methods, and contrivances, and not in that simplicity of faith, in which those who applied to Christ immediately obtained that which they asked of him. [They are only another name for Christ, 'the Spirit of Love.']

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you." How short, and simple, and certain a way to peace and comfort, from the misery and burden of sin! What becomes now of your length of time, and exercise, your rules, and methods, and round-about ways, to be delivered from self, the power of sin, and find the redeeming power and virtue of Christ? Will you say, that turning to Christ in faith was once indeed the way for Jews and heathens to enter into life, and be delivered from the power of their sins, but that all this happiness was at an end, as soon as Pontius Pilate had nailed this good Redeemer to the cross, and so broke off all immediate union and communion between faith and Christ?

WHAT A FOLLY would it be to SUPPOSE, that Christ, after his having finished his great work, overcome death, ascended into heaven, with all power in heaven, and on earth, was become less a Saviour, and gave less certain and immediate helps to those that by faith turn to him now, than when he was clothed with the infirmity of our flesh and blood upon earth? Has he less power, after he has conquered, than whilst he was only resisting and fighting with our enemies? Or has he less good will to assist his church, his own body, now he is in heaven, than he had to assist publicans, sinners, and heathens, before he was glorified, as the Redeemer of the world? And yet this must and all this in blindness, till the light of God has helped them to one common good, in which they all willingly unite, rest, and rejoice. In a word, goodness is only a sound, and virtue a mere strife of natural passions, till the Spirit of love is the breath of everything that lives, and moves in the heart. For love is the one only blessing, and goodness, and God of nature; and you have no true religion, are no worshipper of the one true God, but in and by that SPIRIT OF LOVE, WHICH IS THE INCARNATE WORD, OR GOD HIMSELF, LIVING AND WORKING IN YOU.

It was proposed, in reference to the evangelical use of these writings, as to the true mode of propagating christianity among sophisticated unbelievers, of whatever name, nation, or creed,—to insert in this place, some lengthened extracts from the book entitled “The Way to Divine Knowledge;” but upon a further minute examination of that work, every part of it has been found to be so deserving of attention, that, instead of offering to the reader’s notice a few detached portions thereof, he is earnestly recommended, immediately after the perusal of the next following extract, to turn to the work itself, and to give it one fair perusal in the order in which it is written.

The writer of these lines has occasionally met with individuals, and also read the writings of individuals, who have much admired and professed to understand BEHMEN and LAW; but he does not remember to have ever met with be the case, if our earnestly turning to him in faith and hope, is not as sure a way of obtaining immediate assistance from him now, as when he was upon earth.

Theogenes.—You seem, sir, to me, to have stepped aside from the point in question, which was not, whether my turning, or giving myself up to Christ, in faith in him, would not do me as much good, as it did to them who turned to him when he was upon earth? But whether my turning in faith and desire, to patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God, would do all that as fully for me now, as faith in Christ did for those who became his disciples?

Theophilus.—I have stuck closely, my friend, to the point before us. Let it be supposed, that I had given you a form of prayer in these words, “O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world; or, O thou bread that camest down from heaven, or Thou that art the resurrection and the life, the light and peace of all holy souls, help me to a living faith in Thee.” Would you say, that this was not a prayer of faith in, and to Christ, because it did not call him Jesus, or the Son of God? Answer me plainly.

Theogenes.—What can I answer you, but that this is a most true and good prayer to Jesus, the Son of the living God? For who else but he was the Lamb of God, and the bread that came down.

Theophilus.—Well answered, my friend. When, therefore, I exhort you to give up yourself in faith and hope, to patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God, what else do I do, but turn you directly to so much faith and hope in the true Lamb of God? For if I ask you, what the Lamb of God is, and means, must you not tell me, that it is, and means, the perfection of patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God? Can you say, it is either more or less than this? Must you not therefore say, that a faith of hunger and thirst, and desire of these virtues, is in spirit and truth, the one very same thing, as a faith of hunger, and thirst, and desire of salvation through the Lamb of God? And consequently, that every sincere wish and desire, every inward inclination of your heart, that presses after these virtues, and longs to be governed by them, is an immediate, direct application to Christ, is worshipping and falling down before him, is giving up yourself unto him, and the very perfection of faith in him.

If you distrust my words, hear the words of Christ himself; “Learn of me, (says he,) for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls.” Here you have the plain truth of our two points, fully asserted, first, that to be given up to, or stand in a desire of patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God, is strictly the same thing, as to learn of Christ, or to have faith in him. Secondly, that this is the one simple, short, and infallible way to overcome, or be delivered from all the malignity, and burden of Self, expressed in these words, “and ye shall find rest unto your souls.”

And all this, because this simple tendency, or inward inclination of your heart, to sink down into patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God, is truly giving up all that you are, and all that you have from fallen Adam; it is perfectly leaving all that you have, to follow, and be with Christ; it is your highest act of faith in him, and love of him, the most ardent and earnest declaration of your cleaving to him with all your heart, and seeking for no salvation, but in him, and from him. And therefore all the good, and blessing, pardon, and deliverance from sin, that ever happened to any one, from any kind, or degree of faith and hope, and application to Christ, is sure to be had from this state of heart, which stands continually turned to him in a hunger and desire of being led and governed by his spirit of patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God. Oh Theogenes, could I help you to perceive or feel what a good there is in this state of heart, you would desire it with more eagerness, than the thirsty hart desireth the water brooks; you would think of nothing, desire nothing, but constantly to live in it. It is a security from all evil, and all delusion; no difficulty or trial, either of body or mind, no temptation, either within you, or without you, but what has its full remedy in this state of heart. You have no questions to ask of anybody, no new way that you need inquire after; no oracle that you need to consult, for whilst you shut up yourself in patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God, you are in the very arms of Christ, your whole heart is his dwelling-place, and he lives and works in you, as certainly as he lived in and governed that body and soul, which he took from the Virgin Mary.

Learn whatever else you will from men and books, or even from Christ himself, besides, or without these virtues, and you are only a poor wanderer in a barren wilderness, where no water of life is to be found. For Christ is no where, but in these virtues, and where they are, there is he in his any that seemed to apprehend, clearly, the precise evangelical character, object, and applicability of the writings of those two eminent individuals. At all events, if they have really so understood their nature and character, they have never distinctly defined them: and, it is but natural to suppose, from the numerous objections that have from time to time been made against those writings by many good though, it may be, unphilosophical men, as well as by others less deserving of attention, that they would, in enlightenment of such, have clearly explained their drift and purport; leaving to the opponents, if any, after such explanation, either to disprove their statement, or to admit it, and thenceforth to duly reverence what, until then, they might have ignorantly disesteemed.

Merging, for the present consideration, BEHMEN in LAW, the latter, as before observed, being the providential agent to interpret and demonstrate to the learned world, in a strictly scholastic manner, the verity of his principles, and the truth of the 'great mystery' of things revealed in his writings,—were the writer asked by a sincere inquirer, to describe to him in a few words, the precise character of LAW's philosophical writings, (his earlier productions being own kingdom. From morning to night, let this be the Christ that you follow, and then you will fully escape all the religious delusions that are in the world, and what is more, all the delusions of your own selfish heart.

For to seek to be saved by patience, meekness, humility of heart, and resignation to God, is truly coming to God through Christ; and when these tempers live and abide in you, as the spirit and aim of your life, then Christ is in you of a truth, and the life that you then lead is not yours, but Christ that liveth in you. For this is following Christ with all your power: you cannot possibly make more haste after him, you have no other way of walking as he walked, no other way of being like him, of truly believing in him, of showing your trust in him, and dependence upon him, but by wholly giving up yourself to that which he was, viz. to patience, meekness, humility, and resignation to God. [THE FOUR PROPERTIES OF THE SPIRIT OF LOVE.]

Tell me, now, have I enough proved to you the short, simple, and certain way of destroying that body of Self, which lives and works in the four elements of covetousness, envy, pride and wrath?

Theogenes.—Enough of all reason. But as to covetousness, I thank God, I cannot charge myself with it; it has no power over me, nay, I naturally abhor it. And I also now clearly see, why I have been so long struggling in vain, against other selfish tempers.

Theophilus.—Permit me, my friend, to remove your mistake. Had covetousness no power over you, you could have no other selfish tempers to struggle against. They are all dead, as soon as covetousness has done working in you. You take covetousness to relate only to the wealth of this world. But this is but one single branch of it, its nature is as large as desire, and wherever selfish desire is, there is all the evil nature of covetousness.

Now envy, pride, hatred, or wrath, can have no possibility of existence in you, but because there is some selfish desire alive in you, that is not satisfied, not gratified, but resisted, or disappointed. And, therefore, so long as any selfish tempers, whether of envy, uneasiness, complaint, pride, or wrath, are alive in you, you have the fullest proof, that all these tempers are born and bred in, and from your own covetousness, that is, from that same selfish bad desire, which when it is turned to the wealth of this world, is called covetousness. For all these FOUR ELEMENTS OF SELF, or fallen nature, are tied together in one inseparable band, they mutually generate, and are generated from one another, they have but one common life, and must all of them live, or all die together. This may show you again the absolute necessity of our one simple and certain way of dying to self, and the absolute insufficiency of all human means whatever, to effect it.

For consider only this, that to be angry at our own anger, to be ashamed of our own pride, and strongly resolve not to be weak, is the upshot of all human endeavours; and yet all this is rather the life than the death of self! There is no help but from a total despair of all human help.—When a man is brought to such an inward, full conviction, as to have no more hope from all human means, than he hopes to see with his hands, or hear with his feet, then it is, that he is truly prepared to die to self; that is, to give up all thoughts of having or doing anything that is good, in any other way, but that of a meek, humble, patient, total resignation of himself to God. All that we do before this conviction, is in great IGNORANCE of ourselves, and full of weakness and impurity. Let our ZEAL be ever so wonderful, yet if it begins sooner, or proceeds farther, or to any other matter, or in any other way, than as it is led and guided by this conviction, it is full of delusion. No repentance, however long or laborious, is conversion to God, till it falls into this STATE. For God must do all, or all is nothing; but God cannot do all, till all is expected from him; and all is not expected from him, till, by a true and good despair of every human help, we have no hope or trust, or longing after anything but a patient, meek, humble, total resignation to God.

And now, my dear friends, I have brought you to the very place for which I desired this day's conversation; which was, to set your feet upon sure ground, with regard to the Spirit of love. For all that variety of matters, through which we have passed, has been only a variety of proofs, that the Spirit of Divine Love can have no place or possibility of birth in any fallen creature, till it wills, and chooses to be dead to all self, in a patient, meek, humble resignation to the good power and mercy of God.

And from this state of heart also, it is, that the 'Spirit of PRAYER' is born, which is THE DESIRE OF THE SOUL TURNED TO GOD. Stand, therefore, steadfastly in this will, let nothing else enter into your mind, have no other contrivance, but everywhere, and in everything, to nourish and keep up this admitted to be the providential instrument to revive the truth and fulness of practical christianity among avowed christians, chiefly by placing the motives and exhortations to a strict and regular devotion, in their highest, clearest, and most affecting light, and laying down rules for the attainment of a habit of piety); were he thus to be asked, he would answer, first, that LAW is to be considered a sublime metaphysical philosopher, standing in a somewhat similar relation to the intellectual universe, in regard to the demonstration of its powers, laws, and operations, as Sir Isaac Newton to the physical universe, with its constitution and laws; and, that both one and the other derive their special renown from the self-same source, viz. BEHMEN. So indubitable does the latter circumstance appear, that the writer is acquainted with an individual who does not hesitate to affirm, that if he were but a profound mathematician, and were able to put himself back to the time and circumstances of Sir Isaac's day, he has no doubt whatever of being able naturally, by force of imagination, thought, researches, trials, and experiments, etc., to run over exactly the same ground as did Sir Isaac, and to arrive at the same results, just as the truth of things opened itself in his mind. For truth, as a life, and a power or vegetation of life, is ONE, and, in the same circumstances, will evolve in the same state of heart, and then your house is built upon a rock; you are safe from all danger; the light of heaven and the love of God, will begin their work in you, will bless and sanctify every power of your fallen soul, you will be in a readiness for every kind of virtue and good work, and will know what it is to be led by the Spirit of God.

Theogenes.—But, dear Theophilus, though I am so delighted with what you say, that I am loth to stop you, yet permit me to mention a fear that rises up in me. Suppose I should find myself so overcome with my own darkness and selfish tempers, as not to be able to sink from them into a sensibility of this meek, humble, patient, full resignation to God; what must I then do, or how shall I have the benefit of what you have taught me?

Theophilus.—You are then at the very time and place of receiving the fullest benefit from it, and practising it with the greatest advantage to yourself. For though this patient, meek resignation, is to be exercised with regard to all outward things, and occurrences of life, yet it chiefly respects our own inward state, the troubles, perplexities, weaknesses, and disorders of our own fallen souls. And to stand turned to a patient, meek, humble resignation to God, when your own impatience, wrath, pride, and irresolution attacks yourself, is a higher, and more beneficial performance of this duty, than when you stand turned to meekness and patience, when attacked by the pride, or wrath, or disorderly passions of other people. I say, stand turned to this patient, humble resignation, for this is your true performance of this duty at that time; and though you may have no comfortable sensibility of your performing it, yet in this state you may always have one full proof of the truth and reality of it; and that is, when you seek for help no other way, nor in anything else, neither from men nor books, but WHOLLY LEAVE AND GIVE UP YOURSELF to be helped by the MERCY of GOD. And thus, be your state what it will, you may always have the full benefit of this short and sure way of resigning up yourself to God. And the greater the perplexity of your distress is, the nearer you are to the greatest and best relief, provided you have but PATIENCE to expect it ALL FROM GOD. For nothing brings you so near to divine relief, as the extremity of distress; for the goodness of God hath no other name or nature, but the helper of all that wants to be helped; and nothing can possibly hinder your finding this goodness of God, and every other gift and grace that you stand in need of; nothing can hinder or delay it but your turning from the only fountain of life and living water, to some cracked cistern of your own making; to this or that method, opinion, division, or subdivision, amongst christians, carnally expecting some mighty things, either from Samaria or Jerusalem, Paul or Apollos, which are only and solely to be had, by worshipping the Father in spirit and truth: which is then only done, when your whole heart, and soul, and spirit, trusts wholly and solely to the operation of that God within you, in whom we live, move, and have our being. And BE ASSURED of this, as a most certain truth, that we have neither more nor less of the Divine operation within us, because of this or that outward form, or manner of our life, but just and strictly in that degree, as our faith, and hope, and trust, and dependence upon God, is more or less in us. [Dead to Self, and alive to God: who willeth this Salvation?]

What a folly then, to be so often perplexed about the way to God! For n^o thing is the way to God, but our heart; God is no where else to be found, and the heart itself cannot find him, or be helped by anything else to find him, but by its own love of him, faith in him, dependence upon him, resignation to him, and expectation of all from him.—

These are short, but full articles of true religion, which carry salvation along with them, which make a true and full offering and oblation of our whole nature to the Divine operation, and also a true and full confession of the holy Trinity in Unity. For as they look wholly to the Father, as blessing us, with the operation of his own Word, and Spirit, so they truly comess and worship the Holy Trinity of God. And as they ascribe all to, and expect all from, this Deity alone, so they make the truest and best of all confessions, that there is no God but One.

Let, then, arians, semi-arians, and socinians, who puzzle their laborious brains to make paper images of a Trinity for themselves, have nothing from you but your pity and prayers; your foundation standeth sure, whilst you seek for all your salvation through the FATHER, working life in your soul by his own Word and Spirit which dwell in him, and are ONE LIFE, BOTH IN HIM AND YOU.

manner: which principle by the way, though couched in other terms, was some few years ago, in Belgium, assumed as a discovery by Jacotot. However, to give a popular reply to the question, the writer would say, LAW is the Newton of metaphysics; he would also add, in the words of LAW, that "the ground and mystery of all things was never opened in any man but BEHMEN, and, there are good reasons for supposing, will never again be opened in any other man;" that BEHMEN's mind therefore, (and, in a good sense, our own mind also,) shadowed forth as well as it was possible in the mirror and on the platform of his writings, is a grand mine, or garden full of the seeds and births of universal truth; and that LAW, (from a living knowledge and experience thereof, in his own microcosm,) is the learned opener, displayer, and demonstrator of its riches and wonders.—And if it were further remarked and inquired, 'since there can be nothing new in religion, and as Christianity is a complete system, and a perfect revelation, what then is the use and purport of these writings, and for whom are they intended,' in other words, 'who are the children of this mystery'; and 'are these works profitable for Christians in general, and if so, to what end, and in what degree?' The answer is, first, that they are not at all necessary for Christians, any more than the elements of geometry are necessary to be apprehended by a labouring farmer, or any other person engaged in the essential occupations of agriculture. For what has a labouring man to do with the Philosophy of nature, in searching out the how and the why of her operations: it suffices him to know the facts of the course of nature, without troubling himself about the ground and reasons of them; and with such knowledge, he pursues his business, he sows his seed and duly reaps wherewithal to subsist.—Nor are these writings necessary to the great body of people of a Christian country, that is, who receive as true, the series of theorems constituting that branch of revealed truth denominated Christianity, and contained in the Holy Scriptures. For these, acquiescing in the truth of the Christian doctrine, do not therefore require or demand an erudite demonstration of it. Indeed, a fundamental demonstration of the truth of the Christian religion in all its parts, from first principles, would but puzzle and confound such simple souls, and take off their attention from the one essential point, which is the end of all knowledge, viz. the constant practice and personal verification of its truths: which very circumstance indeed has occasionally happened with regard to these writings, that is, some simple religious individuals have been greatly injured in their spiritual interests, by their unbecoming inquisitiveness into the writings of these authors, (as they might have been by meddling with, and misusing any other good gift of God), having thereby all but lost themselves in an incomprehensible labyrinth; and yet, it must be admitted that, in so doing, they paid no more regard to the plain nature of things, than if they had been endeavouring to master the seventeenth problem of the twelfth book of Euclid, without having passed through, or even looked at the preliminary books and course of study, and that with the sole object, strange as it may seem, to find out the 'plan of salvation,' and save their souls!—Nor are these writings necessary to those happy, well-instructed individuals who are wholly and solely intent upon putting the Gospel revelation to the proof, thereby realising the present fruits of faith, and, it may be added, of the most perfect knowledge: who, though conscious there must, in the nature of things, be a deep mysterious ground and philosophy of truth, yet resolutely shut their eyes against any inquiry, on their part, into it, whether it may have pleased the wisdom of God to reveal it or not. These blessed souls, receiving the truth in the love of it, and knowing they may enjoy all the benefits of the most enlarged apprehension of it, without understanding one single reason whereon it is founded, are the right men and heirs of faith; they hear God's words, believe them, constrain themselves to obey them, (even to the least of the commands and exhortations of Jesus Christ and his apostles,) and so, in due time, after having served their day and generation according to the will of God, they are gathered to the bosom of the father of the faithful; wherefore neither are such writings required for them: of which class may be reckoned Kempis, Bramwell, and other worthies, and, judging from his sermon preached at St. Paul's, on Christmas day, the present Dean of that Cathedral.—Nor are they finally, and least of all, needful for unlettered, unsophisticate* minds, who, when they hear the simple message of the preacher of the Gospel, as unreasoning “little children” at once heartily embrace it, comply with its dictates, and reap the benefits; which is the ground and reason of the success of the “preaching of the gospel to the poor,” whether of our own country or among the savages of the South-sea islands.†——It may now be asked, ‘For whom, then, are these writings useful, and what is their intent?’ The writer would answer, first, if he knew any honest enquiring minds of a Christian country that, after a careful study of the Holy Scriptures, and much pondering upon the great mystery of things, all around and within them, especially upon the seeming incompatibility of the bloody cruelty, misery, and shocking injustice, which are daily and with impunity perpetrated, and likewise recounted in the Old

* This word has been adopted as a general term, and antithesis to the subtle jesuitical character of the reasoning faculty, after having been raised into a consciousness of its own powers, (by listening to the voice of the serpent, as did our mother Eve, and so lost her pure virginal innocence,) in one man after this, in another after that manner, though in all more or less, except those who, in an implicit blind faith, and absolute resignation, govern all the parts of their life by a resolute unreasoning obedience to the injunctions and wisdom of God, through his expressed Word and Spirit, in the Holy Scriptures, and understood according to their simple, prima-facie sense; neither looking for, nor admitting any other meaning than what the plain tenor of the Divine commands and counsels intimate, and which their author, the same eternal Word and Spirit engrafted in the mind, responds to, and operates therein. For such is the justice and mercy of God, we all stand in the self-same position as our forefather Adam, when upon his trial in the garden of Eden, with regard to faith and reasoning.—Human nature, indeed, may be very briefly described, under the two terms adopted by, and by the world appropriated to the institute of Loyala, viz., Jesuits and Jesuites; the latter section, in dove-like simplicity, but with solid understanding, taking the gospel for its one rule of obedience and book of reference in all cases; the former either excluding it almost altogether, or reasoning down its standard, or taking along with it the traditions, and libraries, and products of the reasoning wisdom of all the learning of all ages of the world, as its rule and guide, and standard. We are, alas, all jesuits, and jesuitical sophists, and must remain so, until we are born-again of the Light and Spirit of God (as previously described), and so far as we abide in the Divine Love, by simple faith, and resolute blind obedience; for, who cannot find a reason for his own will, indeed for anything! Jesuits, therefore, swarm in the church, the law, trade, everywhere: in the former, the principle retains its name; in the law, it is serpentine craft and subtlety; in trade, and general life, it is vulgarly termed humbug. But, save us from the jesuits where “the church” predominates in a country, and the press is controlled: the inquisition, the devil's own throne, and most complete figure of the hellish principle upon earth, will speedily raise its horrible head, and, as a withering blight, spread desolation over all of that nation.

† The present missionary policy is, of course, correct in regard to illiterate, unsophisticated people of foreign lands; but it is only so far correct in regard to Theistical and intellectual heathen nations, as respects the translation of the Holy Scriptures, into their several languages; for it can proceed no further, for the very apparent reasons alleged throughout this treatise. What is next wanted for the further progress of the evangelisation of such nations, is the Philosophy of the truth contained in the Sacred Scriptures, or in other words, a demonstration of Christianity in its several essential features, and grand comprehensive scope of nature and grace. And as this is the thing that is wanted, what more natural than to conclude, as the philosophers of the age prior to Newton did, respecting the true philosophy of the physical universe, viz. that it was reserved to the succeeding age to declare it, and that God would, doubtless, cause it to be brought to pass; as was, indeed, actually accomplished. Now we have already said that Law may be considered the Newton of metaphysics; and that not only have the truths of christianity been essentially revealed, but the strict demonstration thereof has also been afforded, both naturally and scholastically, so that we have indeed, the very remedy that was wanting for the unbelief of those several nations and people, above referred to. What then is to be done? what is our duty in this case, and the duty of all such as desire that God's kingdom may come, and all nations bow at the name of Jesus? but to have these writings translated into those several languages, into which the Scriptures have been translated, as inseparable accompaniments to them. This, therefore, being the next step, both in the order of nature and grace, why not take it at once, without further delay? Or must there be a war such as that which Newton had to wage with prejudice and partiality, for almost half a century, before the truth shall be established and acted upon. For if it is the truth, (which all duly qualified minds may easily ascertain,) it must and will assuredly prevail, though the splendour of its appearing may be delayed by the perversity or obtuseness of its professed friends, who will thereby deprive themselves of that high honour which must necessarily belong to those who have been the immediate co-workers with God in so noble a cause, as that of the gathering in of all nations to the fold of Christ, and, the times of the Gentiles being fulfilled, lastly, God's ancient people, the remnant of the Jews. Shall there then be a great delay? It remains for the consciences of the leaders of our great missionary societies to decide.—But, the subject is being anticipated.

We have alluded to the power of prejudice in preventing, or rather retarding, the development

Testament itself, with the nature and character of the Deity, as described in the Christian revelation, as an omnipotent, omnipresent, all-wise Being, who is all love and goodness to his creatures; if there were, as doubtless there are many such, who thus stand in a state of doubt and uncertainty respecting the Holy Scriptures and the working wisdom of Divine Love, then it may be truly said, that to such is the word of this revelation sent; and if they were but to read over the works of these Authors in the order and manner herein prescribed, they would undoubtedly receive therefrom all that satisfaction, peace, and contentment, which their several cases required. And moreover, they would, thereby, be disposed to step at once into the ranks of Christianity, willingly and cheerfully taking up the cross, and following their leader, pattern, and forerunner, the Lord Jesus, in the gospel narrow path which he has traced out for us, through this world into his heavenly kingdom: in which class of individuals, we may charitably include all honest unbelievers, whether Deists, Arians, Socinians, or nominal Christians.—May we not also name another class, as one for whom it is probable the goodness of God may of the Divine designs, in regard to man; how that Newton, with all his prudential accommodation to the weaknesses of human nature, had still to contend, and wait patiently, for a long period of time, before he saw his principles perfectly established; (as, indeed, is generally the case with every grand innovation, however sound and beneficial in its operations;) but what must have been the opposition to them, supposing he had openly avowed the source from whence he derived them?—Now, though human nature is still the same, yet, the writer being convinced that the present is not the day to sacrifice the interests of pure and universal truth to the imaginary bug-bear of public opinion, the peculiar idiosyncracies, sectarian partialities, and imperfect apprehensions of popular religionists, and the current doctrines of the times, has not hesitated, as will have been observed, to declare undisguisedly, the names of the individuals, whose writings, he feels assured, when taken by their right handle, (notwithstanding all the obloquy with which ignorance and malice have hitherto popularly invested them,) are calculated to produce as mighty a change in the moral philosophy of the East, if not of the West, as the discoveries of Newton effected in the philosophy of the physical universe. And indeed where truth is the subject in question, truth relating to the eternal well-being of millions of our redeemed fellow-creatures, at present unconscious of their high descent and birthright prerogatives, both of creation and redemption, as revealed in the gospel, what becomes, in such cases, the part of its faithful advocate, however humble and otherwise insignificant, but to set it forth without reserve, in the exulting assurance of the spirit of David in the following verses: Ps. xxvii.—“The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?—When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me, to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell.—Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident,” etc.

The following extract will show the working of the leaven of popular prejudice in Law's own day, with respect to himself; though, as his antagonists seldom escaped out of his hands but with the loss of everything, and then without any other commiseration from the spectators, than a mere expression of pity at their wretched condition, it is rather surprising his adversaries should not have studied him better, before venturing upon attacking him; for, surely never did a writer make more terrible, justifiable slaughter of his literary foes, however learned and powerful they might have previously considered themselves. Being a perfect master of all solid erudition, upon which was superinduced uncommon degrees of almost super human wisdom, and possessed of the highest accomplishments of rhetoric, and, moreover, having, naturally, a strong tincture of bitterness in his mental constitution, which, though regulated by Christian philosophy, could not fail to be strengthened by his profound acquaintance with the wise and devout of past ages, and the severe discipline to which he, as a son of wisdom, had accustomed himself, as well, by his earnest serious and christian tone, and the elevated character of his principles, his manifest consciousness of being on the right side, and merely a defender of the truth, and of being able to support its interests successfully in every way, and by the unpretending character and ease of his manner, he was enabled to bestow the most pungent and severe chastisement upon his antagonists, when he deemed it his duty to take up his pen as the champion of divine truth and virtue. The extract in question thus proceeds.

“I come now to an enthusiast which the doctor has accidentally met with, from whom, it seems By these say I have borrowed some of my strange notions, and would put them off as my own. The doctor has this intelligence from his trusty assistant, who says, ‘What else can be expected from those who read Jacob Behmen, * *, and * *, with almost the same veneration and implicit faith that other people read the Scripture?’ Two of these writers, I know very little of, yet as much as I desire to know; but J. Behmen, called the Teutonic Theosopher, I have read much, and much esteem; but the design of putting off some of his strange notions, as my own, is as well grounded, as if the doctor had charged me with a design of picking his pocket.

“The illustrious Sir Isaac Newton, when he wrote his Principia, and published to the world his great doctrine of attraction, and those laws of nature by which the planets began, and continue to move in their orbits, could have told the world, that the true and infallible ground of what he there advanced, was to be found in the Teutonic Theosopher, in his three first properties of eternal Nature; he could have told them, that he had been a diligent reader of that wonderful author, that he had made large extracts out of him, and could have referred to him for the ground of what he had observed of the number seven. Now why did not this great man do thus? must we suppose have designed these writings, viz., the stupid, purblind, hateful and hating practical atheists, who have no sincere regard to goodness and truth, nor any real desire for that interior renovation and purity, which, they feel, at times, to be the proper perfection of their nature. To such as these, may not this Baptist proclamation be sent, as an extraordinary remedy exactly suited to their case, of wilful impenitence, rational requirements, and all but invincible prejudice and despair?—But the last and most important section of moral agents, to whom, it appears to the writer, these series of works are super-eminently applicable, and who are truly the ‘children of the mystery,’ is, in the phraseology of our common prayer book, all Jews, Turks, and Heathens, who are capable of rational enquiry, and possessed of a refined sense of moral obligation. Here, we may indeed apprehend the grand importance of these wonderful writings; for (as already observed), if the fountains of learning and religion in each nation and country could be purified, then the streams and branches must in time become pure also, and finally, in the nature of things, the face of the earth be watered and prepared for “sowers to go forth to sow,” and in due time to reap that he was loth to have it thought, that he had been helped by any thing that he had read? no: it is an unworthy thought. But Sir Isaac well knew, that prejudice and partiality had such power over many people's judgments, that doctrines, though ever so deeply founded in, and proved by all the appearances of nature, would be suspected by some as dangerous, and condemned by others even as false and wicked, had he made any references to an author that was only called an enthusiast.

a/ “Dr. Trap may take himself for an eminent example and proof of this. He has here shown with what speed matters may be determined by prejudice. For here a stranger, a layman, not so much as known to the doctor by name, who, for aught he can tell, may be some small retailer of infidelity, or snuff-candle in the play-house, who has gained upon the doctor by no other marks of ability and judgment, but his compliments to him, and his scurriosity upon me; from the authority of this informer, the doctor immediately puts J. B. into his list of enthusiasts. Is not this a proof of what Sir Isaac Newton must have met with from some great scholars, and to what a speedy confutation he must have exposed himself, and the plainest appearances of nature, had he ever referred to the Teutonic Theosopher? Now, am I here to suppose, that this censure of the doctor's, relating to J. B., is a rashness that has here first seized upon him by chance, that he never before in his life allowed himself to treat any man, or any book in this manner; that if he took the judgment of another, it was of somebody that he knew; if he condemned an author, he always staid till he had read something of him, at least an index, or a title page or two of his works? Or am I to suppose, that this has been the doctor's method upwards of thirty-seven years; calling one man an enthusiast, another a fanatic, this a monstrous, that the most pernicious book of the age, as rashly, as hastily, regarding no more of right or wrong in that which he affirms of these matters, than he has here done with regard to J. B.? But I hope the doctor is singular in this spirit; for if it could be supposed, that it was common among learned men, to get their knowledge of ancient and modern, foreign and domestic enthusiasts, as hastily and slightly as the doctor here doth, must it not be very dangerous for the unlearned to take any opinions of this kind from them? Must it not be said, that one grain of equity, good sense, and real knowledge, is more to be desired than a hundred weight of such learning!

“When I considered the fallen soul, as a fire spirit deprived of its proper light, and therefore become of a diabolical nature, I could have directed to J. B. for the deep and infallible ground of it: But what need was there for that, when I could make the plainest principles of nature, the plainest doctrines of Scripture, every thing that was said of the fall, of heaven, of hell, and the like, to be undeniable proofs of it? what I said in the second proposition of the discourse upon regeneration, concerning the holy trinity of God in man, stands not in that form of expression any where that I know of; but for the true ground and certainty of it, I could have referred to the Teutonic Theosopher, to many ancient and modern writers of the greatest name, and to a venerable record of antiquity, ascribed even to St. Peter himself; where he asserts, even upon the same ground as I have done, that because we were created in the image and likeness of God, therefore the triune life arises in us as it does in God, and we have in us, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.*

“But what occasion was there for these references, when I had so much better proof, when I could shew, that all which the Scriptures say of the whole nature and manner of our redemption, of the whole nature and form of baptism, all that they say of the necessity of the Word and Holy Spirit of God having again a birth in us, are absolute decisive proofs of it? I knew also very well, that the most essential, fundamental, and joyful doctrines of the Gospel would be questioned, or received with difficulty, had I referred to a poor shoemaker for any proof of them: and it may well be believed, that the doctor would have been among the first and loudest of those, who would have cried out at my folly and presumption in directing to an author, whom all the world knew to be an illiterate enthusiast; and yet, if all the world knows it as the doctor knows it, all the world may be said to know nothing about it.”—Law's Animadversions on Trap's Reply.

* Rationalis homo, factus ad imaginem, et similitudinem Dei fert in se symbolice factoris sui imitationem. Habet enim in se Patrem, Filium et Spiritum. a plenteous evangelical harvest.—Under which view of things, and with a knowledge of the mode of procedure which is at present pursued to evangelise the eastern intellectual nations, may it not be justly remarked, how imperfect, how futile, how wasteful, how unnatural, do those efforts and means appear, for the accomplishment of the end proposed! Such a mode of propagating Christianity would seem to have neither reason, nor precedent in the Holy Scriptures, nor analogy in any of the workings of nature, or ordinary actions of life, to countenance it? That some partial good may have resulted therefrom, is nothing to the point, for every cause must have an effect, both according to the nature, and the extent of the cause. But, to proceed as Christians are now doing among sophisticate nations, is it not like commencing at the extremity of a few branches of a stream, and hoping, thereby, in due time to change the nature of the source itself, with its other multiplied branches? This was not the way St. Paul ‘went to work,’ St. Paul the apostle of the learned as well as unlearned Gentiles, who received his commission not from man, but by revelation from heaven, who was an apostle, not so much to those who had the oracles of God, for to these were the original apostles sent, as to the Gentiles of every name and character, and not to them until he had been endowed with the knowledge* of the highest theosophic mysteries, so as to be able to combat with and convince on their own grounds, all that, the most profound, deep-thinking, learned philosophers of Greece, many of them true theists and virtuous men, could or might advance or enquire, touching the doctrines of the Christian salvation, and the philosophy and “mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ,” and of all things, in heaven and earth. Now, if we allow the Holy Ghost in sending Paul, thus equipped, to the intellectual Gentiles, to be

* To see this point in a clear light, we have only to read over carefully the three first chapters of the epistle to the Ephesians, then to refer to the twentieth chapter of the Acts, and other places allusive to St. Paul’s teaching, wherein is implied his having “declared unto them all the counsel of God,” (which must necessarily include all mysteries connected with Christ, as the Lord and Saviour, and second Adam,) as he had doubtless done to the wise and inquisitive Athenians, members of the Areopagus, one of whom, named Dionysius, as related Acts xvii. 34, became a convert, and afterwards a celebrated writer upon the transcendental philosophy of Christianity, in which, as we may justly infer from a consideration of the epistles of St. Paul, and the narrative in question, he had doubtless been instructed from the lips of the apostle himself; and whose writings are still extant, (see note, p. 61.) Moreover, we are bound to conclude, that the ingenious and learned of the polished Greek nations of that day, the countries where geometry and mathematics flourished in such perfection, would not receive any dogmatical ‘dixit’ of a seeming foreign adventurer, and loquacious ‘setter forth of strange doctrines,’ without having the Philosophy of the matter fundamentally explained and demonstrated to them; as was probably the case with the above-mentioned Dionysius, who, it would appear, only after much private conference with the apostle Paul, and due examination, and reflection, embraced the Christian faith. Now although it may be urged in reply to all this, what St. Paul alleges, that the ‘Jews require miracles, and the Greeks seek after wisdom; but that he preached the cross of Christ, which to the Jews was a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks appeared foolishness;’ yet we are not to infer therefrom that to all the Greeks such doctrines were foolishness. By no means; but simply to that class of mere reasoners and babblers, who were without any pure, fervent love of virtue; and who will always be found to comprise the majority of the so-called philosophers of every nation; just as it is in Christianity itself, for there are but the “seven thousand” in every age, and profession of Christians, whom God has his eye upon, as his truly devoted, and therefore elect children.† For the apostle immediately adds this very significant declaration, confirmatory of the above view of the case, viz.—“But unto them which are called both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God;” or as Behmen expresses it at the very commencement of his writings, ‘that unless a man be born again, in order to which he must absolutely die to himself, which is the ‘cross’ of Christ, alluded to by St. Paul in the above passage,—he cannot see the kingdom of God, and therefore cannot understand Divine and natural wisdom,’ from the true ground, [of his ternarius sanctus,] as opened in his books. [+ John x. 14; 11. Tim. ii. 19.]

The writer proposes at the latter end of this treatise, (as a kind of exercise, wherein to display the ability of the candidate,) to afford a partial, though enlarged and particular view of the Theosophic knowledge and understanding possessed by St. Paul, as one of his qualifications to preach to the Gentiles, Jesus Christ and the Gospel of salvation by him; and this, by dissecting as it were, into what is conceived to be its component parts, the vast complex and comprehensive idea contained in the word he so often makes use of in his addresses to experienced churches, who had been the subjects of his more erudite instructions, viz. the “mystery,” the “mystery of God,” the “mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ.” Which idea, upon close meditation, having been found to involve or embrace about one hundred and seventy Christian mysteries, they may therefore very properly form the subjects of so many questions or theorems, which the candidate may exercise himself in demonstrating, by way of ascertaining the adequacy of his theosophical ability for the proposed philosophical and religious biography. governed by the highest wisdom, and knowledge of adaptation of cause to effect, what then must be said of our modern attempts at evangelising the vast rational and highly-intellectual continent of India, Persia, Turkey, or China? but that it is the result of short-sighted counsels, of half-thinkingness, and an unaccountable imperfect study of God's wisdom and providence, as illustrated in the Holy Scriptures: and what are the effects of such endeavours beyond the translation of the Scriptures, but great waste of money, and efforts, and even life? Let the directors of Missionary Societies reflect a little upon this strangely overlooked but most essential point, (as also the donors of prize essays at the University of Cambridge, and elsewhere, as to the best means of introducing Christianity among the intellectual Mahomedan and other Asiatic nations,) so that their future labours and expenditure may be productive of adequate fruits, being directed to rational ends by rational, yea divinely-natural means. Now to all these Jews, Turks, and Heathens, in the most eminent sense, is this 'mystery revealed' sent, and thus much may be truly affirmed of it, that it contains the remedy, and only remedy for their Gentile state. Which remedy, it is to be observed, when it has done its work, that is, convinced its subjects of the truth of the gospel revelation, or served as a schoolmaster to Christ, is, of course, like the law of old, to be laid aside, having accomplished the end for which it was given to the world.—For, as Mr. Law truly says, 'there is not any philosophical question that can be put, nor advice or direction that can be asked, in regard to God, or Nature, or Christianity, but what J. B. has over and over spoke to, and in the plainest manner.' In short, he thus most justly describes him, "(1.) As a teacher of the true ground of the Christian religion. (2.) As a discoverer of the false antichristian church, from its first rise in Cain, through every age of the world, to its present state in all and every sect of the present divided christendom. (3.) As a guide to the truth of all the mysteries of the kingdom of God. In these three respects, which contain all that any one can possibly want to know or learn from any teacher, he is the strongest, the plainest, the most open, intelligible, awakening, convincing writer that ever was. As to all these three matters, he speaks to every one, as himself saith, in the sound of a trumpet. And here to pretend to be an explainer of him, or make him fitter for our apprehension, in these great matters, is as vain as if a man should pipe through a straw, to make the sound of a trumpet better heard by us.

"Further, he may be considered, (4.) as a relater of depths opened in himself, of wonders which his spirit had seen and felt in his ternario sancto. Now, in this respect he is no teacher, nor his reader a learner; but all that he saith is only for the same end as St. Paul spoke of his having been in the third heaven, and hearing things not possible to be spoken in human words. And yet in these matters it is, that most of his readers, especially if they are scholars, are chiefly employed; every one in his way trying to become masters of them. Thus, when he first appeared in English, many persons of this nation, of the greatest wit and abilities, became his readers; who, instead of entering into his one only design, which was their own regeneration from an earthly to an heavenly life, turned chemists, and set up furnaces to regenerate metals, in search of the philosopher's stone! And yet, of all men in the world, no one has so deeply, and from so true a ground, laid open the exceeding vanity of such labour, and utter impossibility of success in it from any art or skill in the use of fire. And this must with truth be affirmed of him, that there is not any possible error, that you can fall into in the use of his books, but what he gives you notice of beforehand, and warns you against it in the most solemn manner; and tells you, that the blame must be yours if you fall into it."—If our missionaries to the East* were to go prepared for their work as herein contemplated, as in short St. Paul himself was qualified for his evangelical mission, (which is now, by the will of God, placed within their power, and to which they are called by the instrumentality of this treatise?) what might not we expect, we repeat it, as the results of their labours, but what transpired from the labours of St. Paul? for like causes produce like effects, and Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. May we then hope that the translation of these invaluable writings into the great languages of the Turkish, Persian, Chinese, and other of the nations of India will, by the wisdom and liberality of this evangelical country, speedily be accomplished!—And now, leaving this very important subject, (referred to on pages 4, and 5, etc., of this treatise), to the serious consideration of every enlightened Christian in these kingdoms, we close our remarks with the following extract, containing another description of the nature of these writings, and of the character of their author, written by the subject of the proposed biography himself; which, if the reader embrace in his mind, under the term “deists,” “infidels,” made use of therein, all unbelievers, Heathens, Turks, Jews, and merely nominal Christians, will set the imperfectly expressed views of the writer of the preceding pages, in a more perfect light:—

“JACOB BEHMEN (says he) in his natural capacity and outward condition of life, was as mean and illiterate, as any one that Our Lord called to be an apostle; but as a chosen servant of God, he may be placed amongst those who had received the highest measures of light, wisdom, and knowledge from above. He was no more a human writer, spoke no more from opinion, conjecture, or reason, in what he published to the world, than St. John did, when he put his Revelation into writing. He has no right to be placed amongst the inspired penmen of the New Testament; he was no messenger from God of anything new in religion; but the mystery of all that was old and true both in religion and nature was opened in him. This is the particularity of his character, by which he stands fully distinguished from all the prophets, apostles, and extraordinary messengers of God. They were sent with occasional messages, or to make such alterations in the economy of religion as pleased God. But this man came on no particular errand; he had nothing to alter, or add, either in the form, or doctrine of religion. He had no new truths of religion to propose to the world; but all that lay in religion and nature, as a mystery unsearchable, was in its deepest ground, opened in this instrument of God. And all his works are nothing else but a deep manifestation of the grounds and reasons of that which is done, that which is doing, and is to be done, both in the kingdom of nature, and the kingdom of grace, from the beginning to the end of time. His works, therefore, though immediately from God, have not at all the nature of the holy Scriptures, they are not offered to the world, as necessary to be received, or as a rule of faith and manners, and therefore no one has any right to complain, either of the depths of his matter, or the peculiarity of his style: they are just as they should be, for those that are fit for them; and he that likes them not, or finds himself unqualified for them, has no obligation to read them.

The whole system of Christianity has generally been looked upon as a mystery of salvation solely founded in the divine pleasure; and to be such a scheme of redemption, as is wholly to be resolved into the contrivance of the will and wisdom of God; and therefore, men can think differently of it, can fall into as many opinions about it, as they can of the will and wisdom of God. Hence has arisen all the speculative opposition to the Gospel: it is because reason, human speculation, and conjecture, are always imagining they can form a religion more worthy of the wisdom and designs of the Supreme Being than the Christian is, and would be thought to oppose the Gospel only for the honour of God, and the divine attributes. This is the great prevailing idolatry of the present heathen world, or that part of mankind who are infidels or deists. Hence also is risen another species of idolatry, even among christians of all denominations; who, though receiving and professing the religion of the Gospel, yet worship God not in spirit and in truth, but either in the

of learning and religion in those countries, can only proceed from ignorance, or an extraordinary want of reflection. And, therefore, when reports are freely disseminated, casting a slight upon the common sense, sagacity, and intellectual genius of the eastern nations, by parties probably unacquainted with any more profound Christianity than that which is dogmatically preached to the populace in this country: which preaching, to men of understanding of another creed, is, of course, but mere fighting in the air, or at best an uncertain trumpet sound, leaving no impression on the hearers;—it is only right that the true state of the case should be publicly declared, and the natural inferences of the mind be confirmed or refuted by well attested facts. Now the writer of these lines has had related to him the substance of private communications, forwarded to this country, from the Rev. * * * a highly educated, experienced, and truly-evangelical envoy of the London Missionary Society, stationed in the neighbourhood of Benares, India, to the effect, that he did not see how Christianity could ever make progress in India; [he is unacquainted with the writings here described;] for the learned men there, both as regards capacity, and extent of intellectual research, were giants in comparison of those of England and Europe. As those nations may be considered in a similar relation to Christianity, to that of the learned Gentiles of old; so their ignorance and unbelief of the truth of the mysteries of Christianity requires the application of the self-same and only-sufficient remedy.—Let, then, the Christian theory, as fundamentally demonstrated in the writings of BEHMEN, LAW, etc., be but proclaimed by living masters of the philosophy of it, whose lives are living epistles, to be read and known of all men; open proofs of the Divine wisdom, power, and perfection of Gospel Christianity, as was that of St. Paul, and we may be assured the success and glory of St. Paul will be the success and glory of his apostolical successors.

deadness of an outward form, or in a pharisaical carnal trust and confidence in their own opinions and doctrines. This body of people, whether they be clergy or laity, are but nominal christians, because they have little more than the name of every mystery of the Gospel: historical christians, because satisfied with the history of Gospel-salvation: literal christians, because looking only to, and contending only for the letter of the institutions and mysteries of Jesus Christ. For the letter, for the federal rite, and the figurative expression of regeneration, they are all zeal and industry; but the reality of it, the true life of the new-birth, they oppose and reject as heartily as the deist does the outward form and letter. Now this two-fold idolatry of the present heathen and christian world has its full discovery and confutation in the mystery opened in J. B., which, when understood, leaves no room for any man either to disbelieve the Gospel, or to content himself with the letter of it. For, in the revelation made to this man, the first beginning of all things is opened, the whole state, the rise, the workings, and the progress of all nature are revealed, and every doctrine, mystery, and precept of the Gospel are found, not to have sprung from any arbitrary appointment, but to have their eternal unalterable ground and reason in nature; and God appears to save us by the methods of the Gospel, because there was no other possible way to save us in all the possibility of Nature. And therefore the idolatrous confidence of the deist in his own reason, and of the nominal christian in the outward letter of their religion, have equally their full confutation.

To those who confine idolatry to the worship of such idols, as the old heathens and Jews worshipped, it may seem a paradox to talk of the idolatry of the present world, either amongst Deists or Christians. But if we consider things more than words, we shall find that idolatry is nowhere, but where the heart has set up something in the place of God, and therefore is everywhere, and in everything, where the heart places that repose, trust, and delight, which should be placed in God alone. For God is only owned, and confessed to be our God, by these acknowledgments and dispositions of our hearts towards him. It is an infallible truth, that all sin has its beginning and continuance in and from idolatry: this alone debauched the former and the latter ages of the world, and is the one source of all the corruption of manners, from the beginning to the end of time. You do not make a golden calf, as the Jews did, to worship; but if mammon is your God, if your life is devoted to pride, ambition, and sensuality, your idolatry is not so sensible, but it is as real as theirs, who danced about a golden calf. You fancy that Venus is not your goddess, because you are not worshipping a figured image of her, in a temple called by her name; but if you look at the odes, the hymns, the songs, which you love, which lust has inspired, then you may know that Venus is the goddess of your heart. It is thus with every object, and in every course of life, that which possesses and governs our heart has usurped the right and place of God in it, and has that worship, trust, and devotion of the heart, which is due to God alone: and therefore the idolatry of the present world is only of a different kind from that of the ancient, it is less seen, and less confessed, but not less real, than when carved images and figured idols were adored.

Deism, or the religion of human reason, set up in opposition to the Gospel, is direct idolatry, and has every grossness and vanity of image worship. For to put our trust in our own reason, to be content with its light, to resign ourselves up to it, and depend upon it as our guide, is a mistake that has every grossness and vanity of the adoration of an idol. Now this kind of idolatry has overrun all the last ages of the world; it is the last effort of human vanity; * it is the utmost that idolatry can do, both to hide and propagate itself, and is the devil under the appearance of an angel of light. The Gospel has no enemy but this idolatry, and it is as visible in the church, as out of it: hence it is, that the state of the church is so sadly described in the Revelation of St. John, for so many ages, as a spiritual whore-dome.—When the old Jews left off the idols of the heathens, they fell into an idolatry of another kind, which was this, they idolized the rites and ceremonies of their own true religion; they placed that confidence in the outward letter, and expected that good from their outward rites, which they should have placed, sought, expected from God alone. This is the idolatry of the rational deist, and the nominal christian. BUT, WHEN THE MYSTERY OF ALL NATURE AND GRACE, which by the mercy of God has opened itself in the writings of J. B., SHALL FIND ITS CHILDREN, EVERY IDOLATRY, both within and without the church, WILL BE ASHAMED TO SHOW ITSELF.

But it may be asked by some, what warrant have I for all that I have said of J. B., or how can

* It is reserved to a subsequent place and section herein, or to the proposed biography, to show how this 'last effort of human vanity' having exhausted itself, or, with the former species of national idolatry, became swept away by the action of the spirit of Methodism—that being the direct offspring of the Elias-baptist ministration of Law, and, though remotely, of the spirit of Behmen, as regards the first part of his mystic character, and action upon the world, and contained in his purely practical writings. In the retrospect of which workings of the Divine wisdom, the celebrated Dr. Francis Lee, with certain of his cotemporaries, will deserve an honourable mention; they being, undoubtedly, eminent instruments in their way of carrying on the Divine designs, in the generation next preceding that of Law. In a few of whom, as representatives of the mystical spouse, the church, the Holy Spirit, as if unable to restrain its joyous exultation at the approaching conquests and triumphs of the Divine Love, would seem to have occasionally budded forth, opening within their minds the glass of the Divine wisdom, and filling their souls with ravishing foretastes of the powers of the millennial age, which, by faith, they saw to be at hand; and in which, as the 'marriage of the Lamb,' the church, as the spouse, was to be 'glorified together.' Dr. Lee, of whose character, and talents, and public benefactions, some conception may be formed, by the perusal of his (posthumous) published "Dissertations," but of which, the writer is in possession of other, and to the spiritual theosophist, much more charming illustrations, was a man of surprising versatility of genius, of 'stupendous learning,' accompanied by a singular facility and expertness in its application, all which was sanctified upon the altar of divine love and wisdom,—indeed, he appears to have been a most profound master of the science of theosophy, (or philosophy of the eternal and celestial spheres,) which, in his hands, is rendered almost as simple of apprehension as the Holy Scriptures themselves, yet, preserving the edification and unction which the experience of the profundities of the Divine life is calculated to convey, when sufficiently expressed. But we will endeavour, anon, to give a few instances of this accomplished Christian philosopher's genius, talent, and divine knowledge. Most of the devotional works of 'HICKS' and 'NELSON' were by him!

I prove to the world, that his writings are the work of the Holy Spirit? It is answered, I neither intend, nor desire to prove this to the world. And if any one will dispute or deny every thing that I have said of him, he will meet with no opposition from me.—I have given notice of a PEARL; if any one takes it to be otherwise or has neither skill nor value for pearls, he is at liberty to trample it under his feet. Nothing passes with the world for proof of a divinely inspired writer but miracles; if people can see no other proof but this, it is not in my power to give them better eyes. I suppose the gospel and all the writings of the New Testament, have internal characters of their Divine original, for those that can see them; but if they had been left to those internal characters, I am apt to think, that the sons of Cicero, the disciples of a Bayle, or those who stand the highest in such like literature, would, of all men, be the most indisposed and unwilling to see and own them.

Had we no miracles for proof of the inspiration of the Scriptures, they would be still what they are, the true word and wisdom of God, and there would be the same benefit in believing and receiving them as such. But how can they be proved to come from the Spirit of God?—Now this can only be, by an honest simplicity, and love of truth, by humility and prayer, and conversion of the heart to God in the reading of them. These are the only dispositions that could possibly bring any man into a sense and belief of their Divine original: and therefore all those critical scholars, and rationally wise men, whose inquiries are animated with a love of glory and personal distinction, and who looked into those writings for such ends, and with such views as they read other books, would be of all men the most unable to see, and unwilling to own the very best truths of the Holy Scriptures; because it is the very nature and end of the Scriptures, to discover the vanity and falseness of that light and knowledge, which is got from human reasoning, and to subdue that self-sufficiency which is so inseparable from certain kinds and degrees of human learning.”

On another occasion he thus briefly describes the mystery revealed in his espoused writings:—

This is manifestly the case of that depth and fulness of Divine light and truth, opened by the mercy of God in the poor illiterate BREHMEN, who was so merely an instrument of Divine direction, as to have no ability to think, speak, or write anything, but what sprung up in him, or came upon him, as independently of himself, as a shower of rain falls here or there independently of the place where it falls.

His works being an opening of the Spirit of God working in him, are quite out of the common path of man's reasoning wisdom, and proceed no more according to it, than the living plant breathes forth its virtues according to such rules of skill as an artist must use to set up a painted dead figure of it. But as the Spirit of God worked in the creation of all things, so the same Spirit worked and opened in the ground and depth of his created soul, an inward sensibility of it.

His writings begin where the Spirit of God begun in the first rise of Nature and Creature. They are led on by the Spirit of God, as it went on in the creation of angels and men, and all this material system of things. The all-creating Spirit of God which did, and still does all, in every birth and growth of life, opened its procedure in this chosen instrument: Showing how all things came from a working will of the holy TRIUNE incomprehensible GOD, manifesting himself as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, through an outward perceptible working triune power of fire, light, and spirit, both in the eternal heaven and in this temporal transitory state of material nature: Showing from this eternal manifestation of God in the unity and trinity of heavenly fire, light, and spirit, how and what angels and men were in their creation; how they are in and from God, his real offspring, and born partakers of the Divine nature; how their life begun in and from this Divine Fire, which is the father of Light, generating a birth of Light in their souls, from both which proceeds the Holy Spirit, or breath of divine Love, in the triune creature, as it does in the triune Creator: Showing how some angels and all men are fallen from God, and their first state of a Divine triune life in him; what they are in their fallen state, and the difference between the fall of angels and that of man: Showing also how and whence there is good and evil in all this temporal world, in all its creatures, animate and inanimate, spiritual and material; and what is meant by the curse that dwells everywhere in it: Showing what are the natures, powers, and qualities, of all creatures; whence and why their numberless variety; what they have of good in them, and how they have it; what is the evil in them, and why there is such strife and enmity betwixt creatures and creatures, elements and elements; what is meant by it, to what end it works, and when it shall cease;—how and why sin and misery, wrath and death, shall only reign for a time, till the Love, the Wisdom, and the Power of God shall, in a supernatural way, (the mystery of GOD made MAN) triumph over sin, misery, and death; make fallen man rise to the glory of angels, and this material system shake off its curse, and enter into an everlasting union with that heaven from whence it fell.”

The following is an extract from a letter of the same individual to the Bishop of London, (Dr. Sherlock,) in reply to his very complimentary acknowledgment of the published letter addressed to his lordship, (containing the ‘Confutation of Warburton’):

“I am conscious that, in my later writings, I have raised a prejudice against me, by espousing the writings of JACOB BREHMEN.

“It was very easy for the world to find fault with me on that account. Matter of censure lies very open to the critical reader of his books; though the true ground of every doctrine and article of Christian faith and practice is there opened in such a ravishing, amazing depth, and clearness of truth and conviction, as had never been seen or thought of in any age of the church.

“To regard him as a divinely-inspired writer will, with many, be proof enough of my being an enthusiast. But I am fully assured, that if the most sober and just enemy to enthusiasm had but patience to read him, till he in some degree understood his ground and principles, be he who he will, christian or deist, he will find himself forced to think of him as I do, and that without adding either him to the number of apostles, or his writings to the sacred canon.

"I am the less affected with any reproach, even from the learned world, on this account, because I think it is apparent enough, that, from the beginning of the world, nothing extraordinary in the way of instruction ever came from God, but met with its chief opposition from that which was the reigning wisdom and learning of the time.

"The ground and reason why the wise and prudent, of every age, have less of disposition and fitness to receive divine light and instruction than babes and sucklings, lies in the nature of things, and will be always as true, as when Christ said it of the doctrines which he himself preached to the world.

"I could not forbear saying thus much to your lordship, on this head, but shall now only add mine to the prayers of all good men among us, that it would please God to continue that life, which has been so manifestly serviceable in the most trying times, to the good of this part of the Christian church."

The remaining extracts are mostly from his familiar letters to his friends:—

"The charge of Spinosism, brought against me by Dr. W., [as also, it may be added, that of Pantheism, and other absurd heterodox imputations,*] has all the folly and weakness, etc., etc., that can be well imagined. For as Spinosism is nothing else but a gross confounding of God and Nature, making them to be only one and the same thing; so the full absurdity, and absolute impossibility of it, can only be fundamentally proved by that doctrine which can go to the bottom of the matter, and demonstrate the essential, eternal, and absolute distinction between God and nature; a thing done over and over, from page to page, in those books from which the doctor has extracted Spinosism, just with as much acuteness as if he spied rank Warburtonianism in my letter to the right reverend the bishop of London.

"Now, though the difference between God and Nature has always been supposed and believed, yet the true ground of such distinction, or the why, the how, and in what they are essentially different, and must be so to all eternity, was to be found in no books, till the goodness of God, in a way not less than that of MIRACLE, made a poor illiterate man, in the simplicity of a child, to open and relate the deep mysterious ground of all things; in which is shown the birth and beginning of nature, or the first workings of the inconceivable God—opening and manifesting his hidden triune Deity, in an outward state of glory—in the splendour of united fire, light, and spirit, all kindled and distinguished, all united and beautified by the hidden, invisible, inconceivable, supernatural Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—working all the glories in heaven, and every kind of life, and blessing on earth, by visible and invisible fire, light, and spirit.

"This is the wonderful gift of God to these last distracted ages of the world: and as every purpose of God must stand, and sooner or later produce all that which God intended by it; so the more the wise and the learned in all churches reject this counsel of God, the more will they promote its success over themselves, and only help it to come forth with greater strength and glory to God, by being owned and proclaimed by the mouths of babes and sucklings."

* The following is one instance from among many others of the stupid senseless stuff, fathered upon Behmen and Law, by some highly spiritual professors of the popular evangelical school, who of course took it for granted, they themselves were competent judges of the profundities of orthodox christian doctrine: "Behmen and Law's error," say these luminaries, "is in maintaining that the soul of a believer possesses God's incommunicable (!) essence, or enters into that union by which the Three are One Jehovah: and John Arndt's, that, through the grace of the Lord Jesus, we partake of the Divine nature in the same manner that God exists in himself" (!) One would have thought such solemn twaddle upon self-conjured up "error," could only be found in the critical reviews of Bedlam.

In the case referred to in the above letter, Warburton's pride could never forgive the defeat and mortification he had sustained at the hands of Law, in having his learned ignorance of the philosophy and spirit of christianity exposed in such a glaring light to the world, and so took every opportunity to excite a prejudice against Law, by disseminating, amongst other calumnies, a charge against him of maintaining the detestable doctrine of Spinoza and the materialists, setting nature in the throne of God. "But Mr. Law's doctrine only amounts to this, (as the reader will already be prepared to hear,) that Nature in her original perfect state and celestial forms, was an efflux from the ideas of the Divine Wisdom. And he no more supposes that nature in its present degraded state (first by the fall of angels, and afterwards through the fall of man,) did derive its grossness, darkness, and hard compaction from the Divine nature, than he supposes wicked men to derive their darkness and wrathful essence from it; and yet that the spirit of man did first come forth from God, is taught in Scripture. Such as are unacquainted with the principles of the TEUTONIC THEOSOPHY, and have set their ideas by that dead erroneous system of philosophy, which is commonly received amongst us, cannot enter into the distinction between the materiality of nature in her present state of degradation, bondage, and corruption, and as it is conditioned in the angelical world; where the lucid material vehicle of a seraph may as far transcend in splendour and tenuity, the nature of our light in this world, as the latter does the darkness and density of a flint stone, nay, for aught we know, the difference may be inconceivably greater. Hence it is, that our definition of matter as to its essential properties, has nothing to do with the heavenly materiality. To instance only in the property of solidity: how is this compatible with the body of an angel, which can pass through a quarry of the hardest marble as easily as through the yielding air? And if even our present ideas of matter extend to a supposed pure æther, too subtle to be the object of sense; what unassignable gradations may belong to it in the highest heavens? Nay, what stretch of our understanding or imagination shall fix its bounds, and say, Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther? Who can pronounce it incapable of sensibility? Nay, who will say, that in its farther ascent of sublimation towards its first cause, it does not rise up to intellectuality? or that the difference betwixt created spirit and created matter, in its nearest approach to the throne of God, is not rather specific than generic? Nay, to give the highest spring to hypothesis, who can positively deny, that it derives its first and purest essence from the original ideas conceived in the womb of the divine imagination, and by the Almighty FIAT substantiated into created forms?"—Hartley. See also Paynes' Letter to Warburton. 8vo. 1761.

Again, incidentally referring to the same subject, in another letter to a friend, he may be said to embrace in his voluntary observations at the close of it, another antagonist (Dr. H.), who had made use of precisely the same angry, vituperative language, as Warburton, in a 'Letter' he had ventured to publish, condemnatory of Behmen's writings, as also similar sentiments in a printed tract, entitled, 'Cautions to the readers of Mr. Law,' a copy of which had been forwarded to Mr. Law, by a friend, for perusal. The 'letter' is so insignificant a production,* being a tissue of mere misrepresentations, and sophistical reasonings, founded upon disjointed extracts from J. B., in short, an attempt to mystify a matter, and thereby to impose upon a weak understanding, that Mr. Law bestowed no further notice upon the writer, than what is contained in the ironical remark at the close of the letter above-mentioned, the extract from which is as follows:—

"Let me here, sir, observe to you (he writes) the barefaced calumny that Dr. W. has ventured *Another production of the same character, was the 'Letter' to the subject of our proposed biography, published in print, in the year 1756, which, though mutilated, has, very ill-advisedly, been inserted in the uniform edition of the writer's works, published since his decease. Mr. L. thus alluded to it, shortly after it appeared, in a letter to a friend, who had sent him a copy of it:—"Mr. * * * is an ingenious man, and the reason why his letter to me is such a juvenile composition of emptiness and pertness (!) as is below the character of any man, who had been serious in religion but half a month, is because it was not ability (!) but necessity, that put his pen into his hand. He had condemned my books, preached much against them, and, to make all sure, forbade his people the use of them. And for a cover to all this, he promised, from time to time, to write against them. Therefore, an answer was to be made at all adventures."—And again, in another letter, in answer to one from Lady Huntingdon: "Mr. * * * 's letter did not at all disappoint me. I had no expectation of seeing a better, either with regard to the substance, or to the style and manner of it. If I knew of any kind of answer that would do him any real good, I should advise it. But to answer it for the good of any one else, seems to be quite needless.—It does not admit of a serious answer, because there is nothing substantial or properly argumentative in it. And to answer it in the way of ridicule, is what I cannot come into, being full as averse to make a mock of him in a religious garb, as to the doing the greatest bodily injury to his person. * *

"As to myself, I seem, to myself, to have no other part to act, nor any call to anything else, in this hurry and struggle of zeal against zeal, in such a variety of forms, but only and fully to assert the true ground, and largely open all the reasons of that one inward regeneration, which is equally the one thing needful to every sect, and the one thing alone that can make every sect or method, or outward form, not hurtful to those that adhere to it. For every outward form, however specious or promising, will only help us to be carnally minded, till it is in some degree known to have no other or better nature, than that of the shell which helps us to the kernel.

"The doctrines I have published are in their best state with regard to the reader, as they stand in my books, and will be less useful to him when they are drawn into controversy. For this reason, I can lend no help to that.

"This may, perhaps, seem to your ladyship, as if I had too great an opinion of what I had done; and I believe such a free way of speaking sometimes in conversation of my own books may have been suspected of smelling too much of self-esteem.—But I can with truth assure you, madam, that when I speak of the fulness and clearness of my own writings, I feel no other sentiments of self-sufficiency than when I speak of the goodness of my own eyes. Nor do I know how to consider the one more than the other, to be any merit of my own; and therefore, when any man, great or little, contemns, reproaches, or asperses me or my books, as void of sense, truth, and light, I feel no more inward uneasiness, or think myself any more hurt, than if he had only told the world that my eyes were miserably bad, and I could scarce see to read, even with the best spectacles! And so I have no desire controversially to defend the one more than the other, but contentedly leave them both to be their own proof of what they are.

"I was once a kind of oracle with Mr. * * *. I never suspected anything bad of him, or ever discovered any kind or degree of falseness or hypocrisy in him. But during all the time of his intimacy with me, I judged him to be much under the power of his own spirit, which seemed to have the predominance in every good thing or way, that his zeal carried him to.

"It was owing to his unwillingness, or inability to give up his own spirit, that he was forced into that false and rash censure which he published in print against the mystics:—as enemies to good works, and even tending to atheism. A censure so false, and so regardless of right and wrong, as hardly anything can exceed it; which is to be found in a preface of his to a book of hymns!—But no more of this. Feb. 16, 1756."

The party here referred to, at a more mature period of his life, receded greatly from his vehemency of spirit, and strong opposition to everything that did not chime in with his complexion and peculiar views of the moment. Mr. Henry Brooke, of Dublin, a great admirer of Mr. Law, and of the most edifying of the spiritual writers, once reproached the individual above alluded to, for his rash and groundless censures of the mystics, irrevocably inserted in his published writings, journals, etc.: to which he sent the following very worthy and christian reply:—"21st of April, 1783. Dear Harry,—Your letter gave me pleasure, and pain too. It gave me pleasure, because it was written in a mild and loving spirit; and it gave me pain, because I found it had pained you, whom I so tenderly love and esteem. But I shall do it no more; I sincerely thank you for your kind reproof: it is a precious balm—and will, I trust, in the hands of the Great Physician, be the means of healing my sickness. I am so sensible of your real friendship herein, that I cannot write without tears. The words you mention were too strong, they will no more fall from my mouth." to cast upon me, in charging my writings with Spinosism, though all that I have wrote for these last twenty years has been such a full confutation of it, as is not to be found in any book that has been purposely written against it. Had I only proved, as I have done by a variety of proofs, that wrath cannot possibly be in the true God, I had sufficiently confuted Spinosism; for if not wrath, then nothing of nature is in God. But I have gone much farther, and have in my last six books opened

The way in which this 'indefatigable man of business' (who, if Law might be considered the perfecter of the steam-engine, and inventor of locomotives, might himself be considered as the managing director of the first English railway company, and chief engineer!)—proceeded to study and fathom the scope and depth of Behmen's writings, of which he had heard so much said by the learned, as containing the revelation of the ground and philosophy of all things, with a fundamental demonstration of all the particular truths of Christianity, is thus naively described by himself in his diary: and as, doubtless, his above-mentioned published letter was founded upon such a mode of examination, the reader may form some conjecture of its character, and of the probable appropriate description given of it by Law, in the above extracts; as also, of the value of such an individual's judgment upon matters out of the sphere of his natural complexion and idiosyncrasy.—We may also thereby understand the difference between what is termed popular evangelical theology, (to the self-activity and sanguine character of which, all profound exhibitions of christian virtues, requiring time and patience, are insupportable), and philosophic Gospel truth, which, possessing all the devotion, and solid experience of the former, considers truth, both divine and natural, as a science which must necessarily have a root, stem, and branches, and be one undivided whole.—Strange as it may seem, such is the very character given of Behmen's works, by an apostolical descendant of the above-mentioned individual, after a very brief acquaintance with them, in these terms: "I have formerly (said he to the writer of these lines, in the month of May, 1847,) read through all systems of metaphysics, and am now convinced that the philosophy of BEHMEN is the only true philosophy. They are, as it were but pieces of the circumference, whilst this comprises both the centre and the whole of truth."

The passage above referred to, of the individual's diary, runs thus: "Friday, June 4th, 1742. [This was about four years after the period when, see his letter to Mr. Law, of May 14th, 1738, he considers he had discovered. he was but a "child of hell," "having the faith of a devil" etc., though for thirteen years previous he had been a most sincere, devoted christian. The fact was, he was just emerging out of the legal, into the Gospel state; but the popular character of his religious education, not having made him master of the rationale and scope of Mystic Theology, he had not understood his true state and position in the experience of christianity. But, now that he had passed through the legal state, and also that in the flesh, and farther had entered into the new-birth of the Spirit, or spiritual state of christianity, he fancied (as almost all new converts do fancy,) that he ought to have been in this state from the very first; and thereupon flies at Mr. Law, his spiritual preceptor, in the letter referred to, for not having taught him this at first. But Mr. Law knew his business too well, ever to lead souls imperfectly: he, like his Master, knew the absolute necessity of a deep scriptural foundation for a high superstructure of holiness, and therefore in his first works, he keeps his scholars under the ministration of the law and of Christ in the flesh, until they are grown naturally ready, by a conscious, inwardly felt want of a radical change, yea, in their very essences, in order to a full deliverance from their present bondage into the glorious liberty of the light of God! And so it occurred in this individual's case, in God's own time and way; because he was pressingly desirous, earnest, and diligent.—But Mr. Law is as free from blame as Kempis, or the Holy Spirit himself, in regard to this individual's experience; on the contrary, as the instrument of the latter, (regarding the amazing results of this individual's subsequent career,) 'to him, it endless honor brings,' as will be shewn in the Biography, when demonstrating the former part of the Elins-baptist character of his mission. But to proceed with the extract.] "Hence, (says he,) I rode to Beeston. Here I met once more with the works of a celebrated author, of whom many great men cannot speak without rapture, and the strongest expressions of admiration: I mean Jacob Behmen. The book I now opened was his 'Mysterium Magnum, or Exposition of Genesis.' Being conscious of my ignorance, I earnestly besought God to enlighten my understanding. I seriously considered what I read, and endeavoured to weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary. And what can I say concerning the part I read? I can and must say this much, (and that with as full evidence as I can say that two and two make four,) it is most sublime nonsense, inimitable bombast, fustian not to be paralleled! etc."—Now to judge of the sobriety of this nonsensical, bombast, fustian decision, we may put for Behmen's works, Euclid, Algebra, Trigonometry, with the whole range of scientific erudition; and instead of the individual, an intelligent, virtuous farmer, who has 'but one business,' at heart, viz. the cultivation of his farm, and who entertains a dignified contempt for all practical knowledge in comparison of the art of raising good crops. Now suppose this honest farmer in the course of his journeyings, to meet with some treatises upon the above mentioned mathematical and other sciences, and thereupon to kneel down and earnestly beseech God to enlighten his understanding and give him such a knowledge of those sciences, as that he shall be able at once to perfectly comprehend the treatises: and having "prayed in faith, nothing doubting," imagine him rising from his knees, seriously opening the works, and as a matter of course, unable to comprehend them, any more than before he "prayed in faith, nothing doubting," imagine him now passing his judgment upon them in these words: I am now assured, yea, with as much certainty as that two and two make four, that these pretended sciences are sublime nonsense, inimitable bombast, fustian not to be paralleled: and so shall we have a fair illustration of the above most rational mode of testing the science and orthodoxy of Behmen!

A candid Christian writer, in his appendix to "Paradise Restored," makes the following just remarks upon this individual's rash condemnation of the mystics, and of J. B. in particular, to which, as to other similar reproaches, he, as usual, when pressed closely, makes no argumentative reply, but skates off, merely reiterating his former expressions of dislike:—"What cause (the writer observes,) had Mr. * * *, among others, for that obloquy he pours on those excellent men, the mystical writers, who teach the way to Christian perfection on surer principles than he has yet done; and, I believe, attained to higher degrees of it? What is most excellent among the * * * comes the nearest to what is laid down in their spiritual writings; and had Mr. * * * studied them more himself, the true ground of the unchangeable distinction between God and nature, making all Nature, whether temporal or eternal, its own proof that it is not, cannot be, GOD, but purely and solely the WANT of GOD, and can be nothing else in itself but a restless, painful want, till a supernatural GOD manifests himself in it.

This is a doctrine which the learned of all ages have known nothing of: not a book, ancient or and brought his hearers acquainted with them, they might not have stopped so short as, in general, they have done, but have grown up into a higher state of Christian life and divine knowledge. He has taken pains to represent, in a reproachful manner, the works of that wonderful man, J. Behmen, which he never understood; and in particular, that incomparable book, his 'Mysterium Magnum'; but, if that be too hard for him, I do here offer him a plainer part of his writings, viz. his second Letter to Caspar Lindern, as follows: "I judge none (writes Behmen), and to condemn any is idle arrogance and vain prating. The Spirit of God himself judgeth all things, and if that be in us, wherefore should we use many words, and not rather rejoice in the gifts of our brethren? Doth any herb or flower say unto the other, I will not stand by thee? And have they not all one mother whence they grow? Even so all souls proceed from one. Why, then, do we boast to be the children of God, whilst we are more foolish than the herbs and flowers of the field? Doth not God impart and reveal his wisdom to us diversely, as he manifests the tincture of the mystery in the earth through diverse fair plants? even so it is in us men, who should love one another the more for his revealing his wisdom so variously in us; but he that judgeth and condemneth another in an evil way, only runneth on in self-will and pride, and is the oppressor in Babel, that stirreth up contention and strife."

The following is another passage, taken from the same individual's published diary; but it ought to be expunged from future editions of his works, for if Behmen really was the inspired instrument of God, then to call him an ingenious madman is direct blasphemy:—"A few things (he writes) in the second volume of Dr. Byrom's Poems, are taken from Jacob Behmen; to whom I object, not only that he is obscure, (although even this is an inexcusable fault in a writer on practical religion,) not only that his whole hypothesis is unproved, wholly unsupported either by Scripture or reason: but that the ingenious madman over and over contradicts Christian experience, reason, Scripture, and himself." Now all this, from the parenthesis, is both utterly false and groundless, and yet he reiterates the same assertion: as had already been confuted, and the contrary demonstrated, over and over again. But surely, not another line need be quoted, to show the justice of Mr. Law's remarks, (in the above letter,) upon this individual's subjection to his own spirit.—If one more, however, be wanting, here it is, taken from his thirteenth journal:—"St. John (he writes) speaks as high and as deep things as Jacob Behmen. Why, then, does not Jacob speak as plain as him?"!! The Bible speaks as high and as deep things, as Sir Isaac Newton, or a perfect master of the whole range of the sciences; why, then, does not such a philosopher write in the same style as the Bible? Juvenile, disreputable stuff!—and yet, if weighed in the true balances of the sanctuary, there never was, nor can be, an objection made to Behmen, possessing more of sound reason, justice, and strict propriety, than is contained in this absurd sentence; indeed, where such objections are not traceable to a peculiar idiosyncrasy, they will be invariably found to emanate from a 'fox and grapes' principle of judgment.

And as to the obscurity sometimes complained of, in the phrases and writings of Behmen, and of other mystic philosophers and spiritual authors, the objection is without foundation, and can only be made by such as dislike the trouble of applying themselves to understand them. 'All arts and professions have their appropriate terms, suited to their respective provinces, and so has mystical theology, for a much higher reason, viz., as it treats of subjects beyond the reach of nature and natural knowledge, being conversant with the things of a new world, and the operations of the Holy Spirit in the soul of believers; which words of familiar use in language, cannot properly express in the ideas appendent to them. And therefore deep spiritual writers are often led to use new words and figures of speech, which may seem very strange and incongruous to those that first enter into this school; but by patience and application they will come to be well understood, yea, approved of by the diligent learner, just as the words of any other language, of which we only become masters by study and practice. But there is also another reason for that venerable obscurity in which we see certain spiritual truths involved, viz., that it may serve as a veil to conceal them the more from those that are not as yet fit for them; and also to guard them against the abuse of such as are of a mocking spirit,—(from which some professed Christians are not delivered,) and which would only serve to their greater disadvantage: and therefore our Lord says, Cast not your pearls before swine; and for this reason, he couched many Divine truths in parables, only to be known of those that were in a disposition to receive them. Now, the veil thus spread over certain sacred truths, to conceal them from the unworthy and profane, answers this good end, viz. such persons, though possessed of the outward expression, yet being unable to come at the meaning, but by serious study and pains; such a previous course of discipline and application might serve as a good means to rectify their disorder, to remove their prejudice, and to prepare them as proper vessels to receive the truth. And thus proceeded even the wiser heathens, with respect to what little truth they were possessed of, in the more recondite mysteries of their religion: none were admitted into them till they had passed their novitiate, or preparatory stages of discipline.'

But what is more strange of all, it is now almost a moral certainty that all that peculiarity of doctrine concerning the New-birth (with, however, many invented crudities added to, and mixed up with it,) with which the individual here referred to, so specially identified himself and all his people, was originally derived, and that in a direct line, from this very Behmen's "Way to Christ," the only treatise he ever published in print, and which was productive of so great a revival of Christianity in his own day, where it was received, and doubtless in subsequent ages, until the epoch of its translation into this country. The writer has had an opportunity of pursuing his researches on this point, since it was touched upon in the note of p. 42: and should any one desire to obtain a glimpse of that fact, until the history of the whole matter be traced out publicly, he has only to make himself acquainted with the life of Behmen, and the above-mentioned effects of his "Way to Christ," in his life-time; then to peruse the first and second of the individual's journals, and such other passages of the rest as relate to the Moravians, and connect the mystics with them; and then modern, in all our libraries, has so much as attempted to open the ground of Nature, to show its birth and state, and its essential unalterable distinction from the one abyssal supernatural God; and how ALL THE GLORIES, POWERS, AND PERFECTIONS OF THE HIDDEN, UNAPPROACHABLE GOD, HAVE THEIR WONDERFUL MANIFESTATION IN NATURE AND CREATURE. This is a blessing reserved by God for these last times, to be opened in His chosen instrument, the poor il-to be informed that Hernhuth is scarcely twenty miles from Gorlitz; therewith considering, that, though the Lutheran reformed religion necessarily existed before Behmen's day, for he was bred a Lutheran, yet that the doctrine of the truth and necessity of the New-birth, with the direct mode of procedure for the conscious attainment and experience of that blessing, was not set down in that perfect systematic order, in which it is found described in the tracts composing J. B.'s "Way to Christ;"—let him examine these points well over, and he will soon become satisfied as to the fact. But we are anticipating the proposed biography, as well as some notices in the subsequent sections of this treatise upon the subject.—We have said thus much SOLELY and ALTOGETHER IN DEFENCE OF MR. LAW. As to the justification of all the points of his character, whether as a divine or a philosopher, that must be left to the proposed biography, where, if Law's mind, principles, and actions be shown in their true aspect, they will need no other defence or laudation.

But once more. It was rather singular in this individual, (though quite consistent with prudence), to omit the insertion in his diary of the correspondence that took place between himself and Mr. Law in the year 1738, as before alluded to, when he fancied he had made a wonderful discovery about the meaning of "faith" and that Mr. Law had been misleading him, indeed was in darkness and error himself. As he had given publicity in his diary, to his opinions of the time, should he not in fairness, in after life, have also frankly stated that which would have tended to correct the partial views and mistaken notions in others, to which he had, by his early teachings, given rise. His executors, however, found the correspondence among his papers after his decease, and published it in their periodical (1795), both the letters of this individual and that of Mr. Law. But here again there was another slight omission, on whose part it cannot now perhaps be ascertained. They failed to insert the conclusion of the correspondence, being a rejoinder of Mr. Law to what appears in that periodical as the concluding letter; nor would the circumstance of a fourth letter have come to light, but for the rough outline of it having been found amongst Mr. Law's papers. We refer the reader to the periodical in question, advising him to read the correspondence there given, and afterwards the unpublished rejoinder, inserted below; which, altogether, may stand as an incidental refutation and exposure of the popular fallacy respecting faith, in contradistinction to all the other parts of Scripture truth. For further elucidation, we premise those letters with the following quotation from another letter of Mr. Law to an intimate friend; but remit the full discussion of the subject to the proposed biography: "I had (he writes), a volume of the great Count Zinzendorf's sermons before I left the town. I was to find such things in them as would surprise me; [they are full of this faith-talk, only believe, etc.] but I could hardly persuade myself to read them through.

"The * * * may, for aught I know, have many good people amongst them, as every denomination hath. But their form is quite sectarian, full of inventions, placing much in particularities, and wholly attached to a particular opinion, or rather to a particularity of expression concerning the blood and sufferings of Christ. * * *"—The two letters are these:—"May 19th, 1738. Rev. Sir,—Yours I received yesterday. As you have written that letter in obedience to a divine call, and in conjunction with another extraordinary good young man, whom you know to have the spirit of God; so I assure you, that, considering your letter in that view, I neither desire nor dare to make the smallest defence of myself. If a messenger from God should represent me as a monster of iniquity, that had corrupted all that had conversed with me, I should lay my hand upon my mouth, and with my eyes shut, submit myself to the divine justice. And as you lay claim to this character, as a messenger sent from God to lay my sins before my face, and have not executed this message, till a divine man, highly favoured of God, had passed sentence upon me; so I assure you that I have not the least inclination to distrust or question your mission, nor the smallest repugnance to own, receive, reverence, and submit myself to you both in these exalted characters. May God vouchsafe his favours to you both, and his mercies to me, according to his own good pleasure.

"This is the whole of my answer to your letter, considered in that light in which you represent it, as written in obedience to a divine call, and the message of it ratified by a person whom you know to have the spirit of God.

"But now, upon supposition that you had here only acted by that ordinary light which is common to good and sober minds, I should remark upon your letter as follows. * * *—" and so forth. See the correspondence.

The other letter, which is as follows, appears to have been a reply to the answer [dated May, 30th,] which the last had called forth, and may be considered as concluding Mr. Law's vindication of himself from the strange accusations and opinions which this individual had expressed towards him in his first letter. It may be also said to have terminated their intimacy and correspondence, for, when the individual in the year 1756, took upon himself to publish in print his beforementioned 'Letter,' Mr. Law, as will doubtless have been observed, took no notice whatever of it, for the very good reasons contained in his letters to those friends, who had written to him upon the subject:—

"Sir,—Without the smallest degree of disregard either to you or your letter, I had not sent you an answer to it, had it not been for the part of it, where you say there were two persons present with Mr. Bohler and myself. There were two persons present, but only one witness, for we spoke only in Latin, and they both declared to me, they understood not Latin.

"I mentioned not your qualification for translating Kempis with the least intention to reproach either your design or performance, but only to shew you that it deeply engaged your attention to those very truths, which you suppose you were a stranger to, through my conversation.

"If you remember the Theologia Germanica so imperfectly, as only to remember something of Christ our pattern, but nothing express of Christ our atonement, it is no wonder that you can remember so little of my conversations with you. I put that author into your hands, not because he is fit for the first learners of the rudiments of Christianity, who are to be prepared for baptism, but because you were a clergyman, that had made profession of divinity, had read as you said with much literate BERMEN. And this I will venture to say, that he who will declare war against him, has no choice of any other weapons but railery and reproach. To call the blessed man 'a possessed cobbler,' will be doing something; to call his writings 'senseless jargon,' may stand his learned adversary in great stead; but if he tries to overcome him any other way, his success will be like his who knocks his head against a post.—But no more of this."

Again, we find this illuminated oracle thus expressing himself in another of his letters,—referring to the previously alluded to, and other orthodox religionists, or ruling wisdom of his day, who rejected and even aspersed the writings, which he, in the full assurance of understanding and faith, (like good old Simeon in the sight of the people in the temple of Jerusalem,) took up in his arms, and openly acknowledged before all the world, as a most wonderful and extraordinary gift of God, to be manifested in due time :—

"To desire to communicate good to every creature, in the degree we can, and it is capable of receiving from us, is a Divine temper; for thus God stands unchangeably disposed towards the whole creation: but let me add my request, as you value the peace which God has brought forth by his Holy Spirit in you, as you desire to be continually taught by an unction from above, that you would on no account enter into any dispute with any one about the truths of salvation, but give them every help but that of debating with them; for no man has fitness for the light of the gospel, till he feels an hunger, and thirst, and want of something better than that which he has and is by nature. Yet we ought not to check our inclinations to help others in every way we can. Only do what you do as a work of God; and then, whatever may be the event, you will have rea-approbation and benefit the two practical discourses, and many other good books; and because you seemed to me to be of a very inquisitive nature, and much inclined to meditation; in this view, nothing could be more reasonable for you than that book, which most deeply, excellently, and fully contains the whole system of christian faith and practice, and is an excellent guide against all mistakes, both in faith and works. What that book has not taught you, I am content that you should not have learnt from me.—You say the two maxims I mention, may imply, but do not express, 'He is our propitiation through faith in his blood.' Is not this, therefore, a mere contest about words and expressions? When I refer you to these two maxims or texts of Scripture, will you confine me to them alone? Does not my quoting them necessarily refer to every part of Scripture of the same import? When Christ says, 'Without me ye can do nothing:' when the apostle says, 'there is no other name given under heaven by which we can be saved:' when he says, 'we are sanctified through faith in his blood,' and 'through faith in him;' is there anything here but a difference of words, or one and the same thing imperfectly and only in part expressed.

"I mentioned not the 'Answer to the plain Account,' etc., as a proof of the manner of my conversation with you, but of my faith in Christ, as the atonement for us by his blood, at this time; which is what you directly questioned, and called upon me for.

"You number up all the parts of my letter, which are only speaking to the same parts in yours, as things entirely beside the point. If they are not to the point in mine, how came they to have a place in yours, which was written under divine direction? Why did you give me occasion to speak of things, that needed nothing to be said of them? Had you said but one thing, I would have spoke to nothing else. In your first letter I was blamed for not calling you to such a faith in Christ, as strips us naked of our own works, our own righteousness; for not teaching you this doctrine, 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ with all thy heart, and nothing shall be impossible to thee.' This is the faith in Christ which all mystical spiritual books are full of. What you have heard from me on this head of faith, in our former conversations, would make a volume; but because I appealed to a text of Scripture, 'without me ye can do nothing,' you have quoted this faith; and now you say this, and no other is the question, 'Whether I ever advised you to seek first a living faith in the blood of Christ?'

"But, sir, this is not the main question of your first letter: had you had only this question to have proposed, you would not have written to me at all. But if I tell you that you had conceived a dislike to me, and wanted to let me know that a man of God had shown you the poverty and misery of my state, if I tell you, that this was the main intent of your letter, you know that I tell you the truth.

[* * * this letter is copied from the original rough draft in the author's own hand-writing, in which the passages of his opponent's letter are omitted, as in this instance. * *] "But this matter, it seems, is now of no importance.

"I was a stranger to him [Peter Bohler], received him friendly, listened to him humbly, consented to his instructing me. I said not one single syllable of any doctrine of religion, mystical or not. We presently parted, in all appearance friendly. He passes a sentence of condemnation upon me as in a poor miserable state, which lay open to his eyes. This man of God told nothing of this to myself, but goes away to another man of God, and invents and tells things as false as if he had charged me with picking his pocket; and what is well to be observed, this judgment passed upon me is founded upon those very things, which are thus false, and wholly his own invention. This other man of God confirms this sentence, as spoken by one that he knew had the Spirit of God, and in obedience to a Divine call is obliged to let me know.

[* * *] Who made me your teacher? or can make answerable for any defects in your knowledge? You sought my acquaintance, you came to me as you pleased, and on what occasion you pleased, and to say to me what you pleased. If it was my business to put this question to you, if you have a right to charge me with guilt for the neglect of it, may you not much more reasonably accuse them, who are authoritatively charged with you? Did the church in which you are educated put this question to you? Did the bishop that ordained you either deacon or priest do this for you? Did the bishop that sent you a missionary into Georgia require this of you? Pray, sir, be at peace with me."—Such is the unpublished conclusion of the correspondence.

son to be content with the success that God gives it. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear," may be enough for you, as well as it was for our blessed Lord.

The next thing that belongs to us, and which is also godlike, is a true unfeigned patience and meekness, showing every kind of goodwill and tender affection towards those that turn a deaf ear to us; looking upon it to be full as contrary to God's method, and the good state of our own heart, to dispute with any one in contentious words, as to fight with him for the truths of salvation.—

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," saith our blessed Lord. He called none else, because no one else had ears to hear, or a heart to receive the truths of redemption.

Every man is a vain disputer, till such time as something has disturbed his state, and awakened in him a sensibility of his own evil and miserable nature. We are all of us afraid both of inward and outward distress; and yet, till distress comes, our life is but a dream, and we have no awakened sensibility of our own true state.

We are apt to consider parts and abilities, as the proper qualifications for the reception of divine truths; and wonder that a man of a fine understanding should not immediately embrace just and solid doctrines: but the matter is quite otherwise. Had man kept possession of his first rich and glorious state, there had been no foundation for the gospel redemption; and the doctrine of "the cross" must have appeared quite unreasonable to be pressed upon him: and therefore says our Lord, "To the poor the gospel is preached." It is solely to them, and none else: that is, to poor fallen man, that feels he has lost all the true natural riches and greatness of his first divine life; to him is the gospel [or glad tidings of its restoration] preached. But if a man knows and feels nothing of this poverty of his nature, he is not that person to whom the gospel belongs: it has no more suitableness to his state, than it had to man unfallen: and then the greater his parts and abilities are, the better is he qualified to show the folly of every doctrine of that salvation, of which he has no want!

Such a man, though he may be of an humane, ingenuous, generous, and frank nature, of lively parts and much candour, is nevertheless entirely ignorant of the depth of the heart of man, and the necessities of human nature. As yet, though he knows it not, he is only at play and pastime, pleasing himself with supposed 'deep inquiries after truth,' whilst he is only sporting himself with lively wandering images of this and that, just as they happen to start up in his mind. Could but he see himself in the state of the poor distressed prodigal son, and find that himself is the very person there recorded, he would then, but not till then, see the fitness of that redemption, which is offered him by the mercy of God in CHRIST JESUS. But such an one, alas! is rich; he is sound; light is in his own power, goodness is in his own possession: he feels no distress or darkness; but has a crucible of reason and judgment, that on every occasion separates gold from dross: and therefore he must be left to himself, to his own elysium, till something more than argument and disputation awakens him out of these golden dreams.—

Let us beware also of the religious pharisee, who raves against spiritual religion, 'because it touches the very heart-string of all systematical divinity,' and shakes the very foundation of every BABEL in every country; for not a system of divinity, since systems were in being, whether popish or protestant, deserves a better name.

All preachers of the true spiritual mystery of the gospel, of a birth, light, and life from above, in and by JESUS CHRIST (which are the mystic writers of every age,) ever were, and will be treated by the reigning fashionable orthodoxy, as enemies to the outward gospel and its services, just as the prophets of God (who were the mystic preachers of the Jewish dispensation) were by the then reigning orthodoxy condemned and despised, for calling people to a spiritual meaning of the dead letter, to a holiness infinitely greater than that of their outward sacrifices, types, and ceremonies.

Whoever he is that has any situation of his own to defend, be it that of a celebrated preacher, a champion for received orthodoxy, a head, a leader, or follower of any sect or party, or particular method; or that seems, both in his own eyes and in the eyes of others, to have made himself significant in any kind of religious distinction; every such person, sooner or later, will find that he has much of that very same to give up, which hindered the zealous and eminently religious pharisee from converting to Christ in the spirit of a "little child."

Nor doth it help the matter, that such an one abounds with piety and excellence [as some of the forementioned voluntary antagonists may do]; for St. Paul was governed by a spirit of great piety, great excellence, and zeal for God. He says of himself, that when he was persecuting the disciples of Christ, he "lived in all good conscience, as touching the law blameless, and according to the strictest sect of the Jewish religion:" for the pharisees, though many of them had all that hypocrisy and rottenness which Christ laid to their charge, yet as a sect, they were an order of most confessed and resplendent sanctity; and yet the more earnest and upright they were in this kind of zeal for goodness, the more earnestly they opposed and condemned the heavenly mystery of a new life from CHRIST, as appears by St. Paul.

This sect of the pharisees did not cease with the Jewish church; it only lost its old name; it is still in being, and springs now in the same manner from the gospel, as it did then from the law: it has the same place, lives the same life, does the same work, minds the same things, has the same goodness at heart, has the same religious honour and claim to piety in the Christian, as it had in the Jewish church; and as much mistakes the depths of the mystery of the Gospel, as that sect mistook the mystery signified by the letter of the law and the prophets.

It would be easy to show, in several instances, how the heaven of that sect works amongst us, just as it did amongst them. "Have any of the rulers believed on him?" was the orthodox question of the ancient pharisees. Now, we christians readily and willingly condemn the weakness and folly of that question; and yet who does not see, that, for the most part, both priest and people in every Christian country, live and govern themselves by the folly and weakness of the very same spirit which put that question? For when God, as he has always done from the beginning of the world, raises up private and illiterate persons full of light and wisdom from above, so as to be able to discover all the workings of "the mystery of iniquity," and to open the ground, and truth, and absolute necessity of such an inward spirit and life of CHRIST revealed in us, as time, carnal wisdom, and worldly policy, have departed from; when all this is done by the weakest instruments of God, in such a simplicity and fulness of demonstration, as may be justly deemed a MIRACLE, do not clergy and laity get rid of it all, though ever so unanswerable, merely by the strength of the pharisee's good old question, saying with them, "Have any of the rulers believed and taught these things? Hath the church, in council or convocation? Hath Calvin, Luther, Zuinglius, or any of our renowned system-makers, ever taught or asserted these matters?"

But hear what our blessed Lord saith of the place, the power, and origin of truth: He refers us not to the current doctrines of the times,* or to the systems of men, but to His own name, His own nature, His own divinity hidden in us: "My sheep (says he) hear my voice." Here the whole

* In a note of a preceding page, we alluded to the difference to be distinguished between what was termed popular evangelical theology, and philosophic gospel truth. What is implied by the former, need hardly be explained to any one acquainted with the mystification of Christian doctrine, to which a blind enthusiasm, founded upon a few peculiar notions, and an all but universal ignorance of the scripture sense of the terms 'salvation,' 'justified by faith, not of works,' 'believing in Christ,' 'by grace saved through faith,' etc., (which has had such a prevalence in this country, and hence in others, during the last hundred years,) has given rise—that is, since the Moravians first visited our shores, and got a hold upon the public mind; who were the first to introduce and popularise such partial, one-sided views of the doctrine of Justification. We need not, we say, explain to such readers, the peculiarities of that system, for the idiosyncrasy of the major part of the abettors of such exciting doctrines, (modified, it is true, in some, according as their theological studies have been more or less universal, and under the conduct of the mystic divines,) must have been manifest to all observant and enlightened persons.—But as an illustration of the edifying instruction of true Christian philosophy, by a profound and erudite master thereof, we insert the following extracts from Mr. Law's letters, and other pieces. It has already been very justly observed, asindeed, may now be understood, that a philosophic knowledge of Christianity affords all the motives to an ardent practice of the simple precepts of the gospel, with an experience of the vivifying power of its truth, equal to, and surpassing all the admitted good and surprising results which have been attained through the false grounded enthusiasm of the above deformed, imperfect representation of the christian theory; whilst it rationally explains, as in any other true science, the whole nature and character of Christianity, the grounds and reasons of its institutions, laws and precepts, and the general and individual end and design contemplated by it.—

"You tell me, sir, that after a twenty years' zeal and labour in matters of religion, it has turned to so little account, that you are forced most earnestly to desire a speedy answer to this question, Where shall you go, or what shall you do, to be in the truth?

Let me first premise thus much. Every man in his fallen state has all that in him, though in a state of death and hiddenness, which was the living glory and perfection of the first created man. Just as the root of the lily, in the winter's cold, hath all that in it, though as in a state of death, which was the glory and beauty of the summer's flower. What is hidden in the root of the lily, lies no longer in its seeming death, than till the spring sun calls forth its life.—Now, one divine dispensation after another, is to do that same to the fallen soul, which the spring and daily advancing sun do to the lily root; namely, to call it out of its state of death, and make something of its first glory come to life, and spring forth out of it. Hence it is, that "the kingdom of God (which was that to which Adam died) is like to treasure hid in a field;" and again, "the kingdom of God is within you." But this could not be true, unless all that glory, which Adam lost, was still preserved as a seed or shut up root of life within him: and all this, through the mercy and free grace of God, who foreseeing the fall of Adam, willed that a seed of his first glory should be preserved in him, declared and made known to him by a seed of the woman, which through the Word made flesh, should, in spite of death and hell, grow up to the "fulness of stature in Christ Jesus."

And as the kingdom of heaven is every man's treasure, as surely within him as his own soul, so that which hides and covers it from us is that awakened, bestial life, which is called Adam in us; and in which, the immortal soul, that was born for heaven, is wedded to the "lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," and subject to the workings of that satanical nature, which our Lord calls the prince of this world.—And thus it is, that every man comes into this world in a twofold state: Adam and Christ are both born in him. And if this was not the state of man, nothing within you would, or could ask, as you have done, or have any anxiety after the truth. And your being either led from this true knowledge of your state, or having never been sensible of it, is the reason of your having made so many religious iniquities in vain, both from yourself, and other people.—For nothing can tell you the truth, or establish you in a just and solid discernment of right from wrong, in doctrines, opinions, and practices of religion, but this home knowledge of yourself, namely, that Christ and Adam are not only both of them essentially within you, but the whole of you; that nothing is life or salvation, but that which is the life and growth of Christ in you; and that all that is done from the life, the power, and natural capacity of the Adamic nature, is heathenish, is mere vanity and death, however gloriously set forth by the natural gifts of wit and learning.

Religion has no good in it, but as it is the revival and quickening of that divine nature, which your first father had from God, and nothing can revive it but that which first created it. God is no otherwise your God, but as he is the God of your life, manifested in it; and he can be no otherwise the God of your life, but as his Spirit is living within you. Satan is no other way knowable by you, or can have any other fellowship with you, but as his evil spirit works and manifests itself along with the workings of your own spirit.—"Resist the devil, and he will flee from you;" but he is nowhere to be resisted, but as a working spirit within you; therefore, to resist the devil is to turn from the evil thoughts and motions that arise within you. "Turn to God, and he will turn to you:" but God is an universal spirit, which you cannot locally turn to or from; therefore to turn to God, is to cleave to those good thoughts and motions which proceed from his Holy Spirit, dwelling and working in you.—This is the God of your life, to whom you are to adhere, listen, and attend, and this is your worshipping him in spirit and in truth. And that is the "devil that goeth about as a roaring lion," who has no voice, but that which he speaks within you. Therefore, my friend, be at home, and keep close to that which passes within you; for be it what it will, whether it be a good in which you delight, or an evil at which you grieve, you could have neither the one, nor the other, but because a holy God of light and love is essentially dwelling in you.—Seek, therefore, for no other road, nor call anything the way to God, but solely that which his eternal all-crea-matter is decisively determined, both where truth is, and who they are that can have any knowledge of it.

Heavenly truth is nowhere spoken but by the voice of CHRIST, nor heard but by a power of ting word and spirit work within you. For could anything else have been man's way to God, the word had not been made flesh.

The last words in your question, viz., To be in the truth, are well expressed; for to be in the truth, is the finished state of man returning to God, thus declared by Christ himself, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free;" free from the blindness and delusion of your own natural reason, and free from forms, doctrines, and opinions, which others would impose upon you.—To be in the truth, is to be where the first holy man was, when he came forth in the image and likeness of God. When he lost paradise, he lost the truth, and all that he felt, knew, saw, loved, and liked of the earthly bestial world, into which he was fallen, was but mere separation from God, a veil upon his heart, and scales upon his eyes.—Nothing of his first truth, could be spoken of to him, even by God himself, but under the veil of earthly things, types, and shadows. "The law was given by Moses;" but Moses had a veil upon his face: the law was a veil, prophecy was a veil, Christ crucified was a veil, and all was a veil, till "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," in the power of his HOLY SPIRIT. Therefore to be in the truth "as it is in Jesus," is to become from under the veil, to have passed through all those dispensations, which would never have begun, but that they might end in a Christ spiritually revealed and essentially formed in the soul. So that now, in this last dispensation of God, which is the first truth itself restored, nothing is to be thought of, trusted to, or sought after, but God's immediate continual working in the soul by his Holy Spirit.—This, sir, is the where you are to go, and the what you are to do, to be in the truth. For the truth as it is in Jesus, is nothing else but Christ come in the Spirit, and his coming in the Spirit is nothing else but the first lost life of God quickened and revealed again in the soul. Everything short of this has only the nature of outward type and figure, which, in its best state, is only for a time.—If, therefore, you look to anything but the Spirit, seek to any power but that of the Spirit, expect Christ to be your Saviour any other way, than as he is spiritually born in you, you go back from the grace and truth which came by Jesus, and can at best be only a legal Jew, or a self-righteous pharisee; there is no getting farther than these states, but by being 'born of the Spirit,' living by the Spirit, as his child, his instrument, and holy temple in which he dwells and works all his good pleasure.—Drop this full adherence to and dependence upon the Spirit, act as in your own sphere, be something of yourself, and through your own wisdom, etc., and then, though all that you say or do is with the outward words of the spiritual gospel, and in the outward practices of the spiritual apostles, yet for all this you are but there, where those were who worshipped God with the blood of bulls and goats; for (N.B.) nothing but the Spirit of God can worship God in spirit and in truth.

But you will, perhaps, say, that you are still but where you was, because you know not how to find the continual guidance of the Holy Spirit.—If you know how to find your own thoughts, you need not be at a loss to find the Spirit of God. For you have not a thought within you, but is either from the good of the Spirit, or from the evil of the flesh. Now the good and the evil that are within you, and always more or less sensible by turns, do each of them teach you the same work and presence of the Spirit of God. For the good could not appear as good, nor the evil be felt as evil, but because the immediate working of the Spirit of God creates, or manifests this difference between them; and therefore, be in what state you will, the power of God's Spirit within you equally manifests itself to you: and to find the immediate, continual, essential working of the Spirit of God within you, you need only know what good and evil are felt within you. For all the good that is in any thought or desire, is so much of God within you; and whilst you adhere to, and follow a good thought, you follow, or are led by the Spirit of God. And on the other hand, all that is selfish and wicked in thought or affection, is so much of the spirit of satan within you, which would not be known, or felt as evil, but because it is contrary to the immediate, continual working of the Spirit of God within you.—Turn, therefore, inwards; and all that is within you will demonstrate to you the presence and power of God in your soul, and make you find and feel it with the same certainty, as you find and feel your own thoughts. And what is best of all, by thus doing you will never be without a living sense of the immediate guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, always equal to your dependence upon it, always leading you from strength to strength in your inward man, till all your knowledge of good and evil is become nothing else but a mere love of the one, and mere aversion to the other.—For the one work of the Spirit of God is to distinguish the good and evil that are within you, not as in notion, but by affection; and when you are wholly given up to this new-creating work of God, so as to stay your mind upon it, abide with it, and expect all from it. This, my friend, will be your returning to the rock from whence you were hewn, your drinking at the fountain of living water, your walking with God, your living by faith, your putting on Christ, your continual hearing the Word of God, your eating the bread that came down from heaven, your supping with Christ, and following the Lamb wherever he goeth!

For all these seeming different things will be found in every man, according to his measure, who is wholly given up to and depending upon the blessed work of God's Spirit in his soul.

But your mistake, and that of most Christians, lies in this; you would be good by some outward means, you would have methods, opinions, forms, and ordinances of religion alter and raise your fallen nature, and create in you a new heart and a new spirit; that is to say, you would be good in a way that is altogether impossible, for goodness cannot be brought into you from without, much less by anything that is creaturely, or the action of man; this is as impossible, as for the flesh to sanctify the spirit, or for things temporal to give life to things that are eternal.

The image and likeness of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are in every man, antecedent to every outward work or action that can proceed from him: it is God thus within him, that is the sole cause that anything can be called godly, that is done, observed, or practised by him. If it were not so, man would only have his being from God, but his goodness from himself.

All man's outward good works are only like his outward good words; he is not good because he is frequent in the use of them, they bring no goodness into him, nor are of any worth in themselves, but as a good and godly spirit speaks forth itself in the sound of them. This is the case of every outward creaturely thing, or work of man, be it of what kind it will, either hearing, praying, singing, or preaching, etc., or practising any outward rules and observances; they have only the goodness of the outward Jew, nay, are as vain as sounding brass, and tinkling cymbals, unless they be solely the work and fruits of the Spirit of God: for the divine nature is that alone which can be the power to any good work, either in man or angel.

CHRIST living in the hearer. As he is the eternal only Word of God, that speaks forth all the wisdom and wonders of God; so he alone is the Word, that speaks forth all the life, wisdom, and goodness, that is or can be in any creature; it can have none but what it has in him and from him:

When a man first finds himself stirred up with religious zeal, what does he generally do? He turns all his thoughts outwards; he runs after this or that man, he is at the beck of every new opinion, and thinks only of finding the 'truth' by resting in this or that method, or society of Christians. Could he find a man that did not want to have him of his party and opinion, that turned him from himself, and the teachings of man to a God, not as historically read of in books, or preached of in this or that society, but to a God essentially living and working in his and every soul; him he might call a man of God, as leading him from himself to God, as saying him from many vain wanderings, from fruitless searchings into a council of Trent, a synod of Dort, an Augsburg confession, an Assembly's catechism, or a thirty-nine articles! For had he an hundred articles, if they were anything else but a hundred calls to a Christ come in the spirit, to a God within him, as the only possible light and teacher of his mind, it would be a hundred times better for him to be without them.

For all man's blindness and misery lies in this, that he has lost the knowledge of God as essentially living within him, and, by falling under the power of an earthly bestial life, thinks only of God as living in some other world, and so seeks only by notions to set up an image of an absent God, instead of worshipping the God of life and power, in whom he lives, moves, and has his being.

Whoever, therefore, teaches you to expect great things from this or that sort of opinions, or calls you to anything as saving and redeeming, but the manifestation of God in your own soul, through a birth of the holy nature of Christ within you, is totally ignorant of the whole nature both of the fall and the redemption of man. For the first is nothing else, or less than a death to the divine life, or Christ-like nature, which lived in the first man; and the other is nothing else, but Christ new-born, formed, and revealed again in man, as he was at the first. These two great truths are the most strongly asserted by Christ, saying, "If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, take up his cross daily, and follow me." Let him deny himself is the fullest declaration, and highest proof, that he has lost his first divine and heavenly nature, that he is not that self which came first from God, or he could not be called to deny it.—Say, if you will, that he has not lost that first heavenly life in God, and then you must say, that our Lord calls him to deny, crucify, and renounce that holy and godlike self, which was the first gift of God to him.

To read whole libraries on these matters is only to be bewildered in the strife of fictions and contradictions about them. But to read this one single line of Christ is to be led into the open full truth of the whole nature, both of the fall and redemption. And indeed, if we were but freed from the Babel of opinions, which have so long confounded the first truths of the gospel, it would be plain from every part of it, that nothing could be called the fall of man, but his loss of the divine life or nature, nor anything be called his redemption, or the real means of it, but solely that which God is and does in him.—For what can be a good, or work good in man, but God, or the Divine nature in him? All the divine truths that ever came from God, speak only to the pearl of the Divine nature that is hidden in our earthly field of flesh and blood, because nothing else wants them, or has any capacity to receive them; that which is divine can only receive the divine things from God. And thence it is, that unless a "man be born again from above," it is not possible for him to see, "or enter into the kingdom of God;" that is, the divine life must arise again, in the power of a new birth, or there is nothing in fallen man that can partake of the kingdom of God. And the reason is, because "the kingdom of God is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," and therefore not possible to be anywhere, but where it proceeds from the Holy Ghost.—

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." Now, what is this God that you are thus to love? Is it some abstract idea that learned men have helped you to form of him? No such thing. This would be but a poor fiction of God, and a poor fiction of love.—God is all good, the only good, and there is nothing good besides him; therefore, to love God with all your heart, etc., is to love all goodness, and to love nothing else but goodness, and then, and only then, do you love God with all your heart, and soul, and strength.—But now, to what purpose could this precept of such a love be given to man, unless he essentially partook of the divine nature? For to be in heart, and soul, and spirit, all love of God within you, is surely too absurd for any one to believe. So sure, therefore, as this precept came from truth itself, so sure is it that every man, (however loath to hear of anything but pleasures and enjoyments, in this vain shadow of a life,) has yet a divine nature concealed within him, which, when suffered to hear the calls of God, will know the voice of its heavenly Father, and long to do his will on earth, as it is done in heaven.

The conclusion, then, is this, if to love God with your whole heart and soul, is to love all goodness, and nothing else but goodness; and if all that is done without this love, whether in religious duties or common life, is but mere separation from God, then it must be the grossest blindness to believe you can have any love of God, or goodness in any duties you perform, any further, or in any other degree, than as the eternal Holy Spirit of God lives and loves in you.—

Again, to see the divinity of man's original, you need only read these words: "Be ye perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." For what could man have to do with the perfection of God, as the rule of his life, unless the truth and reality of the divine nature was in him? Could there be any reasonableness in this precept, or any fitness to call us to be good, as God is good, unless there was that in us which is in God? Or to call us to the perfection of an heavenly Father, if we were not the real children of his heavenly nature? Might it not be as well to bid the heavy stone to fly, as its flying father the eagle doth.

But this precept from the lip of truth is another full proof, that by the fall, a death or suppres-this is the one unchangeable boundary of truth, goodness, and every perfection of men on earth, or angels in heaven."

We append the three following letters as examples of a rational enlightened representation of evangelical Christianity, suited either for Christians, or, with a little modification, for human nature under any and all creeds, to be considered in connection with the observations of pp. 78 to 87 :—

"My dear worthy friend,—Whom I much love and esteem ; your letter, though full of complaints about the state of your heart, was very much according to my mind, and gives me great hopes that God will carry on the good work he has begun in you, and lead you by his Holy Spirit through all those difficulties under which you at present labour.

The desire that you have to be better than you find yourself at present, is God's call begun to be heard within you, and will make itself to be more heard within you, if you give but way to it, and reverence it as such ; humbly believing that he that calls will, and only can, help you to pay right and full obedience to it.

sion is brought upon our first divine life, and also that it is yet in a state capable of being revived again in us. For if it was not in a state of death, or suppressed in us, there could be no need of calling us to live according to it ; for every being naturally acts according to the life that is manifested in it. Nor could we be called to be heavenly, but because the heavenly nature has its seed in our soul, in a readiness to come to life in us.—

Lastly, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," is another full proof, that God is in us of a truth, and that the Holy Spirit hath as certainly an essential birth within us as the spirit of this world hath. For this precept might as well be given to a fox as to a man, if a man had not something quite supernatural in him. For mere nature, and natural creature, is nothing else but mere self, and can work nothing but to and for itself. And this, not through any corruption or depravity of nature, but because it is nature's best state, and it can be nothing else, either in man or beast.

"I say unto you, love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you," etc. Every word here is demonstration, that nothing but the new birth from above can be a christian. There is no other nature or spirit that can breathe forth this universal love and benevolence, but that same, which, laying aside its own glory, came down from heaven to forgive, to love, to save, and die for a whole world of enemies and sinners.

This is the Spirit of Christ, that must as essentially live and breathe in you as it did in him, or all exhortations to do as he did, to walk as he walked, are but in vain. The natural man is in full separation from this holiness of life, and though he had more wisdom of words, more depth of literature than was in Cicero, or Aristotle, yet would he have as much to die to as the grossest publican or vainest pharisee, before he could be in Christ a new creature. For the highest improved natural abilities can as well ascend into heaven, or clothe flesh and blood with immortality, as make a man like-minded with Christ, in any one divine virtue.—And that for this one reason, because God and Divine goodness are inseparable.

No precept of the gospel supposes a man to have any power to effect it, or calls you to any natural ability or wisdom of your own to comply with it. Christ and his apostles called no man to overcome the corruption and blindness of fallen nature, by learned cultivation of the mind. The wisdom of the learned world was the same pitiable foolishness with them as the grossest ignorance. By them they only stand thus distinguished, the one brings forth a publican, which is often converted to Christ, the other a pharisee, that for the most part condemns him to be crucified. They (Christ and his apostles) taught nothing but death, and denial to all self, and the impossibility of having any one divine temper but through faith and hope of a new nature, "not born of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."—

To speak of the operation of the Holy Spirit, as only an assistance, or an occasional assistance, is as short of the truth as to say, that Christ shall only assist the resurrection of our bodies. For not a spark of any divine virtue can arise up in us, but what must wholly and solely be called forth by that same power, which alone can call our dead bodies out of the dust and darkness of the grave, at the day of resurrection..

If you turn to your own strength to have christian piety and goodness, or are so deceived as to think that learning, or logical abilities, critical acuteness, skill in languages, church systems, rules and orders, articles and opinions, are to do that for you which the Spirit of Christ did, and only could do for the first Christians ; your diligent reading the history of the gospel will leave you as poor, and empty, and dead to the divine life, as if you had been only a diligent reader of the history of all the religions in the world.—But if all that you trust to, long after, and depend upon, is that Holy Spirit which alone made the scripture saints able to "call Jesus Lord;" if this be your one faith, and one hope, the divine life which died in Adam, will find itself alive again in Christ Jesus.—And be assured, that nothing but this new birth can be the gospel christian, because nothing else can possibly love, like, do, and be, that which Christ preached in his divine sermon on the mount. And be assured, also, that when the Spirit of Christ is the spirit that ruleth in you, there will be no hard sayings in the gospel ; but all that the heavenly Christ taught in the flesh will be as meat and drink to you, and you will have no joy but in walking as he walked, in saying, loving, and doing that which he said, loved, and did.—And, indeed, how can it be otherwise ? how can notions, doctrines, and opinions about Christ, what he was and did, make you in him a new creature ? Can any one be made a Samson, or a Solomon, by being well versed in the history of what they were, said, or did ?

Ask, then, my friend, no more, Where shall you go, or what shall you do, to be in the truth ? For you can have the truth nowhere but in Jesus, nor in him any further, than as HIS WHOLE NATURE AND SPIRIT ARE BORN WITHIN YOU." [And so again I refer you to the practice of Behmen's "Way to Christ," as the short and direct way to be born again of the Word and Spirit of God.]

But to come to your state; you seem to yourself to be all insatiation and stupidity, because your head and your heart are so contrary, the one delighting in heavenly notions, the other governed by earthly passions and pursuits. It is happy for you that you know and acknowledge this: for only through this truth, through the full and deep perception of it, can you have any entrance, or so much as the beginning of an entrance into the liberty of the children of God. God is, in this respect, dealing with you, as he does with those whose darkness is to be changed into light. Which can never be done, till you fully know, 1. The real badness of your own heart, and, 2. Your utter inability to deliver yourself from it by any sense, power, or activity of your own mind.

And were you in a better state, as to your own thinking, the matter would be worse with you. For the badness in your heart, though you had no sensibility of it, would still be there, and would only be concealed to your much greater hurt. For there it certainly is, whether it be seen and found or not, and sooner or later must shew itself in its full deformity, or the old man will never die the death which is due to him, and must be undergone, before the new man in Christ Jesus can be formed in us.

All that you complain of in your heart is common to man as man. There is no heart that is without it. And this is the one ground, why every man, as such, however different in temper, complexion, or natural endowments from others, has one and the same full reason, and absolute necessity of being born-again from above.

Flesh and blood, and the spirit of this world, govern every spring in the heart of the natural man. And therefore you can never enough adore that ray of divine light, which breaking in upon your darkness, has discovered this to be the state of your heart, and raised only those saint wishes that you feel to be delivered from it.

For faint as they are, they have their degree of goodness in them, and as certainly proceed solely from the goodness of God working in your soul, as the first dawning of the morning is solely from and wrought by the same sun, which helps us to the noonday light. Firmly therefore believe this as a certain truth, that the present sensibility of your incapacity for goodness is to be cherished as a heavenly seed of life, as the blessed work of God in your soul.

Could you like anything in your own heart, or so much as fancy any good to be in it, or believe that you had any power of your own to embrace and follow truth, this comfortable opinion, so far as it goes, would be your turning away from God and all goodness, and building iron walls of separation betwixt God and your soul.

For conversion to God only then begins to be in truth and reality, when we see nothing that can give us the least degree of hope, or comfort either in ourselves, or any other created thing. To see vanity of vanities in all outward things, to loath and abhor certain sins, are indeed something, but yet as nothing, in comparison of seeing and believing the vanity of vanities within us, and ourselves as utterly unable to take one single step in true goodness as to add one cubit to our stature.

Under this conviction the gate of life is opened to us. And therefore it is, that all the preparatory parts of religion, all the various proceedings of God, either over our inward or outward state, setting up and pulling down, giving and taking away, light and darkness, comfort and distress, as independently of us, as he makes the rain to descend and the winds to blow, are all of them for this only end, to bring us to this conviction, that all that can be called life, good, and happiness, is to come solely from God, and not the smallest spark of it from ourselves. When man was first created, all the good that he had in him was from God alone. (N. B.) This must be the state of man for ever. From the beginning of time through all eternity the creature can have no goodness, but that which God creates in it.

Our first created goodness is lost, because our first father departed from a full, absolute dependence upon God. For a full, continual, unwavering dependence upon God, is that alone which keeps God in the creature, and the creature in God.—Our lost goodness can never come again, or be found in us, till by a power from Christ living in us, we are brought out of ourselves and all selfish trusts, into that full and blessed dependence upon God, in which our first father should have lived.

What room now, my dear friend, for complaint at the sight, sense, and feeling of your inability to make yourself better than you are! Did you want this sense, every part of your religion would only have the nature and vanity of idolatry. For you cannot come unto God, you cannot believe in him, you cannot worship him in spirit and truth, till he is regarded as the only giver, and you yourself as nothing else but the receiver of every heavenly good that can possibly come to life in you.—Can it trouble you, that it was God that made you and not you yourself? Yet this would be as unreasonable, as to be troubled that you cannot make heavenly affections, or divine powers to spring up, and abide in your soul.

God must for ever be God alone; heaven and the heavenly nature are his, and must for ever and ever be received only from him, and for ever and ever only be preserved by an entire dependence upon, and trust in him.—Now as all the religion of fallen man, fallen from God into himself and the spirit of this world, has no other end, but to bring us back to an entire dependence upon God, so we may justly say, BLESSED is that light, HAPPY is that conviction, which brings us into a full and settled despair of ever having the least good from ourselves.

Then are we truly brought and laid at the gate of mercy: at which gate no soul ever did or can lie in vain.—“A broken and contrite heart God will not despise.” That is, God will not, God cannot pass by, overlook, or disregard it. But the heart is then only broken and contrite, when all its strong holds are broken down, all false coverings taken off, and it sees, with inwardly opened eyes, everything to be bad, false, and rotten, that does or can proceed from it as its own.

But you will perhaps say, that your conviction is only an uneasy sensibility of your own state, and has not the goodness of a broken and contrite heart in it.—Let it be so, yet it is rightly in order to it, and it can only begin as it begins at present in you. Your conviction is certainly not full and perfect; for if it was, you would not complain, or grieve at inability to help or mend yourself, but would turn wholly to God, in earnest prayer, and look for help from Him alone.

But whatever is wanting in your conviction, be it what it will, it cannot be added by yourself, nor come any other way, than as the highest degree of the divine life can come into it.—Know, therefore, your want of this, as of all other goodness. But know also at the same time, that it cannot be had through your own willing and running, but of God that sheweth mercy; that is to say, through God who giveth us Jesus Christ. For Jesus Christ is the one only mercy of God to all the fallen world.

Now if all the mercy of God is only to be found in Christ Jesus, if he alone can save us from our sins, if he alone has power to heal all our infirmities, and restore original righteousness, what room for any other pains, labour, or enquiry, but where, and how Christ is to be found.—It matters not what our evils are, deadness, blindness, infatuation, hardness of heart, covetousness, wrath, pride, and ambition, etc., our remedy is always one and the same, always at hand, always certain and infallible. Seven devils are as easily cast out by Christ as one. He came into the world, not to save from this, or that disorder, but to destroy all the power and works of the devil in man.

If you ask where, and how is Christ to be found? I answer, in your heart, and by your heart, and no where else, nor by any thing else.—But you will perhaps say, it is your heart that keeps you a stranger to Christ, and him to you, because your heart is all bad, as unholy as a den of thieves. I answer, that the finding this to be the state of your heart is the real finding of Christ in it.—For nothing else but Christ can reveal and make manifest the sin and evil in you. And he that discovers is the same Christ that takes away sin. So that as soon as complaining guilt sets itself before you, and will be seen, you may be assured that Christ is in you of a truth.

For Christ must first come as a discoverer and reprover of sin. It is the infallible proof of his holy presence within you.

Hear him, reverence him, submit to him, as a discoverer and reprover of sin. Own his power and presence in the feeling of your guilt: and then he that wounded will heal, he that found out the sin will take it away, and he who shewed you your den of thieves will turn it into a holy temple of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.—

And now, sir, you may see that your doubt and enquiry of me, whether your will was really free or not, was groundless.—You have no freedom or power of will, to assume any holy temper, or take hold of such degrees of goodness as you have a mind to have. For nothing is, or ever can be goodness in you, but the one life, light, and spirit of Christ, regenerated, begotten and revealed in your soul. Christ in us is our only goodness, as Christ in us is our hope of glory. But Christ in us is the pure free gift of God to us.—But you have a true and full freedom of will and choice, either to yield and give up your helpless self to the operation of God on your soul, or to rely upon your own rational industry and natural strength of mind. This is the truth of the freedom of your will, in your first setting out, which is a freedom that no man wants, or can want so long as he is in the body. And every unregenerate man has this freedom.—If, therefore, you have not that which you want to have of God, or are not that which you ought to be in Christ Jesus, it is not because you have no free power of leaving yourself in the hands, and under the operation of God, but because the same freedom of your will seeks for help where it cannot be had, namely, in some strength and activity of your own faculties.

Of this freedom of will it is said, "According to thy faith, so be it done unto thee." that is to say, according as thou earnestly desirest, and givest up thyself to God, so will his operation be in thee.—This is the real magic power of the first turning of the will; of which it is truly said, that it always hath that which it willeth, and can have nothing else.

When this freedom of the will wholly gives itself to God, and can say, "Not mine, but thy will be done," then it hath that which it willeth. The will of God is done in it. It is there and then born of God, it hath divine power. It worketh with God, and by God, and comes at length to be that faith which can remove mountains; and nothing is too hard for it.—And thus it is that every unregenerate son of Adam hath life and death in his own choice; not by any natural power of taking which he will, but by a full freedom, either of seeking and trusting himself to the redeeming operation of God, which is eternal life, or of acting according to his own will and power in flesh and blood, which is eternal death.—

And now my dear friend, let me tell you, that as here lies all the true and real freedom which cannot be taken from you, so in the constant exercise of this freedom, that is, in a continual leaving yourself to, and depending upon the operation of God in your soul, [in the spirit of prayer,] lies all in your road to heaven. No divine virtue can be had any other way.—All the excellence and power of faith, hope, love, patience, and resignation, etc., which are the true and only graces of the spiritual life, have no other root or ground but this free full leaving of yourself to God, and are only so many different expressions of your willing nothing, seeking nothing, trusting to nothing, but the life-giving power of his holy presence in your soul.

To sum up all in a word, trust humbly, wait patiently, depend wholly upon, seek solely to a God of light and love, of mercy and goodness, of glory and majesty, ever dwelling in the inmost depth and spirit of your soul. There you have all the secret, hidden, invisible, upholder of all the creation, whose blessed operation will always be found by a humble, faithful, loving, calm, patient introversion of your heart to him, who has his hidden heaven within you, and which will open itself to you, as soon as your heart is left wholly to his eternal, ever-speaking WORD, and ever-sanctifying SPIRIT within you.—

You will perhaps say, Am I then to be idle, and do nothing towards the salvation of my soul? No, you must by no means be idle, but earnestly diligent, according to your measure, in all good works which the law and the gospel direct you to, both with regard to yourself and other people.—Outward good works to other people may be justly considered as God's errand on which you are sent, and therefore to be done faithfully, according to the will of God in obedience to him that sent you.—But nothing that you do or practice as a good to yourself and other people, is in its proper state, grows from its right root, or reaches its true end, till you look for no willing, nor depend upon any doing that which is good, but by CHRIST, the wisdom and power of God living in you. I caution you only against all eagerness and activity of your own spirit, so far as it leads you to seek, and trust to anything that is not God and Christ within you.

Lastly, be courageous then, and full of hope, not by looking at any strength of your own, or fancying that you now know how to be wiser in yourself than you have hitherto been; no, this will only help you to find more and more defects of weakness in yourself: but be courageous in FAITH, and HOPE, and DEPENDENCE UPON GOD. And be assured, that the one infallible way to all that is good, is NEVER TO BE WEARY IN WAITING, TRUSTING, AND DEPENDING UPON GOD MANIFESTED IN CHRIST JESUS."

The former letter, as will have been observed, was addressed to one under awakenings: the second, which is as follows, was written to a friend who was somewhat more advanced in the knowledge of himself, and seeking for the perfect renewing influences of the Holy Spirit, at the same time subject to many outward trials.—How adapted are the instructions herein given for the raising up an elevated and manly piety, is left for the reader to judge; as also of their surpassing evangelical excellence, when compared with the insipid, muddy, pointless, spiritless, illogical dissertations and exhortations of the popular evangelical school:—

"Worthy and dear Sir,—My heart embraces you with all the tenderness and affection of Christian love; and I earnestly beg of God to make me a messenger of his peace to your soul.

You seem to apprehend, I may be much surprised at the account you have given of yourself, but I am neither surprised nor offended at it: I neither condemn, nor lament your estate, but shall endeavour to show you how easy it may be made a blessing and happiness to you. In order to which, I shall not enter into a consideration of the different kinds of trouble you have set forth at large. I think it better to lay before you the one true ground and root from whence all the evil and disorders of human life have sprung. This will make it easy for you to see what that is, which must, and only can be, the full remedy and relief for all of them, how different soever either in kind or degree.—

The Scripture has assured us, that "God made man in his own image and likeness;" a sufficient proof, that man, in his first state, as he came forth from God, must have been absolutely free from all vanity, want, or distress of any kind, from anything either within or without him.—It would be quite absurd and blasphemous to suppose, that a creature beginning to exist in the image and likeness of God, should have vanity of life, or vexation of spirit: a godlike perfection of nature, and a painful distressed nature, stand in the utmost contrariety to one another.

Again, the Scripture has assured us, that "man that is born of a woman, hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery:" therefore man now is not that creature that he was by his creation. The first divine and godlike nature of Adam, which was to have been immortally holy in union with God, is lost; and instead of it a poor mortal, of earthly flesh and blood, born like a wild ass's colt, of a short life, and full of misery, is, through a vain pilgrimage to end in dust and ashes. Therefore let every evil, whether inward or outward, only teach you this truth, that man has infallibly lost his first divine life in God; and that no possible comfort or deliverance is to be expected, but only in this one thing, that though man had lost his God, yet God is become man, that man may be again alive in God, as at the first. For all the misery and distress of human nature, whether of body or mind, is wholly owing to this one cause, that God is not in man, nor man in God, as the state of his nature requires: it is, because man has lost that first life of God in his soul, in and for which he was created. He lost this light, and spirit, and life of God, by turning his will, imagination, and desire, into a tasting and sensibility of the good and evil of this earthly bestial world.

Now here are two things raised up in man, instead of the life of God; first, SELF, or SELFISHNESS, brought forth by his choosing to have a wisdom of his own, contrary to the will and instruction of his Creator; secondly, an EARTHLY, BESTIAL LIFE brought forth by his eating that food which was poison to his paradisaical nature. Both these must, therefore, be removed; that is, a man must first totally DIE to self, and all earthly desires, views, and intentions, before he can be again in God as his nature and first creation require.

But now, if this be a certain and immutable truth, that man, so long as he is a selfish, earthly-minded creature, must be deprived of his true life, the life of God, the spirit of heaven in his soul, then how is the face of things changed!—for then, what life is so much to be dreaded, as a life of worldly ease and prosperity? What a misery, nay, what a curse is there in everything that gratifies and nourishes our self-love, self-esteem, and self-seeking? On the other hand, what happiness is there in all inward and outward troubles and vexations, when they force us to feel and know the hell that is hidden within us, and the vanity of everything without us, when they turn all our self-love into self-abhorrence, and force us to call upon God to save us from ourselves, to give us a new life, new light, and new spirit in Christ Jesus.—"O happy famine (might the poor prodigal have well said) which, by reducing me to the necessity of asking to eat husks with swine, brought me to my self, and caused my return to my first happiness in my father's house."

Now, I will suppose your distressed state to be as you represent it; inwardly, darkness, heaviness, and confusion of thoughts and passions; outwardly, ill-usage from friends, relations, and all the world; unable to strike up the least spark of light or comfort, by any thought, or reasoning of your own.—"O happy famine, which leaves you not so much as the husk of one human comfort to feed upon! For this is the time and place for all that good, and life, and salvation to happen to you which happened to the prodigal son. Your way is as short, and your success as certain as his was: you have no more to do than he had: you need not call out for books, or methods of devotion; for in your present state, much reading and borrowed prayers are not your best method: all that you are to offer to God, all that is to help you to find him to be your Saviour and Redeemer, is best taught and expressed by the distressed state of your heart.

Only let your present and past distress make you feel and acknowledge this twofold great truth; first, that in and of yourself, you are nothing but darkness, vanity, and misery; secondly, that of yourself, you can no more help yourself to light and comfort, than you can create an angel. People at all times can seem to assent to these two truths; but then it is an assent that has no depth or reality, and so is of little or no use: but your condition has opened your heart for a deep and full conviction of these truths. Now give way, I beseech you, to this conviction, and hold these two truths in the same degree of certainty, as you know two and two to be four, and then you are with the prodigal come to yourself; and above half your work is done.

Being now in the full possession of these two truths, feeling them in the same degree of certainty as you feel your own existence, you are, under this sensibility, to give up yourself absolutely and entirely to God in CHRIST JESUS, as into the hands of infinite love; firmly believing this great and infallible truth, that God has no will towards you but that of infinite love, and infinite desire to make you a partaker of his divine nature; and that it is as absolutely impossible for the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ to refuse all that good, and life, and salvation which you want, as it is for you to take it by your own power.

O DRINK DEEP OF THIS CUP, for the precious water of eternal life is in it. Turn unto God with this faith: CAST YOURSELF INTO THIS ABYSS OF LOVE; and then you will be in that state the prodigal was in, when he said, "I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son:"—and all that will be fulfilled in you, which is related of him.

For a beginning, then, make this the twofold exercise of your heart; now, bowing yourself down before God in the deepest sense, and acknowledgment of your own nothingness and vileness; then, looking up unto God in faith and love, consider him as always extending the arms of his mercy towards you, and full of an infinite desire to dwell in you, as he dwells in angels in heaven. Content yourself with this inward and simple exercise of your heart for a while; and seek, or like nothing in any book, but that which nourishes and strengthens this state of your heart.

"Come unto me," (says the holy Jesus) all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you." Here is more for you to live upon, more light for your mind, more of unction for your heart, than in volumes of human instruction. PICK UP THE WORDS OF THE HOLY JESUS, and beg of him to be the light and life of your soul; love the sound of his name; for JESUS is the love, the sweetness, the compassionate goodness of the DEITY itself; which became man, that so men might have power to become the sons of God. Love and pity, and wish well to every soul in the world; dwell in love, and then you dwell in God; hate nothing but the evil that stirs in your own heart.

Teach your heart this prayer, till your heart continually saith, though not with outward words, "O holy Jesus! meek Lamb of God! bread that came down from heaven! Light and life of all holy souls! help me to a true and living faith in Thee. O do Thou open Thyself within me, with all Thy holy nature, spirit, tempers, and inclinations, that I, being born again of Thee, may be in Thee a new creature, quickened and revived, led and governed by Thy Holy Spirit." Prayer so practised, becomes the life of the soul, and the true food of eternity.

Would you, for evermore, have done with error, scruple, and delusion? Consider the DEITY to be the greatest love, the greatest meekness, the greatest sweetness, the ETERNAL UNCHANGEABLE WILL TO BE A GOOD AND BLESSING TO EVERY CREATURE; and that all the misery, darkness, and death of fallen angels and fallen men, consist in their having lost their likeness to this Divine nature. Consider yourself, and all the fallen world, as having nothing to seek or wish for, but by the spirit of Prayer to draw into the life of your soul, rays and sparks of this divine, meek, loving, tender nature of God. Consider the holy Jesus as the gift of God to your soul, to begin and finish the birth of God and heaven within you, in spite of every inward or outward enemy.—These three infallible truths heartily embraced, and made the nourishment of your soul, shorten and secure the way to heaven, and leave no room for error, scruple, or delusion.

Do not expect or look for the same degrees of sensible fervor.—The matter lies not there.—Nature will have its share; but the ups and downs of that are to be overlooked. Whilst your will-spirit is good and set right, the changes of creaturely fervor, lesson not your union with God. It is the abyss of the heart, an unfathomable depth of eternity within us, as much above sensible fervor as heaven is above earth; it is this that works our way to God, and unites with heaven.—This abyss of the heart is the divine nature and power within us, which never calls upon God in vain, but whether helped or deserted by bodily fervor, penetrates through all outward nature, as easily and effectually as our thoughts can leave our bodies, and reach into the regions of eternity.

The poverty of our fallen nature, the depraved workings of flesh and blood, the corrupt tempers of our polluted birth in this world, do us no hurt, so long as the spirit of prayer works contrary to them, and reaches after the light and spirit of heaven. All our natural evil ceases to be our own evil as soon as our will-spirit turns from it: it then changes its nature, loses all its poison and death, and only becomes our holy cross, on which we happily die from self and this world into the kingdom of heaven.

When, therefore, it is the one ruling, never-ceasing desire of our hearts, that God may be the beginning and end, the reason and motive, of our doing or not doing, from morning to night; then everywhere, whether speaking or silent, whether inwardly or outwardly employed, we are equally offered up to the Eternal Spirit, have our life in him, and from him, and are united to him by that spirit of prayer, which is the comfort, the support, the strength, and security of the soul, travelling, by the help of God, through the vanity of time into the riches of eternity.

It is for the sake of the SPIRIT OF PRAYER, that I have endeavoured to set so many points of religion in such a view as must dispose the reader willingly to give up all that he is, and has, and inherits from his fallen father, to be all hunger and thirst after God, and have no thought or care, but how to be wholly his devoted instrument, everywhere, and in everything, his adoring, joyful, and thankful servant.—My friend, have your eyes shut, and ears stopped to everything that is not a step in that ladder that reaches from earth to heaven!

Reading is good, hearing is good, conversation and meditation are good; but then they are only good at times and occasions, in a certain degree, and must be used and governed with such caution, as we eat and drink, and refresh ourselves, or they will bring forth in us the fruits of intemperance. But the SPIRIT OF PRAYER is for all times, and all occasions; it is a lamp that is to be always burning, a light to be ever shining; everything calls for it, everything is to be done in it, and governed by it; because it is, and means, and wills nothing else, but the whole totality of the soul, not doing this or that, but wholly incessantly given up to God, to be where, and what, and how he pleases.

This state of absolute resignation, naked faith, and pure love of God, is the highest perfection, and most purified life of those who are born again from above, and through the Divine power are become sons of God: and it is neither more nor less than what our blessed Redeemer has called, and qualified us to aspire after in these words: Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.—It is to be sought for in the simplicity and fervor of a little child, without being captivated with any mysterious depths or heights of speculation; without coveting any knowledge, or wanting to see any ground of nature, grace, or creature, but so far as it brings us nearer to God, forces us to forget and renounce everything for Him; and to GIVE EVERY BREATHING, MOVING, STIRING, INTENTION, AND DESIRE OF OUR HEART, SOUL, SPIRIT, AND LIFE TO HIM."

The following letter is composed of extracts from a number of letters written from time to time to the same friend to whom the last letter was addressed. It may be considered as a general summary of spiritual instructions, suited to the varied trials and affecting circumstances of more advanced stages of the christian life. Indeed, taking the whole of these extracts together relating to the personal experience of Christianity, they would seem to embrace every information that can be required both for a right apprehension of the Holy Scriptures in their design and meaning, and the direct cultivation of the Divine life in the soul. In short we thereby get to a practical ground of understanding from whence the inspired penmen, and the redeemer of the world wrote and spoke:—*

“My dear friend,—Whom I heartily love in the unity of the spirit of Christ. I begin, as I did

* After the perusal of these and the other extracts herein presented to the reader's notice, what must be thought of the following account of Law by an eminent living writer, and great saleable book maker of the popular evangelical school? It is taken from a treatise containing directions for the study of divinity, in which the author professes to give a just and comprehensive, though brief description of all the chief protestant writers upon divinity. Of course his observations are regulated by the standard of his own so-considered evangelical views, formed as he admits, after the Calvin hypothetical school, (“a name and character of divinity, however, no more heard of in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, than that of the profound Aristotle, or the divine Cicero.”)

“William Law, who died in 1761, (he thus writes,) was a powerful writer. With a strong and vigorous intellect, he irresistibly maintains the claim of religion, and shows the inconsistencies of nominal christians, and urgently exhorts all men to a holy and devout life. But with his views of the reasonableness and necessity of a holy life, and his want of perception of those all-refreshing and comforting views of the Gospel, (!) which distinguish the Apostolical writings and the writings of the reformers, or at least keeping them, as he did, in the back ground, (!) it is not surprising that he fell into the reveries of Behmen, and ended in mysticism. (!) No strength of mind, no justness of conception as to the importance of practical holiness, can supply the lack of grace of the gospel. (!) He who knows us best, and how best to recover us to himself, has provided for us a high priest, touching with the feeling of our infirmities, and never can we be brought nigh to God but by Him who is the way, the truth, and the life.” (!!)

Will the reader of the preceding extracts believe that any man calling himself a divine and professing to instruct others in divinity, could have written such empty ignorant ~~stuff~~ as is contained in the above paragraph? Yet such is the true and appropriate character of Mr. Law as a theologian, given by the illuminated author of the “Christian Student;” and as his other descriptions of numerous erudite theologians of past times, whom he, unable to confute, lamentingly puts down in the non-evangelical class, are doubtless equally just,—of course his book is an invaluable treasure to all students who want to get at the ground of understanding whence the gospel was penned.—Well might Mr. Law in reference to such Babylonish ‘evangelical’ doctors in his day, with their lowing, unspecific hortations to something they have no clear perception of, exclaim, Babel is not a city, it is the whole christian world. “As to all these directors of divinity students, (said he,) no more folly need be laid to their charge than is done by our Lord in these words, Without me ye can do nothing: as my father sent me, so send I you: the Holy Spirit shall guide you into all truth. To all which the apostle subscribes in these words, Who hath made us able ministers, not of the letter, but of the Spirit.—Now put these words of Christ and his apostle, (he continues,) at the beginning and end of * * *, and then you will see that almost all that is betwixt them is empty babble, fitter for an old grammarian that was grown blear-eyed in mending dictionaries, than for one who had tasted the powers of the world to come, and had found the truth as it is in Jesus.”

Another illustration of the obliquity of understanding of the popular evangelical school, in respect to the true Christian theory, and of the stupid ignorance that prevails upon the nature of Mr. Law's consecutive writings, is afforded in the introductory essay, and the notes appended to a new edition of the “Serious Call,” published by Collins, Glasgow, 1827. Without admitting the philosophy of the author of the essay, which however he takes for granted as a matter of course, it may merely be observed of his remarks, (as of those of all others), touching the non-evangelical character of the “Serious Call,” that Mr. Law's works, (he being the baptist messenger of the last dispensation of ‘the Spirit,’) are representative, so to speak, of the entire constitution of Christianity, and of its several successive parts, the “Serious Call” being, accordingly, emblematical of the law and the personal teachings of Christ; and therefore, to complain of it, as not being evangelical in the highest sense, is just as absurd and groundless as to complain that the Law is not the Gospel. Everything that is built or planted by Divine wisdom is in its right place, and the not admitting, or rather not perceiving such a truth in respect to Law's works, can only be an additional proof of the dulness and stupidity of the self-elected critics of the prevailing system of divinity-doctrine.

But having now, and in the previous pages, sufficiently considered all the objections that can be offered to Mr. Law's writings, we conclude the subject with a few extracts from his latter pieces, in exposition of the Babylonish character of understanding, teaching, and preaching of his time; which will no doubt be found as appropriate and profitable to a certain class of individuals of our day, as the originals were to those for whom they were written.—Let the sincere reader, during the perusal of the extracts, but keep his eye upon the following three points, and, be he who he may, he cannot fail to derive his profit accordingly. The two first points consist of these questions, (1.) Am I one degree more divine, more penetrated, possessed, transformed, renewed, with the holy nature of God and Christ, than I was ten years ago, when I began to know and be a stickler for these ‘evangelical doctrines’ and opinions? (2.) If not, do I desire and intend to be born again, and become thoroughly a new creature, growing up in Christ? (3.) The third point is the following description of the nature and effects of true evangelical religion, and of its insidious opposite:—
“To live by faith, is to live with God in the spirit and power of prayer, in self-denial, in contempt of the world, in divine love, in heavenly foretastes of the world to come, in humility, in patience, long-suffering, obedience, resignation, absolute trust, and dependence upon God, with all that is temporal and earthly under their feet.”

“To live by reasoning, is to be a prey of the old serpent, eating dust with him, grovelling in the mire of all earthly passions, devoured with pride, imbibed with envy, tools and dupes, to our-

my last, with assuring you that I love to hear from you. Talk no more of obtruding upon me with your letters: everything that comes from you is welcome. Every creature has my love; but persons of your spirit, kindle in me every holy affection of honour and esteem towards them. Love with its fruits of meekness, patience, and humility, is all that I wish, for myself, and every human creature; for this is to live in God, united to him, both for time and eternity.

I am in some concern about the activity of your religious spirit, which I have often cautioned you against.—You have seen, and as I think deeply apprehended, the true ground on which man's redemption stands. This ground has been shewn you, not only from the plain letter of Scripture, but confirmed by the whole frame of Nature.

Every thing in heaven and earth, everything that you inwardly or outwardly feel, or know of your own soul and body, are all shewn to bear infallible witness to these two fundamental truths of the Gospel; that our first father died to his first life in God, and that nothing in the whole nature of things can be our redemption, but the first life of God, born again of God in the soul.—You have had the fullest proof that man was created in this high perfection of life. You have had the fullest proof that Adam had no other way of dying to heaven, or losing his first state in God, but by the working of his will; and that every son of Adam is to this day only that which his selves, tossed up with false hopes, cast down with vain fears, slaves to all the good and evil things of this world, to-day elated with learned praise, to-morrow dejected at the unlucky loss of it, yet jogging on year after year, defining words and ideas, dissecting doctrines and opinions, setting all arguments and all objections upon their best legs, sifting and refining all notions, conjectures, and criticisms, till death puts the same full end to all the wonders of the ideal fabric, that the cleansing broom does to the wonders of the spider's web, so artfully spun at the expense of its own vitals:

"This is the unalterable difference between a life of faith, and a life of reasoning in the things of God: the former is from God, works with God, and therefore it saveth, it maketh whole, and all things are possible to it; the latter is from the serpent, works with the serpent, and, therefore, vain opinions, false judgments, errors, and delusions are inseparable from it, and can only belong to it.

"Every scholar, every disputer of this world, nay, every man, has been where Eve was, and has done what she did, when she sought for wisdom that did not come from God. All libraries of the world are a full proof of the remaining power of the first sinful thirst after it: they are full of a knowledge that comes not from God, and therefore proceeds from that first fountain of subtlety that opened her eyes. For as there cannot possibly be any goodness in man, but so far as the Divine goodness is living and working good in them, so THERE CANNOT BE ANY DIVINE TRUTH, OR KNOWLEDGE IN MAN, but so far as GOD'S TRUTH AND KNOWLEDGE IS OPENED, LIVING AND WORKING IN HIM, because GOD ALONE IS ALL TRUTH, and the KNOWLEDGE OF IT."—Let the reader, we say, but have his eye upon these three points during the perusal of the extracts which are these immediately following, as well as in reference to what have been presented in the preceding pages, and the results cannot fail to be both edifying and acceptable to him:—

"We have committed two evils (saith the prophet), we have forsaken the fountain of living water, and hewed out to ourselves broken cisterns that can hold no water. Now, when, or how may we be said to have forsaken the fountain of living water? It is when we expect or seek for good in anything, but that which God is and does by his own word, LIGHT, and SPIRIT within us.—Look after anything but this, have any trust in, or dependence upon anything else but this Divine operation, and then be as full of religious zeal as you will, you have forsaken the fountain of living water. Collect, divide, distinguish, and new model all doctrines, notions, and opinions, as nicely as ever you can, you are only making a new-fashioned cracked cistern, that can hold no living water in it.—What is the reason that sin and wickedness overflow, like a flood, the whole Christian world? It is because popish and protestant churches have been, age after age, wholly taken up in hewing out of the Gospel-rock their several opinion-cisterns. The pope has his infallibility, and therefore his cisterns can have no failure, or crack in them. Protestants have a Luther, a Calvin, an Arminius, a Beza, a Socinus, a Zinzendorf, etc. And if their cisterns are free from cracks, it is because they can all turn to the letter of Scripture, and find plenty of cement to patch and strengthen them. What infallibility does in popish, that criticism does in protestant countries; and so (sad truth!) the ONE FOUNTAIN of living water is everywhere forsaken, and quite out of date. What wonder, then, if Christianity is but an empty name, a number of fond opinions about Christ and his atonement, justification and sanctification, instead of the LIFE AND POWER OF GOD, BORN, DWELLING, AND MANIFESTED IN OUR FALLEN NATURE.—And here let me tell you, that all that you see, or hear, or read, of the best notions, truths, or doctrines, whilst you place anything in them, as considered in themselves, are to you only broken cisterns, that afford you no water of life. Eugenius said one day, how charmed he was at first with the [blessed soul-saving] doctrines of the spiritual life, [the atonement, the 'blood of Christ'] and the new birth; but that now, after some years, striving to be good by the knowledge of such things, [and sitting under a gospel ministry, and uniting with a gospel people,] he found himself to be in reality but just where he was before he knew anything of them!—But did any one ever tell Eugenius that these doctrines were the fountain of living water; and that by drinking of them he would have eternal life?—How good are these words of Christ, unless a man be born again from above, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God! But how useless are they to him, who is not thereby turned to seek [with all earnestness to be born again,] and to expect it all from God! How good is it to know that abyss of death, into which our father Adam has plunged us; but how unprofitable is this knowledge, unless it turns our hearts into one continual hunger and thirst after that essential operation of the divine nature in us which lived in Adam before he fell!—All Scripture doctrines, whether of life or death, however "evangelical" and "soul-saving" they may be considered, are nothing in themselves, nor have any power of godliness in them; but are only to show us, again and again, this overlooked great truth, that the turning our minds from God, into whatever it be, is the death of deaths; and the cleaving wholly and solely to God, as manifested within our souls, is eternal life. * * "

"But, to sum up the subject. There are but two spirits that govern every rational and intelligent life. The one is the Spirit of God, the other is the spirit that is fallen from God, and works faith, or the working of his will, or the desire of his heart, (for they are all the same thing,) maketh him to be.—Jesus Christ is the Divine nature, which must be alive again in man. But the life of the Deity can only arise by a birth in us, by the hunger and faith and desire of the heart, or the working of the will turned to it: and this is the faith in Christ that does all.

To what purpose, therefore, is so much anxious enquiry about this or that? Why this running after every one, to hear the history of himself, and the secrets of his own fancied experience? Had you less knowledge than you have of the Divine life, it would be sufficient to shew you that all that the best of men and books can do for us, is to lead us from ourselves to God. * *

To be always tampering with physicians, upon every occasion, is the way to lose all natural soundness of health; and to be continually talking and enquiring about the nature of distempers, and the powers of medicines, for the head, the heart, the spirits, and nerves, is the way to lose all true judgment, either of our own sickness or health.

It is much the same with regard to our spiritual health and constitution: we do much hurt to it by running after spiritual advice on every occasion, and wanting the help of some human prescription for every fear, scruple, or notion that starts up in our minds, and so weaken the true strength of our spiritual constitution, which, if left to itself, would do all that we want to have done.

X contrary to him.—Nothing is good in any creature, but because the good Spirit of God is the doer of it; nothing is evil, but that which is done by the spirit of the creature fallen off from God, and working in self-will.—Here you have the infallible touch-stone for the trial of all spirits, which never can deceive you. Every spirit that calls you to be delivered from anything, but the evil that is in your own spirit, or that turns you to anything, as a deliverance from it, but to the spirit and power of God, within you, is not of God, but is an agent under the spirit that is fallen off from God.

The Christian religion has no ground or foundation, but because the spirit of man has lost its first state of union with God, and is unable of itself to recover it. Hence it is, that Christ, God and man united, is the one only possible restorer of man's first union with God. Therefore, the whole of our redemption consists in our being made one with Christ, essentially born of him, that having his whole redeeming nature come to life in us, we may be in him, as he is in God, one Spirit, one life to all eternity.—God was in Christ Jesus, saith Paul, reconciling the world to himself. But Christ was the reconciler between God and man, only and solely by that which he was, did, suffered, and obtained by and through his whole process. This is his mediation-work. Are you in this process, you are in the arms of your Mediator; his mediation-work is like a new creation within you, and what God saw in his beloved Son, that he sees in you; and you must belong to God, as he does, because Christ is born in him; but the seed of Christ, which is in every son of Adam, never comes to the fulness of the birth of the new creature, but through the process of Christ. This is the one strait gate, and narrow way, out of which there is nothing but sin, death, and hell to every man.—Without Christ we are without God; but who is without Christ is told you, in the following words, unless a man deny himself, take up his cross, etc., and follow me, he cannot be my disciple. This is the one term of union with Christ. * *

"He that followeth not me, saith Christ, walketh in darkness, that is, all is in vain without my process: for Christ is that which his process is. St. Paul saith, No one can call Jesus, Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. In these two short texts, are contained the whole nature and substance of Christian redemption, namely, that it all consists in the process of Christ, and the coming of the Holy Ghost. Christ's process in the flesh is the one only way of dying to all that fleshly evil, that Adam brought to life in us; Christ, come in the spirit, is the one only quickening of that divine life to which Adam died. Trust to anything else, seek to anything else, but this process of Christ, and this power of the Holy Ghost, and then all your leaning upon the Gospel will be no better than leaning upon a broken reed.—These two fundamental truths plainly shew, why the first preaching of the Gospel began, and must ever go on, saying nothing but what is implied in these words, "repent, for the kingdom of God is at hand." Repent, shews the necessity of making Christ's process the one way to the kingdom of God; for repentance-works are in his process and no where else. For the kingdom of God is at hand, shews that Christ's coming in the Spirit is the one thing sought for by his process: for the kingdom of God come among men is nothing else but Christ come in the power of the Spirit: and where this power is not come in the likeness of a kingdom, the kingdom of God is yet afar off.

The Law ended with Christ come in the flesh: his process was the fulfilling of all its types, figures, and sacrifices.

The coming of Christ in the Spirit is just the same one only fulfilling of all the Gospel dispensation.—And as the Law would have been all in vain, without Christ's coming in the flesh; so would the Gospel also, without Christ's coming in the Spirit. And the Jew with his Old Testament, rejecting Christ come in the flesh, is just as true to the Law, as the Christian is to the Gospel, who does not own Christ as come in the Spirit to be the one only fulfilling of all its doctrines.—For as all the types, figures, and sacrifices of the law were in themselves, but empty shadows, without Christ being the life of them, so all things written in the Gospel are but dead letters, till Christ coming in the Spirit quickens a new creature to be the reader, the rememberer, and doer of them.—Therefore, where the Holy Spirit is not sought after, trusted to, and rested in, as the end, the substance, and living power of the whole Gospel, it is no marvel, that Christians, high and low, learned or unlearned, churchman or dissenter, should have no more of burning and shining Gospel virtues, than the Jews have of patriarchal holiness; or that the same lusts, vices, and worldly craft which prosper among apostate Jews, should break forth with as much strength in a fallen Christendom.

See here then your work, ye evangelical divines, preachers and book-makers, if God has sent you, and inspired your writings, you can have no other errand but that on which Christ sent his apostles.—Do you preach and teach anything but the process of Christ, as the way to the kingdom of God, or call men to any power of walking in it, but that of the Holy Spirit, you are strangers to, or deserters from "the truth as it is in Jesus," for neither Christ, nor his apostles, ever

If it be asked, What is this soundness of our spiritual constitution? It may be answered, that it is a state or habit of such humble total resignation of ourselves to God, as by faith and prayer, expects all from him alone. This is the health and strength of our spiritual constitution, and nothing is health in the soul but this state.—And if we left all our incidental, accidental, sickly notions and imaginations that so frequently attack our minds, if we left them to be overcome and done away by the strength of our spiritual constitution, [N.B.] we should never fail of success. * *

There is nothing more plain and simple than the way of religion, if self is but kept out of it; and all the perplexities and scruples which pious persons meet with, chiefly arise from some idea they have formed of a progress they ought to make, in order to be that which self would be. But piety makes little progress till it has no schemes of its own, no thoughts or contrivances to be anything but a naked penitent, looking wholly and solely in faith and prayer to the divine goodness. Every contrivance for human help, from this or that, be it what it will, at best, is but dropping some degree of that fulness of faith, and hope, and dependence upon God, which only is and only can be, our way of finding him to be the strength and God of our life. * *

I know not, myself, how to write to the most illuminated person upon earth for advice, or instruction. And the more dark and distressed my state should be, the more I should be averse to seek counsel of any creature; not from an opinion of any sufficiency in myself, but from a fulness taught anything else but this.—The old man must die, or the new man can never be made alive in Christ. But nothing brings death upon the old man, but that one self-denying process of Christ; nothing gives life to the new-man, but the one spirit of Christ born in it. This is the Gospel language from the beginning to the end.

With this language in your mouths, the whole Gospel is with you; you may cry aloud and spare not; be as zealous here as you will or can; go out into the streets and lanes, the highways and hedges, compel hypocrites, sensualists, worldlings, and hardened sinners to tremble at their ways, to dread everything that is contrary to Christ's salvation-process; preach and declare certain damnation to every sinful lust of the flesh, and no possible power to be delivered from it, BUT BY CHRIST COMING IN THE SPIRIT, to set up his own kingdom of God within you; and then every one who has the least spark of goodness living in his soul, will call you the sent of God, will wish prosperity to all your labours of love; and no one will be against you, but he that is not with Christ.

But if you come forth with the new-fangled un-gospel doctrines of a Calvin, a Luther, a Zuin-glius, or some smaller name, [and write books upon all sorts of divinity-learning, but the one only subject of the whole Gospel,] be your zeal as great as it will, it only unites you with the brick and mortar-builders of that anti-christian Babel, which the prince of the power of the air has set up, in full opposition to that rock, on which Christ has built his one Catholic, universal salvation-church."

Concerning the power and effects of the new birth, and that national church orthodoxy which denies the doctrine of Christian perfection, or the attainment of a perfect Christ-like holiness of life, Mr. Law thus writes:—

"Our Lord has told us this absolute truth, that unless we be born again from above, there is no possible entrance into the kingdom of God. What this new birth is in us, and what we get by it, is as expressly told us by his beloved apostle, saying, that which is born of God sinneth not. And therefore he who is yet the subject or servant of sin, is not yet born of God.—To what end do we pray, that this day we may fall into no sin, if no such day can be had? But if sinning can be made to cease in us for one day, what can do this for us, but that which can do the same to-morrow? What benefit in praying, that God's will may be done on earth, as it is in heaven, if the earth, as long as it lasts, must have as many sinners, as it has men upon it? How vainly does the church pray for the baptised person, that he may have power and strength to have victory, and to triumph against the devil, the world, and the flesh, if this victorious triumph can never be obtained; if, notwithstanding this baptism and prayer, he must continue committing sin, and so be a servant of sin as long as he lives! What sense can there be in making a communion of saints to be an article of our creed, if, at the same time, we are to believe that Christians, as long as they live, must, in some degree or other, follow, and be led by the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life?

Whence, now, comes all this folly of doctrines? It is because the church is no longer that spiritual house of God, in which NOTHING IS INTENDED AND SOUGHT AFTER BUT SPIRITUAL POWER AND SPIRITUAL LIFE; but is become a mere human building, made up of worldly power, worldly learning, and worldly prosperity in Gospel matters. And therefore, all the frailties, follies, and imperfections in human nature must have as much life in the church, as in any other human society. And the best sons of such a church must be forced to plead such imperfections in the members of it, as must be where the old fallen human nature is still alive.—And alive it there must be, and its life defended, where the being continually moved and led by the Spirit of God, is rejected as mystic enthusiasm. For nothing but a full birth and continual breathing and inspiration of the Holy Spirit in the new born creature, can be a deliverance from all that which is earthly, sensual, and devilish in our fallen nature.—This new creature, born again in Christ, of that ETERNAL WORD which created all things in heaven and on earth, is both the rock and church, of which Christ says, the gates of hell shall never prevail against it. For prevail they will, and must against every thing but the new creature.—And every fallen man, be he where he will, or who he will, is yet in his fallen state, and his whole life is a mere Egyptian bondage, and Babylonian captivity, till the heavenly church, or new birth from above, has taken him out of it.

See how St. Paul sets forth the salvation-church, as being nothing else, and doing nothing else, but merely as the mother of this new birth. Know ye not, says he, that so many of us as were baptised into Jesus Christ, were baptised into his death? Therefore we are buried with him, by baptism, into death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.—Here we have the one true church infallibly described, and yet no other church but the new creature. He goes on, For if we have been planted together, in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Therefore to be in Christ, or in his church, belongs to no one, but because the old man is put off, and the new creature risen of conviction, that I run away from relief, and deprive myself of true light and comfort by not seeking and depending upon GOD ALONE for it.

ALL MY WRITINGS HAVE NO OTHER END, BUT TO COMMUNICATE THIS CONVICTION TO MY READERS; and consequently to teach them to have done with me, as soon as I have convinced them, that God, and Christ, and the kingdom of heaven, are only to be found by man in his own heart, and only capable of being found there, by his own love of them, faith in them, and absolute dependence upon them.

What room, therefore, for calling out for help and direction, when once it is known, that all consists in an implicit blind faith, in purity of love, and total resignation to the Spirit of God? For where can these be exercised, but in the states and trials through which human life must pass.

And to acquiesce in God when things are inwardly and outwardly easy with us, but to cast about for help from something that is not God, when distress and darkness come upon us, is the error of errors, and the greatest hindrance to our true union with God in CHRIST JESUS. * *

As to the variety of trials you have lately met with, they are but a specimen of what you are to expect, in some form or other, so long as you breathe the air of this fallen world. The longer we are without them, the more our need of them is increased. And they never give great smart, but where something is to be torn off that sticks too close to us.—One reflection upon these sacred words, My kingdom is not of this world—the Son of man hath not where to lay his head, is suffi-in Christ is put on. The same thing is said again in these words, Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that (N.B.) HENCEFORTH we should not serve sin; therefore the true church is nowhere but in the new creature, that henceforth sinneth not, nor is any longer a servant to sin.—Away, then, with all the tedious volumes of church unity, church power, and church salvation. Ask neither a council of Trent, nor a synod of Dort, nor an assembly of divines, for a definition of 'the church.' The apostle has given you, not a definition, but the unchangeable nature of it in these words, But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. Therefore to be in the true salvation-church, and to be in Christ that new creature which sinneth not, is strictly the same thing.

Should it here be asked, To what society of Christians, or where a man must go who would be a living member of the church? It is answered, he need not go any where; because in whatever communion he is, that which is to save him, and that which he is to be saved from, is always with him.—SELF, (as just observed,) is all the evil that he has, and God is all the goodness that he ever can have; but self is always with him, and God is always with him. Death to self is his only entrance into the church of life, and nothing but God can give death to self.—Self is an inward life, and God is an inward spirit of life; therefore NOTHING KILLS that which MUST BE KILLED IN US, OR QUICKENS that which MUST COME TO LIFE IN US, BUT THE INWARD WORK OF GOD IN THE SOUL, AND THE INWARD WORK OF THE SOUL IN GOD.—This is that mystic religion, which though it has nothing in it but that same spirit, that same truth, and that same life which always was, and always must be the religion of all God's holy angels and saints in heaven, is by the popular theology and evangelical wisdom of this day accounted to be Behmenish phantasy, and rank enthusiasm."

Again, he thus writes, concerning the one thing needful:—

"My little children, says St. Paul, of whom I travail again in birth, till Christ be formed in you. This is the whole labour of an apostle to the end of the world. He has nothing to preach to sinners, but the absolute necessity, the true way, and the certain means of being 'born again from above.'—But if dropping this one thing only necessary, and only available, he becomes a reformer of words and opinions, helping Christians to be saved by different notions of faith, works, justification, etc., he has forgot his errand, and is become a blind leader of all who are blind enough to follow him.—For all that is called faith, works, justification, sanctification, election, etc., are only so many different expressions of that which the restored divine life is and does in us, and have no existence anywhere, or in anything, but the new creature. And the reason why everything that is or can be good in us, or to us, is nothing else but this divine birth from above, is because the divine nature, dead in Adam, was his entire loss of every divine virtue, and his whole fall under the power of this world, the flesh, and the devil; and therefore the divine nature, brought again to life in man, is his faith, his hope, his prayer, his works, his justification, sanctification, election, or salvation. * *

God's mark of an universal salvation set upon all mankind, was first given in these words, the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent; therefore, wherever the serpent is, there his head is to be bruised. This was God's infallible assurance, or omnipotent promise, that all that died in Adam should have its first birth of glory again.—The eternal Son of God came into the world only for the sake of this new-birth, to give God the glory of restoring it to all the dead sons of fallen Adam. All the mysteries of this incarnate, suffering, dying Son of God, all the price that he paid for our redemption, all the washings that we have from his all-cleansing blood poured out for us, all the life that we receive from eating his flesh, and drinking his blood, have their infinite value, their high glory, and amazing greatness in this, because nothing less than these supernatural mysteries of a GOD-MAN could raise that new creature out of Adam's death, which could be again a living temple and defiled habitation of the Spirit of God:

That this new birth of the Spirit, or the Divine life in man, was the truth, the substance, and sole end of his miraculous mysteries, is plainly told us by Christ himself, who at the end of all his process on earth, tells his disciples, what was to be the blessed and full effect of it, namely, that the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, (being now fully purchased for them,) should after his ascension come in the stead of a Christ in the flesh.—"If I go not away, (says he,) the Comforter will not come, but if I go away, I will send him unto you; and he shall guide you into all truth." Therefore all that Christ was, did, suffered, dying in the flesh, and ascending into heaven, was for this sole end, to purchase for all his followers a new birth, new life, and new light, in and by the Spirit of God, restored to them, and living in them, as their support, comforter, and guide, into all truth. And this was his, Lo, I AM WITH YOU ALWAYS, EVEN UNTO THE END OF THE WORLD." [See p. 9 (d).]

cient to take not only the sting out of every cross, that can here befall us, but even to make us afraid and ashamed of being pleased with anything, that has the name of worldly honour and prosperity. * *

Reflect not upon your predominant complexion, or how long it will be before you get from under its power.—St. Paul wanted to be delivered from his thorn in the flesh. He had all he prayed for, though the thorn might continue, when God said to him, My grace is sufficient for thee: this was better to him, than if his thorn had been taken from him. This enabled him to say, I will glory in my infirmities, for when I am weak, then I am strong.—So in your own case; whilst you look at yourself, at the power of time, or anything that this or that complexion does, you may indeed be afraid of everything; but look at GOD, as him that is to do all for you, and in you, and then you need be afraid of nothing. A thorn, or no thorn, bad or good blood, with all its effects, lose all their difference, as soon as you know that you are not your own, nor left to yourself, nor where to seek a physician that will not leave you unhealed.

We know that all things must work together for good to them that love God. Now, what signifies what the things are, if we are to have the same good from them, be they what they will? Let complexion show itself, let the dead ashes of old sins seem to be ready to come to life again, what is all this, but helping you to be more alive unto God? Flesh will be flesh as long as we live, but every state of the flesh may help us to grow in the Spirit.—Therefore “rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks.” * *

You believe that if it were not for earnest and continual prayer, your turn to melancholy would get the better of you. You cannot believe this too much, for nothing else can preserve you from being led away by every other evil temper. But let resignation to God be the predominant part of your spirit of prayer; for it is that which keeps the heart in the highest union with him.—Faith, and hope, and love, work their highest work, when resignation is the salt wherewith they are seasoned. * *

You have a scruple about the wondrous lives of the fathers in the deserts, because in such contrariety to his character who went about doing good. But if you only consider what you have said of them yourself, that the reading of their lives struck you with the deepest devotion, and made you think what a novitiate you were in DIVINE LOVE, you would have reason enough to place them amongst the faithful and true disciples of him, who went about doing good. For what greater good than to do that to others, for so many ages, which they have done for you?—They are not written to raise an emulation in you to copy after them; nor is there any reason to think that their story is not much exaggerated.—But be that as it will, it is certain they were the salt of the world for that time, and that the good providence of God blessed his church with them.

They are not for you to read, but as it were en passant, or for a little change of air, and their particularity of life no more concerns you than that of John the Baptist.

God's last dispensation to the world is the opening the ground and mystery of all things, to which every blindness, and vanity, and strife of human life must, sooner or later, be forced to give up itself.—The children of this dispensation have no occasion to look backwards. It is like learning your A B C, when you are called and qualified to read. * *

Be not too eager about much reading. Nor read anything but that which nourishes, strengthens, and establishes this faith in you, of an inward Saviour, who is the life of your soul. To grow up in this faith is taking the best means of attaining to the best knowledge in all divine matters.

In a word, cast away all reflections about yourself, the world, or your past life. And let all be swallowed up, or lost in this joyful thought, that you have found the Messiah, the Saviour of the world, not in books, not in history, but in the birth and bottom of your own soul! Give yourself up to this birth of heaven within you; expect all from it; let it be the humble, faithful, earnest, longing desire of your heart; and desire no knowledge but that which is born of it, and proceeds from it.—Stand only in this thirst of knowledge, and then all that you know will be spirit and life.

Near the conclusion of yours, you say you have, of late, met with many trials disagreeable to flesh and blood, but that adhering to God is always your blessed relief. Yet permit me to transcribe a memorandum or two from an old scrap of paper, which has long lain by me for my own use:—

“1.—Receive every inward and outward trouble, every disappointment, pain, uneasiness, darkness, temptation, and desolation, with both thy hands, as a true opportunity, and blessed occasion of dying to self, and entering into a fuller fellowship with thy self-denying, suffering Saviour.

“2.—Look at no inward or outward trouble in any other view; reject every other thought about it; and then every kind of trial and distress will become the blessed day of thy prosperity.

“3.—Be afraid of seeking or finding comfort in anything but God alone. For that which gives thee comfort takes so much of thy heart from God. ‘Quid est cor purum? Cui ex toto, est pure sufficit solus Deus, cui nihil sapit, quod nihil delectat, nisi Deus.’ That is, What constitutes a pure heart? One to which God alone is sufficient; to which nothing relishes, or gives delight, but God alone.

“4.—That state is best, which exerciseth the highest faith in, and fullest resignation to, God.

“5.—What is it you want and seek, but that God may be all in all in you? But how can this be, unless all creaturely goods and evils become as nothing in you or to you?

“Oh anima mea, abstrahere te ab omnibus. Quid tibi cum mutabilibus creaturis? Solium sponsum tuum, qui omnium est author creaturarum, expectans, hoc age, ut cor tuum ille liberum et expeditum semper inveniat, quoties illi ad ipsum venire placuerit.” That is, O my soul! withdraw thyself from all things. What hast thou to do with changeable creatures? Waiting and expecting thy bridegroom, who is the author of all creatures, let it be thy only care, that he may find thy heart free and disengaged, as often as it shall please him to visit thee.”—

I have formerly given away many of the lives of good Armelle, Frère Laurence, Chantal, and Lopez, so can have no dislike to your doing the same. I have often wished for some or several little things of that kind, though more according to my mind, by which the meanest capacities might, in an easy regular manner, be led into the heart and spirit of religion.—Dear Soul, Adieu.”

“P.S.—I thank you for your kind offer about the manuscript in the sale, but have no curiosity that way. I have had all that I can have from books. I leave the rest to God.—My mind has, for many years, turned from, or rather passed by every religious matter that requires critical abilities, or that carries me to any help but that which is to be found within me.—And all that I seek, or mean, either for myself or others, by every height and depth of divine knowledge given us by God, in his illuminated BEHMMEN, is only for this end, that we may be more willing and glad to become such little children, as our Lord has told us are the only heirs of the kingdom of God.

The piercing critic may, and naturally will grow in pride, as fast as his skill in words discovers itself. And every kind of knowledge that shows the scholar, the disputer, the commentator, the historian, his own powers and abilities, are the same temptation to him that Eve had from the serpent; and he will get no more good by the love and relish of such knowledge, than she got by her love of the tree that was so desirable to make one wise.

But he whose eyes are opened to see into this mystery of all things,* sees nothing but death to

* The following PROPOSITIONS are founded upon the eternal principles revealed in the writings of BEHMMEN, and are here inserted, as a further illustration of the advantages which a profound knowledge of theosophy affords for the interpretation of the mind of the Spirit, as couched in the profundities of Scripture. The subject of them has been selected from that portion of Scripture, which is generally considered most mysterious, and difficult of comprehension. How far the author has succeeded in producing a solid and uniform ground of understanding, must be left to the enlightened regenerate reader to decide. Some of the terms made use of are, perhaps, not so purely classic as those which Mr. Law would have employed in such an exercise, nevertheless the principles themselves are, with respect to their object, correctly laid down, and applied:—

I.—There is a mystical and magical sense of the Revelations of St. John, as well as a literal and ecclesiastical sense.

II.—It is called mystical, as it relates to the hidden MYSTERY OF GOD IN THE SOUL: and it is called magical as it relates to the KNOWING AND SETTING ON WORK THE FORMS OF [ITS] NATURE BY THE HOLY GHOST.

III.—Which sense is not penetrable by human reason, but only by the divine Spirit in man.

IV.—This divine Spirit is universal, and subsists in every man; but is in many, not only obstructed, but even perfectly hidden.

V.—The cause of this obstruction and hiding is the aversion of the will of man from the will of God; and the removal thereof is therefore the conversion of that will into this.

VI.—The conversion of the will of man into the will of God is not instantaneous, but by a gradual process.

VII.—This process is made through all the forms of nature, and through all the divine spirits or divine forms.

VIII.—These forms of nature, and these spirits of God, are seven; which natural and divine Septenary is a manifestation of the Trinity, as the Trinity is of the Unity.

IX.—This manifestation of the divine ternary, or Trinity, in the septenary, both natural and divine, or in nature and grace, is from the Centre, which is the quaternary.

X.—The divine Quarternary is the number of the New Jerusalem (therefore represented as four square), or of the angelical world; which is the divine bride, and the mother of all that are regenerated after the spirit angelically. Rev. xxi. 2; Gal. iv. 26.

XI.—In every human soul this quaternary, or Centre, is to be found, as standing in the midst, betwixt the two principles of darkness and light; and from thence begins the manifestation of the Spirit in light.

XII.—This manifestation, or emanation of the Spirit of the soul in light, is made in the blessed quinary, or the holy fifth number of Christ JESUS, who is the light of the world.

XIII.—The Quinary reveals the souls under the altar, receiving from God their white virgin robes; but who are not yet perfected, and therefore are to wait for a little season.

XIV.—The altar is the Cross. The souls under the altar, are the souls under the cross, or those that are crucified with Jesus: these having passed the mystic death in the fourth central number, where the light is generated from the cross, begin to arise in the next holy number, till at length they attain the Sabbath of their rest in the seventh; in which the divine Spirit is fully manifested, and the soul fully perfected.

XV.—The soul's perfection is in the full manifestation of the divine Spirit in every form and property thereof, through a real formation and generation of Christ within the same, as the true life and light of the soul.

XVI.—Every human soul is a spiritual substance, having just seven forms, neither more nor less, for the imaging forth therein of the divine nature in Trinity; and when all these are perfected, then is the triune image perfectly restored, and the kingdom of heaven made manifest in the soul.

XVII.—The seven seals are the seven forms of nature in the soul; and are the seven spirits which belong to the Father, as considered without the Son, that is, to the power of God in his anger and severity.

XVIII.—As the seven seals represent the Father's nature, thus considered; so the seven candlesticks represent the Son's nature.

XIX.—The soul being sealed up in the justice of God, under the seven seals, there is none able to break open these seals, and to enkindle light in the soul, which may overcome death, but the LAMB that was slain, and is alive.

XX.—As the seals obstruct the manifestation of Christ's kingdom in the soul, and in the church; so the opening of them by the Lamb is the revelation of his kingdom, and of the angelical world, which cannot be without his generating the soul in, and through himself, into the light.

XXI.—The new generation of the soul is a passing out of darkness into light, through the power of the Lamb raising up himself therein, and redeeming it from the wrathful source of nature, in its dark and fiery properties.

XXII.—This internal resurrection and redemption brings the spirit of the soul through all the seals of nature, into the very substantiality of Christ's universal body, the principle and centre of light eternal, where Wisdom reigns in the wonders of God.

XXIII.—The regenerated spirit draws after it the soul, and that also draws the body, without which it cannot be perfected, and so the soul is clothed upon with the heavenly body of the inward Christ.

himself, and to everything that he had called, or delighted in as his own. This is the bold depth of his knowledge.—And if you would know its aspiring height, it consists in learning to know that which the angels and twenty-four elders about the throne of God knew, when they cast down their crowns before him that sat on the throne, saying, "HOLY, HOLY, HOLY, LORD GOD ALMIGHTY, XXIV.—This inward Christ, or CHRIST FORMED WITHIN, is the new creature, and is one with Jesus Christ, sitting in the heavenly places, at the right hand of the Father, being spirit of his spirit, and flesh of his flesh.

XXV.—Thus the saints are one body in him, and he is this body in God: they enter into his humanity, and he becomes man in them.

XXVI.—By this new generation, or New Birth, of spirit, soul, and body, is the new man perfected in Christ, and reigns with Christ, in the new garment of his body, completely put on by virtue of the seventh seal broken up in the Lamb's nature.

XXVII.—The seventh seal opened, shows the holy temple of God, in which are the seven candlesticks, or the seven lights of Christ in the soul.

XXVIII.—The two apocalyptic seas, which are the fountains and seats of two contrary principalities, are the seventh seal, considered either as shut or opened.

XXIX.—The seventh seal considered as shut, is the fountain and seat of the antichristian beast, arising out of the sea of corrupt nature; or the properties and forms of nature in their impure state.

XXX.—The seventh seal opened, is the fountain and seat of the peaceable lamb-like kingdom; and the throne of Christ in the soul, as standing upon the sea of uncorrupt nature; or the properties and forms of nature in their pure state, and fully harmonized.

XXXI.—The glassy sea is the seventh spirit of the eternal incorruptible nature, in which is the joy and delight of the divine Majesty; wherein the blessed Trinity triumphantly manifests itself, and beholds the true angelical world, with the holy harpers of God.

XXXII.—This sea is the 'water-stone,' and the 'water-spirit' of the wise; it is the very substance and corporiety of the Divine nature, in eternal nature, and compaction of all the eternal divine powers, properties, and forms: and herein are the burning lamps of love revealed, which are the seven spirits of the Lamb.

XXXIII.—The conquerors that stand upon this sea, are such as in whom all the seven seals have been broken up, all the seven holy lights of Christ have been unsealed, and all the angelical thunders have been heard to utter their voices; whereby there is such a perfect conversion gradually wrought out of the human will into the Divine will, as they being fully passive to every Divine influence and motion in the harmony of the angelical world, are made as it were the harps of God.

XXXIV.—The process of this conversion and transportation is through the mystical death and annihilation: which is comprehended under the seven seals, being only consummated under the seventh, or last.

XXXV.—The process of the mystical death properly consists in a sevenfold purification and refining, according to the number and order of the seals. Yet chiefly herein are the four first concerned.

XXXVI.—The process of the mystic resurrection, and the first resurrection, (which follows immediately hereupon) and of the manifestation of it, is to be looked for under the mystery of the seven thunders.

XXXVII.—The ladder of mystical ascension, which is a true manuduction to the Divine Magia, is set forth according to the gates of the New Jerusalem, which are supposed successive.

XXXVIII.—The glorification, or descension, is the New Jerusalem itself, that is, such a state actually introduced into the soul, as may answer to the pattern of that city descending from GOD, in a full consummation of the Divine nuptials.

XXXIX.—In this consummation of the nuptials betwixt Christ and the soul, the true Divine Magia breaks forth, by the soul's unipoteney with him; whereby nature's secret forms are set on work from the Holy Ghost. [ union and communion in the Divine power.]

XL.—The angels of the Revelations are the angels of time, being consummated after this manner: who are all Divine magi in the power of the Holy Ghost; and the anointed priests of the third and highest order, which is called the order of Melchisedeck."

Also, would the reader desire a very ingenious, learned, and edifying book of meditation, composed purely on theosophic principles, he is recommended to the perusal of a treatise in the French language, entitled "Mystère de la Croix, affligeante et consolante, mortifiante et vivifiante, humiliante et triomphante, de Jesus Christ et de ses membres: Ecrit au milieu de la Croix, au dedans et au dehors: Par un Disciple de la Croix de Jesus: Achevé le 12 d'Aout, 1732: Etant composé dans la solitude de Sommerstein."—The date of the publication is 1786, but neither town or printer is given. The first chapter, "de l'Origine de la Croix," is the foundation of all the rest, and contains a very profound theosophical, though familiar explanation of the eternal birth of the cross, according as shown in the first answer of Behmen's "Forty Questions." The author must have been a deeply experienced Christian and learned man, as well as a master of the science of mystical divinity.

As we have endeavoured, heretofore, to illustrate the advantages of a profound knowledge of the philosophy of eternal nature, (as well as the right and only mode of its attainment) contained in the writings of BEHMEN,—[whose mind was the pre-ordained place, time, limit, or point of Eternity wherein the Divine wisdom, with the pregnant wonders or 'counsel of its will,' was to be opened and revealed to mankind—] in regard to the interpretation of nature and natural objects, and the mysteries of Scripture, both popularly and mystically; it might not be inappropriate, ere we conclude the present section, to give an elucidation of those fundamental principles in their application to subjects of moral science: for as the ground of universal philosophy, they must necessarily embrace all natural sciences. But not to prolong this section any further, we must refer the reader, for that purpose, to the 'Letters,' and other writings of Tryon, a celebrated practical philosopher, philanthropist, and physician, who lived at the close of the seventeenth century, and who wrote all his treatises upon the principles set forth in Behmen's writings.

THOU ART WORTHY TO RECEIVE GLORY, AND HONOR, AND POWER; FOR THOU HAST CREATED ALL THINGS; AND FOR THY PLEASURE THEY ARE AND WERE CREATED!"—It is to know that the triune majesty of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are the threefold power, life, glory, and perfection of every creature that sings praises to God in heaven and on earth. This is the proud knowledge of those who are let into the holy of holies, opened by the Spirit of God in his chosen instrument, BEH-MEN!—Which goes no deeper than to see the nothingness of man; ascends no higher than to know that God is ALL; which begets nothing in man, but that which was begotten in Paul, when he cried out, "God forbid, that I should glory in anything, but THE CROSS OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST."

We have repeatedly spoken of this individual as the great Elias-restorer of all things, of the true doctrines, and most efficient practice and application of perfect Christianity, in these last times, prelude and introductory to the advent of the 'great day.' It may, therefore, be appropriate, before concluding the present section, to give a special illustration of this peculiarity of his character; for which we perhaps cannot select a more suitable subject, than the doctrine of 'the atonement,' which, in the ground and nature of it, appears to be as little understood in the present day, as it was in the day in which he wrote. Our scholastic doctors, (says he,) own the fall of man, but know or own nothing of the nature and true depth of it. They own the truth of Christ's divinity, and the necessity of his sufferings: they plead for the certainty of these things from scripture words, but see not into the ground of them, or in what the absolute necessity of them consists:—

"The learning of a Grotius or a Stillingfleet, (he writes,) when defending the popular account of the satisfaction of Christ, rather increases than lessens the objections to it. But when the matter is taken as it truly is in itself, viz.: That God is Love, all love, and therefore can be nothing else but love to fallen man, and that fallen man is subject to no pain or misery, either present or to come, but what is the natural, unavoidable, essential effect of his own evil and disordered nature, impossible to be altered by himself; and that the infinite, never-ceasing love of God, has given Jesus Christ in all his process, as the highest, and only possible means, that heaven and earth can afford, to save man from himself, from his own evil, misery and death, and restore to him his original divine life. When this matter is regarded in this true light, then a God all love, and an atonement for sin by Christ, has everything in it that can make the providence of God adorable, and the state of man comfortable.—Here all superstition, and superstitious fears, (he continues) are at once totally cut off, and every work of piety is turned into a work of love. Here every false hope of every kind, is taken from the licentious, they have no ground left to stand upon. Nothing to trust to, as a deliverance from misery, but the one total abolition of sin, from body, soul, and spirit.

Thus are we to understand the mystery of our redemption, for it is thus, and thus only, set forth in the Gospel, viz., that God is Love; and the atonement of Christ nothing else in itself but the highest, most natural, and efficacious means, through all the possibility of things, that the infinite love, and wisdom, and power of God could use, to put an end to sin, and death, and hell, and to restore to man his first divine state or life. I say the most natural, efficacious means through all the possibilities of nature; for there is nothing that is supernatural, however mysterious, in the whole system of our redemption; every part of it has its ground in the workings and powers of Nature, and all our redemption is only nature set right, or made to be that which it ought to be.

There is nothing that is supernatural, but GOD alone; everything besides him is from, and subject to the state of Nature: it can never rise out of it, or have anything contrary to it. No creature can have either health or sickness, good or evil, or any state either from God or itself, but strictly according to the capacities, powers, and workings of nature.

The mystery of our redemption, though it comes from the supernatural God, has nothing in it but what is done, and to be done, within the sphere, and according to the powers of nature. There is nothing supernatural in it, or belonging to it, but that supernatural love and wisdom which brought it forth, presides over it, and will direct it, till Christ, as a second Adam, has removed and extinguished all that evil which the first Adam brought into the human nature.

And the whole process of Jesus Christ, from his being the Divine inspoken Word, or bruiser of the serpent given to Adam, to his birth, death, resurrection, and ascension into heaven, has all its ground and reason in this, because nothing else in all the possibilities of nature, either in heaven or on earth, could begin, carry on, and totally effect man's deliverance from the evil of his own fallen nature.

Thus is Christ the one, full, sufficient atonement for the sin of the whole world, because he is the one only natural remedy, and possible cure of all the evil that is broke forth in Nature, the one only natural life, and resurrection of all that holiness and happiness that died in Adam. And seeing all this process of Christ is given to the world, from the supernatural, antecedent, infinite love of God, therefore is it, that the apostle saith, "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself." And Christ in God is nothing else in his whole nature, but that same, certain, and natural parent of a redemption to the whole human nature, as fallen Adam was the certain and natural parent of a miserable life to every man that is descended from him. With this only difference, that from fallen Adam we are born in sin, whether we will or no, but we cannot have that new birth which Christ has all power to bring forth in us, unless the will of our heart closes with it.

But as nothing came to us from Adam, but according to the powers of Nature, and because he was that which he was, with relation to us; so it is with Christ, and our redemption by him: all the work is grounded in, and proceeds according to the powers of nature, or in a way of natural efficacy or fitness to produce its effects; and everything that is found in the person, character, and condition of Christ, is only there as his true and natural qualification to do all that he came to do, in us, and for us. That is to say, Christ was made to be that which he was; he was a seed of life in our first fallen father; he lived as a blessing of promise in the patriarchs, prophets, and Israel of God; he was born as a man of a pure virgin; he did all that he did, whether as suffering, dying, conquering, rising, and ascending into heaven, only as so many things, which as naturally, and as truly, according to the nature of things, qualified him to be the producer, or quickener of a Divine life in us, as the state and condition of Adam qualified him to make us the slavish children of earthly, bestial flesh and blood.

This is the comfortable doctrine of our redemption; nothing in God but an infinity of love and goodness towards our fallen condition; nothing in Christ, but that which had its necessity in the nature of things, to make him able to give, and us to receive our full salvation from him.

I will now only add, that from the beginning of deism, and from the time of Socinus, to this day, not a socinian or deist have ever seen or opposed this mystery in its true state, as is undeniably plain from all their writings.

And how it could enter into any Christian philosopher's head, to charge this doctrine with destroying the necessity and merits of Christ's death, is exceeding strange.

For look where you will, no other cause, or reason of the death of Christ, can be found, but in the love of God towards fallen man. Nor could the love of God will or accept of the death of Christ, but because of its absolute necessity, and availing efficacy to do all that for fallen man, which the love of God would have to be done for him.

God did not, could not love, or like, or desire the sufferings and death of Christ, for what they were in themselves, or as sufferings of the highest kind. No, the higher and greater such sufferings had been, were they only considered in themselves, the less pleasing they had been to a God that wills nothing but blessing and happiness to everything capable of it.

But all that Christ was, and did, and suffered, was infinitely prized, and highly acceptable to the love of God, because all that Christ was, and did, and suffered in his own person, was that which gave him full power to be a common Father of life to all that died in Adam.⁸

Had Christ wanted anything that he was or did, or suffered in his own person, he could not have stood in that relation to all mankind as Adam had done. Had he not been given to the first fallen man as a seed of the woman, as a light of life, "enlightening every man that comes into the world," he could not have had his seed in every man, as Adam had, nor been as universal a father of life as Adam was of death. Had he not in the fitness or fulness of time, become a man, born of a pure virgin, the first seed of life, in every man, must have lain only as a seed, and could not have come to the fulness of the birth of a new man in Christ Jesus. For the children can have no other state of life, but that which their father first had. And therefore Christ, as the father of a regenerated human race, must first stand in the fulness of that human state which was to be derived from him into all his children.

This is the absolute necessity of Christ's being all that he was, before he became man; a necessity arising from the nature of the thing. Because he could not possibly have had the relation of a father to all mankind, nor any power to be a quickener of a life of heaven in them, but because he was both God in himself, and a seed of God in all of them.

Now all that Christ was, and did, and suffered, after he became man, is from the same necessity founded in the nature of the thing. He suffered on no other account, but because that which he came to do, in, and for the human nature, was, and could be nothing else in itself, but a work of sufferings and death.

A crooked line cannot become straight, but by having all its crookedness given up, or taken from it. And there is but one way possible in nature, for a crooked line to lose its crookedness.

Now the sufferings and death of Christ stand in this kind of necessity. He was made man for our salvation, that is, he took upon him our fallen nature, to bring it out of its evil, crooked state, and set it again in that rectitude in which it was created.

Now there was no more two ways of doing this, than there are two ways of making a crooked line to become straight.

If the life of fallen nature, which Christ had taken upon him, was to be overcome by him, then every kind of suffering and dying, that was a giving up, or departing from the life of fallen nature, was just as necessary, in the nature of the thing, as that the line to be made straight, must give up and part with every kind and degree of its own crookedness.

And therefore the sufferings and death of Christ were, in the nature of the thing, the only possible way of his acting contrary to, and overcoming all the evil that was in the fallen state of man.

The apostle saith, "The Captain of our salvation was to be made perfect through sufferings." This was the ground and reason of his sufferings: had he been without them, he could not have been perfect in himself, as a son of man, nor the restorer of perfection in all mankind. But why so? Because his perfection as a son of man, or the captain of human salvation, could only consist in his acting in, and with a spirit suitable to the first created state of perfect man; that is, he must in his spirit be as much above all the good and evil of this fallen world, as the first man was.

But now, he could not show that he was of this spirit, that he was above the world, that he was under no power of fallen nature, but lived in the perfection of the first created man. He could not do this, but by showing that all the good of the earthly life was renounced by him, and that all the evil which the world, the malice of men and devils could bring upon him, could not hinder his living wholly and solely to God, and doing his will on earth with the same fulness, as angels do it in heaven.

But had there been any evil in all fallen nature, whether in life, death, or hell, that had not attacked him with all its force, he could not have been said to have overcome it. And therefore, so sure as Christ, as the Son of Man, was to overcome the world, death, hell, and satan, so sure is it, that all the evils which they could possibly bring upon him, were to be felt and suffered by him, as absolutely necessary, in the nature of the thing, to declare his perfection, and prove his superiority over them. Surely, my friend, it is now enough proved to you, how a God all love towards fallen man, must love, like, desire, and delight in all the sufferings of Christ, which alone could enable him, as a Son of Man, to undo, and reverse all that evil, which the first man had done to all his posterity.

Eusebius.—Oh, sir, in what an adorable light is this mystery now placed. And yet in no other light than that in which the plain letter of all Scripture sets it. No wrath in God, no fletitious atonement, no folly of debtor and creditor,* no suffering in Christ for suffering's sake, but a Christ suffering and dying, as his same brethren over death and hell, as when he rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven.

Theophilus.—Sure, now, Eusebius, you plainly enough see wherein the infinite merits, or the availing efficacy, and glorious power of the sufferings and death of Christ consists; since they were that, in and through which Christ himself came out of the state of fallen nature, and got power to give the same victory to all his brethren of the human race.

Wonder not, therefore, that the Scriptures so frequently ascribe all our salvation to the sufferings and death of Christ, that we are continually referred to them, as the wounds and stripes by which we are healed, as the blood by which we are washed from our sins, as the price (much above gold and precious stones) by which we are bought.

Wonder not, also, that in the old testament, its service, sacrifices, and ceremonies, were instituted to typify and point at the great sacrifice of Christ, and to keep up a continual hope, strong expectation, and belief of it. And that in the new testament, the reality, the benefits, and glorious effects of Christ our passover, being actually sacrificed for us, are so joyfully repeated by every apostle.

It is because Christ, as suffering and dying, was nothing else but Christ conquering and overcoming all the false good and the hellish evil of the fallen state of man.

His resurrection from the grave, and ascension into heaven, though great in themselves, and necessary parts of our deliverance, were yet but the consequences and genuine effects of his sufferings and death. These were in themselves the reality of his conquest; all his great work was done, and effected in them and by them, and his resurrection and ascension was only his entering into the possession of that which his sufferings and death had gained for him.

Wonder not then, that all the true followers of Christ, the saints of every age, have so gloried in the cross of Christ, have imputed such great things to it, have desired nothing so much, as to be partakers of it, to live in constant union with it. It is because his sufferings, his death, and cross were the fulness of his victory over all the works of the devil. Not an evil in flesh and blood, not a misery of life, not a chain of death, not a power of hell and darkness, but were all baffled, broken, and overcome by the process of a suffering and dying Christ. Well, therefore, may the cross of Christ be the glory of christians.

Eusebius.—This matter is so solidly and fully cleared up, that I am almost ashamed to ask you anything further about it. Yet explain a little more, if you please, how it is that the sufferings and death of Christ gave him power to become a common Father of life, to all that died in Adam; or how it is, that we, by virtue of them, have victory over all the evil of our fallen state.

Theophilus.—You are to know, Eusebius, that the christian religion is no arbitrary system of divine worship, but is the one true, real, and only religion of Nature; that is, it is wholly founded in the nature of things, has nothing in it supernatural, or contrary to the powers and demands of nature; but all that it does, is only in, and by, and according to the workings and possibilities of nature.

A religion that is not founded in nature, is all fiction and falsity, and as mere a nothing as an idol. For as no creature can be or have anything in it, but what it is, and has from the nature of things, nor have anything done to it, good or harm, but according to the unalterable workings of nature; so no religion can be of any service, but that which works with, and according to the demands of nature. Nor can any fallen creature be raised out of its fallen state, even by the omnipotence of God, but according to the nature of things, or the unchangeable powers of nature; for Nature is the opening and manifestation of the divine omnipotence; it is God's power-world: and therefore all that God doth, is and must be done in and by the powers of nature. God, though omnipotent, can give no existence to any creature, but it must have that existence in space and time.—Time cometh out of the eternity, and space cometh out of the infinity of God.—God hath an omnipotent power over them, in them, and with them, to make both of them set forth and manifest the wonders of his supernatural Deity. Yet time can only be subservient to the omnipotence of God, according to the nature of time, and space can only obey his will, according to the nature of space; but, neither of them can, by any power, be made to be in a supernatural state, or be anything but what they are in their own nature.

Now right and wrong, good and evil, true and false, happiness and misery, are as unchangeable in nature as time and space. And every state and quality that is creaturely, or that can belong to any creature, has its own nature, as unchangeably as time and space have theirs.

Nothing, therefore, can be done to any creature supernaturally, or in a way that is without, or contrary to the powers of nature; but everything or creature that is to be helped, that is to have any good done to it, or any evil taken out of it, can only have it done so far as the powers of nature are able, and rightly directed to effect it.

And this is the true ground of all divine revelation, or that help which the supernatural Deity vouchsafes to the fallen state of man. It is not to appoint an arbitrary system of religious homage to God, but solely to point out and provide for man, blinded by his fallen state, that one only religion, that, according to the nature of things, can possibly restore to him his lost perfection. This is the truth, the goodness, and the necessity of the christian religion; it is true, and good, and necessary, because it is as much the one only natural, and possible way of overcoming all the evil of fallen man, as light is the one only natural, possible thing that can expel darkness.

And therefore it is, that all the mysteries of the gospel, however high, are yet true and necessary parts of the one religion of nature; because they are no higher, nor otherwise than the natural state of fallen man absolutely stands in need of. His nature cannot be helped, or raised out of the evils of its present state, by anything less than these mysteries; and, therefore, they are in the same truth and justness to be called his natural religion; as that remedy which alone has full power to remove all the evil of a disease, may be justly called its natural remedy.

* An objection having been made to these words, in a letter to the author, which the writer of these lines has in his possession, he, the author, entered again into this subject, to remove the scruple: which reply may be seen in the collection of his 'Letters.'

For a religion is not to be deemed natural, because it has nothing to do with revelation ; but then it is the one true religion of nature, when it has everything in it that our natural state stands in need of ; everything that can help us out of our present evil, and raise and exalt us to all the happiness which our nature is capable of having. Supposing, therefore, the christian scheme of redemption to be all that, and nothing else in itself, but that which the nature of things absolutely requires it to be, it must, for that very reason, have its mysteries.

For the fallen, corrupt, mortal state of man, absolutely requires these two things, as its only salvation. First, the divine life, or the life of God, must be quickened again, or revived in the soul of man. Secondly, there must be a resurrection of the body in a better state after death. Now, nothing in the power of man, or in the things of this world, can effect this salvation. If, therefore, this is to be the salvation of man, then some interposition of the Deity is absolutely necessary, in the nature of the thing, or man can have no religion that is sufficiently natural ; that is to say, no religion that is sufficient, or equal to the wants of his nature.

Now this necessary interposition of the Deity, though doing nothing but in a natural way, or according to the nature of things, must be mysterious to man, because it is doing something more and higher than his senses or reason ever saw done, or possible to be done, either by himself or any of the powers of this world.

And this is the true ground and nature of the mysteries of christian redemption. They are, in themselves, nothing else but what the nature of things require them to be, as natural, efficacious means of our salvation, and all their power is in a natural way, or true fitness of cause for its effect ; but they are mysterious to man, because brought into the scheme of our redemption, by the interposition of God, to work in a way and manner, above, and superior to all that is seen and done in the things of this world.

The mysteries, therefore, of the gospel, are so far from showing the gospel not to be the one true religion of nature, that they are the greatest proofs of it, since they are that alone which can help man to all that good which his natural state wants to have done to it.

For instance, if the salvation of man absolutely requires the revival, or restoration of the divine life in the human nature, then nothing can be the one, sufficient, true religion of nature, but that which has a natural power to do this.

What a grossness of error is it, therefore, to blame that doctrine which asserts the incarnation of the Son of God, or the necessity of the Word being made flesh ; when, in the nature of the thing, nothing else but this very mystery can be the natural, efficacious cause of the renewal of the divine life in the human nature, or have any natural efficacy to effect our salvation.

And now, Eusebius, upon this ground, viz. (1.) That there is but one true religion, and that it is the religion of nature. (2.) That a religion has no pretence to be considered as the religion of nature, because it rejects divine revelation, and has only human reason for its guide, but wholly and solely because it has every good in it that the natural state of man wants, and can receive from religion. (3.) That nothing can be any religious good, or have any real efficacy, as a means of salvation, but only that which has its efficacy in, and from the natural power of things, or the fitness and sufficiency of cause to produce its effect. (4.) That the religion of the gospel, in all its mysteries and doctrines, is wholly grounded in the natural powers of things, and their fitness to produce their effects. Upon this ground, I come to answer your question, viz. How it is that the sufferings and death of Christ gave him full power to become a common father of life, to all those that died in Adam ? Or how it is that we, by virtue of them, are delivered out of all the evils of our fallen state ?

The sufferings and death of Christ have no supernatural effect, or that is above, or contrary to nature. Because the thing itself is impossible : for a thing is only therefore impossible, because the nature of things will not allow of it.

The fall of all mankind in Adam, is no supernatural event, or effect, but the natural and necessary consequence of our relation to him. Could Adam at his fall into this earthly life, have absolutely overcome every power of the world, the flesh, and the devil, in the same spirit, as Christ did, he had been his own redeemer, had risen out of his fall, and ascended into paradise, and been the father of a paradisaical offspring, just as Christ, when he had overcome them all, rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven. But Adam did not do this, because it was as impossible in the nature of the thing, as for a beast to raise itself into an angel. If, therefore, man is to come out of his fallen state, there must be something found out, that according to the nature of things, hath power to effect it. For it can no more be done supernaturally by any thing else, than it could by Adam.

Now the matter stood thus, the seed of all mankind was in the loins of fallen Adam. This was unalterable in the nature of the thing, and, therefore, all mankind must come forth in his fallen state.

Neither can they ever be in any state whatever, whether earthly or heavenly, but by having an earthly man, or a heavenly man for their father. For mankind, as such, must of all necessity be born of, and have that nature which it hath, from a man. And this is the true ground and absolute necessity of the one Mediator, the man Christ Jesus. For seeing mankind, as such, must have that birth and nature which they have, from man, seeing they never could have had any relation to paradise, or any possibility of partaking of it, but because they had a paradisaical man for their father, never could have had any relation to this earthly world, or any possibility of being born earthly, but because they had an earthly man for their father ; and seeing all this must be unalterably so for ever, it plainly follows, that there was an utter impossibility for the seed of Adam ever to come out of its fallen state, or ever have another, or better life, than they had from Adam, unless such a son of man could be brought into existence, as had the same relation to all mankind, as Adam had, was as much in them all, as Adam was, and had as full power, according to the nature of things, to give a heavenly life to all the seed in Adam's loins, as Adam had to bring them forth in earthly flesh and blood.

And now, sir, that Christ was this very Son of Man, standing in the same fulness of relation to all mankind, as Adam did, having his seed, as really in them all, as Adam had, and as truly and fully qualified according to the nature of things, to be a common and universal father of life, as Adam was of death to all the human race, shall, in a word or two, be made as plain and undeniable, as that two and two are four.

The doctrine of our redemption absolutely asserts, that the seed of Christ was sown into the first fallen father of mankind, called the seed of the woman, the bruiser of the serpent, the engrafted Word of life, called again in the Gospel, "that light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Therefore Christ was in all men, in that same fullness of the relation of a father to all mankind, as Adam the first was. Secondly, Christ was born of Adam's flesh and blood, took the human nature upon him, and therefore stood as an human creature in the same relation to mankind as Adam did. Nothing, therefore, was further wanting in Christ, to make him as truly a natural father of life to all mankind, as Adam was at first, but God's appointment of him to that end.

For as Adam could not have been the natural father of mankind, but because God created and appointed him for that end, so Christ could not have been the natural regenerator, or redeemer of an heavenly life, that was lost in all mankind, but because God had appointed and brought him into the world for that end. Now that God did this, that Christ came into the world by divine appointment, to be the Saviour, the resurrection, and life of all mankind, is a truth as evident from Scripture, as that Adam was the first man.

And thus it appears, in the utmost degree of plainness and certainty, that Christ in his single person, was, according to the nature of things, as fully qualified to be a common redeemer, as Adam was, in his single person, to be a common father of all mankind. He had his seed in all mankind, as Adam had; he had the human nature, as Adam had; and he had the same divine appointment as Adam had. But Christ, however qualified to be our redeemer, could not be actually such, till he had gone through, and done all that, by which our redemption was to be effected.

Adam, however qualified, yet could not be the father of a paradisaical offspring, till he had stood out his trial, and fixed himself victorious over every thing that could make trial of him. In like manner, Christ, however qualified, could not be the Redeemer of all mankind, till he had also stood out his trial, had overcome all that by which Adam was overcome, and had fixed himself triumphantly in that paradise which Adam had lost.

Now, as Adam's trial was, whether he would keep himself in his paradisaical state, above and free from all that was good and evil in this earthly world, so Christ's trial was, whether as a Son of Man, and loaded with the infirmities of fallen Adam, sacrificed to all that which the rage and malice of the world, hell, and devils, could possibly do to him; whether he in the midst of all these evils could live and die with his spirit as contrary to them, as much above them, as unhurt by them, as Adam should have lived in paradise.

And then it was, that everything which had overcome Adam, was overcome by Christ, and Christ's victory did, in the nature of the thing, as certainly and fully open an entrance for him, and all his seed into paradise, as Adam's fall cast him, and all his seed into the prison and captivity of this earthly, bestial world.

Nothing supernatural came to pass in either case, but paradise lost, and paradise regained, according to the nature of things, or the real efficacy of cause to produce its effect.

Thus is your question fully answered; viz. How and why the sufferings and death of Christ enabled him to be the author of life to all that died in Adam? Just as the fall of Adam into this world, under the power of sin, death, hell, and the devil, enabled him to be the common father of death, that is, was the natural, unavoidable cause of our being born under the same captivity; just so, that life, and sufferings, and death of Christ, which declared his breaking out from them, and superiorly over them, must, in the nature of the thing, as much enable him to be the common author of life, that is, must as certainly be the full, natural, efficacious cause of our inheriting life from him. Because, by what Christ was in himself, by what he was in us, by his whole state, character, and the divine appointment, we all had that natural union with him, and dependence upon him, as our head in the way of redemption, as we had with Adam as our head in the way of our natural birth. So that, as it must be said, that because Adam fell, we must of all necessity be heirs of his fallen state; so, with the same truth, and from the same necessity of the thing, it must be said, that because Christ our head is risen victorious out of our fallen state, we, as his members, and having his seed within us, must be, and are made, heirs of all his glory. Because, in all respects we are as strictly, as intimately connected with, and related to him, as the one Redeemer, as we are to Adam, as the one father of all mankind. So that Christ, by his sufferings and death, become in all of us our wisdom, our righteousness, our justification, and redemption, is the same sober and solid truth, as Adam, by his fall become in all of us our foolishness, our impurity, our corruption, and death.

And now, my friends, look back upon all that has been said, and then tell me, is it possible more to exalt, or magnify the infinite merits, and availing efficacy of the sufferings and death of Christ, than is done by this doctrine? or whether everything that is said of them in Scripture, is not here proved from the very nature of the thing to be absolutely true? And again, whether it is not sufficiently proved to you, that the sufferings and death of Christ, are not only consistent with the doctrine of a God all love, but are the fullest, and most absolute proof of it?

Eusebius.—Indeed, Theophilus, you have so fully done for us, all that we wanted to have done, that we are now ready to take leave of you. AS FOR MY PART, I WANT TO RETURN HOME, TO ENJOY MY BIBLE, AND DELIGHT MYSELF WITH READING IT IN THIS COMFORTABLE LIGHT, IN WHICH YOU HAVE SET THE WHOLE GROUND AND NATURE OF OUR REDEMPTION. I AM NOW IN FULL POSSESSION OF THIS GLORIOUS TRUTH, THAT GOD IS MERE LOVE, THE MOST GLORIOUS TRUTH THAT CAN POSSESS, AND EDIFY THE HEART OF MAN. It drives every evil out of the soul, and gives life to every spark of goodness, that can possibly be kindled in it. Every thing in religion is made amiable, by being a service of love to the God of LOVE.

No sacrifices, sufferings, and death, have any place in religion, but to satisfy, and fulfil that love of God, which could not be satisfied without our salvation. If the Son of God is not spared, if he is delivered up to the rage, and malice of men, devils, and hell, it is because, had we not had such a captain of our salvation, made perfect through sufferings, it never could have been sung, "O death, where is thy sting, oh grave, where is thy victory!" It never could have been true, that "as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so by one man came the resurrection of the dead;" it never could have been said, that "AS IN ADAM ALL DIE, SO IN CHRIST SHALL ALL BE MADE ALIVE."

Therefore, dear Theophilus, adieu : God is love, and he that hath learnt to live in the spirit of Love, hath learnt to live and dwell in God. Love was the beginner of all the works of God, and from eternity to eternity, nothing can come from God, but a variety of wonders, and works of love, over all nature and creature.

Theophilus.—God prosper, Eusebius, this spark of heaven in your soul; may it, like the seraphim's coal taken from the altar, purify your heart from all its uncleanness."

Finally, as a close to the present section, we offer the following extract from the "Way to Divine Knowledge" (being the conclusion of the dissertation in the first part of that work, on the true way of making converts to Christianity, and recommended to be referred to in that respect, on page 78,)—containing a description of the ground and nature of GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY in contradistinction to that original universal Christianity, which began with Adam, was the religion of the patriarchs, of Moses, and the prophets, and of every humble penitent man, in every part of the world, by what name soever called, Heathen, Mahomedan, Jew, or national Christian :—

"But let me now return to Humanus, and ask him that, supposing he could not convince a man of the certainty of his fallen state, how he would farther proceed with him.

Humanus.—Truly, Theophilus, I would proceed no farther at all; and for this good reason, because I should then have nothing to proceed upon. Did I certainly know of an infallible remedy for every disorder of the eyes, only to be had by going to China for it, I should not attempt to persuade a man, who believed his eyes to be sound and good, to leave all that he had, and go to China for this infallible remedy for bad eyes.

Now to press a man to deny himself, and leave all that he hath in the enjoyments of flesh and blood, in order to be reconciled to God, who believes himself to be in the same good state, in which God created him, seems to be as wild a project as to desire him who is well pleased with the goodness of his sight, to go to the Indies to be helped to see.

And, indeed, I very well know, from former experience, that all discourses about the reasonableness of Christianity, the doctrine of the cross, the exceeding love of God in giving so great a Saviour, with many more things of the like nature, were mere empty sounds, heard with the greatest indifference, and incapable of raising the least seriousness in me, merely because I had not the least notion or suspicion of the truth and greatness of my fallen state, and therefore was not the man who had any fitness to be affected with these matters. And thence it was that Christ said, Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you; as plain as if he said, No one else can come to me, nor any one else be refreshed by me.

Here therefore, in my humble opinion, should all begin, who would propagate Christianity, or make true converts to it, and here stop, as Christ did. It is only the weary, and heavy laden, that are fitted to be converts, or refreshed; and therefore we can no way help a man to be a christian, or fit him to be refreshed by Christ, but by bringing him into a full sensibility of the evil, and burden, and vanity of his natural state, till some good Providence awakens him out of it; and not make proposals to him of the reasonableness of believing the Holy Trinity, the Incarnation of the Son of God, and the necessity of his sufferings and death, etc., for this method is full as absurd, as to enter into solemn debate with a confessed atheist, about the reasonableness of worshipping God in spirit and truth; for, as the existence of a God is the only ground of proving that he ought to be worshipped in spirit and in truth, so the certainty and belief of our fallen state is the only ground of showing the reasonableness of the mysteries of redemption. And he that disowns the fall of man from a divine life, has all the same reasons for rejecting the mysteries of our salvation, as the atheist has to reject the doctrines of a spiritual worship of God. Therefore, to expose the mysteries of our salvation to the wrangle of a debate with an unbeliever of the fall of man, which mysteries have no other ground to stand upon, is not only helping him to an easy triumph over you, but is the most likely method to prevent his ever being a Christian. For seeing how easily he can ridicule mysteries, which, to him in his present state, can have no reasonableness in them, he is put into the most likely way of living and dying in a hardened contempt of them. Whereas, if you stick close to the one true ground of Christianity, and only proceed as that proceeds, and make the unbeliever no offers of any other Christianity, but that which is to begin with the acknowledged sensibility of the fall of human nature from its first divine life; you stop where you ought to stop, and rob him of all power and pretence of meddling with the other mysteries of salvation.

The one business, then, upon his hands, if he will hold out against you, must be to deny his reason and senses, and maintain, in spite of both, that man is not fallen, but is by nature holy, just, good, and happy both in body and soul; and that mankind, and the world they are in, have all that goodness and happiness, which they could be supposed to have from an infinitely good and happy God; and who can will nothing in the creature but goodness and happiness. Here you bring the deist to his proper work, and all the contradiction to sense and reason will lie on his side: you set Christianity upon its true ground: and whoever thus defends it, as it ought to be defended, not only does justice to the Christian cause, but acts the most kind and friendly part towards those who oppose it merely through a misunderstanding of its true ground and nature; which I will venture to say is the case of all the sober well-meaning deists. For Deism has no natural foundation, or ground of its own, to stand upon; it does not grow from any root or strength within itself, but is what it is merely from the bad state of Christendom, and the miserable use that heathenish learning, and worldly policy, have made of the Gospel. If it (Deism) seems to itself to be strong and well-grounded, it is merely because it can so easily object to church-doctrines, and scholastic opinions: if it seems to itself to be good, it is because it can so easily lay open the evils which Christians and churches bring upon one another: If it seems to itself to be highly rational, its reason is, because it is free from that number of absurdities and contradictions which Christian churches lay to the charge of one another. Lastly, if it keeps off all fearful forbodings of the consequences of not receiving the Gospel, it is because it so plainly sees, that Christians say, Hail, Master, kiss the Gospel, and then break every part of it.

This is the true height, and depth and total strength of Deism or infidelity; it never had any other support in myself but this; nor did I ever converse with a Deist, who carried the matter higher or farther than this, to support the cause. Hence it is, that you made so speedily a convert of me, by shewing me such a Christianity as I never heard of before; and stript of everything that gave me power to oppose it. Had you proceeded in the way practised by most defenders of the Gospel, you had left me just as you found me, if not more confirmed in my old way. But as you have justly removed all controversy about doctrines from the merits of the cause, and shewn that it all lies in this one short, plain, and decisive point, namely the fall of man: a fall proved and demonstrated to all my senses and reason, by every height and depth of nature, by every kind of misery, evil, and sin in the world, by everything we know of God, ourselves, and the world we live in; the ground and foundation of Christianity is undeniable, and no one can be too speedily a convert to the belief of it. And as you have also shewn, that the whole nature of the Gospel redemption means nothing but the one, true, and only possible way of delivering man from his miserable state in this world; Christianity is shewn to be the most intelligible and desirable thing that the heart of man can think of. And thus, contrary to all expectation, the tables are quite turned; Deism can no longer be founded on argument, and Christianity is as self-evident as our senses: all learning on both sides, either for or against it, is insignificant; Christianity stands upon a bottom quite superior to it, and may be the sure possession of every plain man, who has sense enough to know whether he is happy or unhappy, good or evil. For this natural knowledge, if adhered to, is every man's sure guide to that one salvation preached by the Gospel. Which Gospel stands in no more need of learning and critical art now, than it did when Christ was preaching it upon earth. How absurd would it have been for any critics in Greek and Hebrew, to have followed Christ and his apostles, as necessary explainers of their hard words, which called for nothing in the hearers but penitent hearts turned to God; and declared, that they only who were of God, could hear the Word of God! How strange, that Christ should choose only illiterate men to preach the Gospel of the kingdom of God, if only great scholars could rightly understand what they said! Again, supposing learned men to have only the true fitness to understand the word of Scripture, and that the plain man is to receive it from them, how must he know which are the scholars that have the right knowledge? From whence is he to have this information? for no one need be told, that ever since learning has borne rule in the church, learned doctors have contradicted and condemned one another in every essential point of the Christian doctrine. Thousands of learned men tell the illiterate, they are lost in this or that church; and thousands of learned men tell them, they are lost, if they leave it.

If, therefore, Christianity is in the hands of scholars, how must the plain man come at it? must he, though unable to understand Scripture, for want of learning, tell which learned man is in the right, and which is not? If so, the unlearned man has much the greatest ability, since he is to do that for scholars, which they cannot do for themselves.

But the truth of the matter is this: Christian redemption ~~is grounded on the ground and necessity, and like misapprehended, before the world began, and selected by the will of God, and is in the whole nature of things, namely the eternal process of the infinite Son of God, as the supernatural nature of which with all its attendant relative mysteries was first given to the world, and is the only way to God, through his chosen servant, Jesus Christ.~~ is God's mercy to all mankind, but it could not be so, if every fallen man, as such, had not some fitness and capacity to lay hold of it. It must have no dependence upon times and places, or the ages and several conditions of the world, or any outward circumstance of life; as the first man partook of it, so must the last; the learned linguist, and the blind, the deaf and dumb, have but one and the same common way of finding life in it. And he that writes large commentaries upon the whole Bible, must be saved by something full as different from book-knowledge, as they were, who lived when there was neither book nor any alphabet in the world.

For this salvation, which is God's mercy to the fallen soul of man, merely as fallen, must be something that meets every man; and which every man, as fallen, has something that directs him to turn to it. For as the fall of man is the reason of this mercy, so the fall must be the guide to it; the want must show the thing that is wanted. And therefore the manifestation of this one salvation, or mercy to man, must have a nature suitable, not to this or that great reader of history, or able critic in Hebrew roots and Greek phrases, but suitable to the common state and condition of every son of Adam. It must be something as grounded in human nature as the fall itself is, which wants no art to make it known; but to which the common nature of man is the only guide in one man, as well as another. Now this something, which is thus obvious to every man, and which opens the way to Christian redemption in every soul, is a sense of the vanity and misery of this world; and a prayer of faith and hope to God, to be raised to a better state.

Now in this sensibility, which every man's own nature leads him into, lies the whole of man's salvation; here the mercy of God and the misery of man are met together; here the fall and the redemption kiss each other. This is the Christianity which is as old as the fall; which alone saved the first man, and can alone save the last. This is it, on which hang all the law and the prophets, and which fulfils them both; for they have only this end, to turn man from the lusts of this life, to a desire, and faith, and hope of a better. Thus does the whole of Christian redemption, considered on the part of man, stand in this degree of nearness and plainness to all mankind; it is as simple and plain as the feeling our own evil and misery, and as natural as the desire of being saved and delivered from it.

This is the Christianity which every man must first be made sensible of, not from hearsay, but as a growth or degree of life within himself, before he can have any fitness, or the least pretence to judge or speak a word about the further mysteries of the gospel. But here I stop.

Theophilus.—Well, Humanus, I have now pushed the matter with you, as far as I intended; and you have given me full proof of the truth and solidity of your own conversion, and your ability to do good amongst your old brethren. You must now enter the lists with them; not to charge them with ignorance, ill-will, or profaneness of spirit, but only to try, in the spirit of Love and meekness, to undeceive them, in the manner you have been undeceived; and to show them, that Christianity is by no means that thing, which you and they have so long disliked.

Nothing can be more right than your resolution not to enter into debate about the Gospel doctrines, or propose the reasonableness of them to any one, till he owns himself sensibly convinced of the forementioned fall of man; and stands in a full desire to be saved, or delivered from it. And if that time never comes, you must leave him, as in the same incapacity to hear or judge of the doctrines of the Holy Trinity, the Incarnation of the Son of God, the operation of the Holy Spirit, as Epicurus would be. For every man that cleaves to this world, that is in love with it, and its earthly enjoyments, is a disciple of Epicurus, and sticks in the same mire of atheism, as he did, whether he be a modern deist, a popish or protestant Christian, an Arian, or an orthodox teacher. For all these distinctions are without any difference, if this world has the possession and government of his heart. For the whole of the matter lies solely in this, whether heaven, or earth, hath the heart and government of man. Nothing divides the worshippers of the true God from idolaters but this: where earth possesses and rules the heart, there all are of one and the same religion, and worship one and the same God, however they may be distinguished by sect or party.

And wherever the heart is weary of the evil and vanity of the earthly life, and looking up to God for an heavenly nature, there all are one of the true religion, and worshippers of the true God, however distant they may be from one another, as to time or place. But enough has been said of this matter.—

Let me now only, before we break up, observe to you the true ground and nature of GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY: I call it so by way of distinction from that original universal Christianity, which began with Adam, was the religion of the patriarchs, of Moses, and the prophets, and of every penitent man in every part of the world, that had faith and hope towards God, to be delivered from the evil of this world.

But when the Son of God had taken a birth in and from the human nature, had finished all the wonders that belonged to our redemption, and was sat down at the right hand of God in heaven, then a heavenly kingdom was set up on earth, and the Holy Spirit came down from heaven, or was given to the flock of Christ in such a degree of birth and life, as never was, nor could be given to the human nature, till Christ, the Redeemer of the human nature, was glorified. But when the humanity of Christ, our second Adam, was glorified, and become all heavenly, then the heavenly life, the comfort, and power, and presence of the Holy Spirit, was the gift which he gave to his brethren, his friends and followers, which he had left upon earth.

The Holy Ghost descended in the shape of cloven tongues of fire on the heads of those that were to begin and open the new powers of a Divine life set up amongst men. This was the beginning and manifestation of the whole nature and power of GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY, a thing as different from what was Christianity before, as the possession of the thing hoped for is different from hope, or deliverance different from the desire or expectation of it. Hence the apostles were new men, entered into a new kingdom come down from heaven, enlightened with new light, enflamed with new love, and preached not any absent or distant thing, but Jesus Christ, as the wisdom and power of God, felt and found within them, and as a power of God ready to be communicated in the same manner, as a new birth from above, to all that would repent and believe in him. It was to this change of nature, of life, and spirit, to this certain, immediate deliverance from the power of sin, to be possessed and governed by gifts and graces of an heavenly life, that men were then called to, as true Christianity. And the preachers of it bore witness, not to a thing that they had heard, but to a power of salvation, a renewal of nature, a birth of heaven, a sanctification of spirit, which they themselves had received. Gospel Christianity then stood upon its own true ground; it appeared to be what it was. And what was it? Why, it was an awakened Divine life set up amongst men; itself was its own proof, it appealed to its proper judge, to the heart and conscience of man, which was alone capable of being touched with these offers of a new life.

Hence it was, that sinners of all sorts, that felt the burden of their evil natures, were in a state of fitness to receive these glad tidings. Whilst the rigid pharisee, the orthodox priest, and the rational heathen, though at enmity with one another, and each proud of his own distinction, yet all agreed in rejecting and abhorring a spiritual Saviour, that was to save them from their carnal selves, and the vanity of their own rational selfish virtues. But when, after a while, Christianity had lost its first glory, appeared no longer as a Divine life awakened amongst men, and itself was no longer its own proof of the power and Spirit of God manifested in it; then heathenish learning and temporal power was, from age to age, forced to be called the glory and prosperity of the church of Christ; although in the Revelation of St. John, its figure is that of a scarlet whore riding upon the beast.

Here, therefore, my friend, you are to place the true distinction of GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY from all that went before it, or that is come up after it. It is purely and solely a Divine life awakened and set up amongst men, as the effect and fruit of Christ's glorification in heaven; and has no other promise from him but that of his HOLY SPIRIT, to be with it, as its light, its guide, its strength, its comfort, and protection, to the end of the world. Therefore, as gospel christians, we belong to the new covenant of the Holy Spirit, which is the kingdom of God come down from heaven on the day of Pentecost; and therefore it is, that there is no possibility of seeing or entering into this new kingdom, but by being born again of the Spirit. The apostles and disciples of Christ, though they had been baptised with water, had followed Christ, heard his doctrines, and done wonders in his name, yet as then, stood only near to the kingdom of God, and preached it to be at hand. They had only seen and "known Christ according to the flesh;" had followed him with great zeal, but with little and very low knowledge either of him or his kingdom; and therefore it was, that they were commanded to stand still, and not act as his ministers in his new glorified state, till they were endued with power from on high: which power they then received, when the Holy Ghost with his cloven tongues of fire came down upon them, by which they became the illuminated instruments that were to diffuse the light of an heavenly kingdom over all the world. From that day began GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY, with its true distinction from everything that was before it; which was the ministration of the Spirit; and the ministers of it called the world to nothing but gifts and graces of the same Spirit, to look for nothing but spiritual blessings, to trust, and hope, and pray for nothing but the power of that Spirit, which was to be the one life and ruling spirit of this newly-opened kingdom of God. No one could join himself to them, or have any part with them, but by dying to the wisdom and light of the flesh, that he might live by the Spirit, through faith in Jesus Christ, who had thus called him to his kingdom and glory. Now this Christianity is its own proof; it can be proved from nothing but itself; it wants neither miracles nor outward witness, but, like the sun, is only its own discoverer.

He that adheres only to the history of the facts, doctrines, and institutions of the gospel, without being born of his spirit, is only such a Christian, and is no nearer to Christ than the Jew, who carnally adhered to the letter of the law. They stand both in the same distance from GOSPEL CHRISTIANITY.

It is in vain, therefore, for the modern Christian to appeal to antiquity, to history, and ancient churches, to prove that he belongs to Christ; for he can only belong to him, by having the power of Christ, and the Spirit of God living and dwelling in his renewed inward man.

But a learned Christianity, supported and governed by reason, dispute, and criticism, that is forced to appeal to canons, and councils, and ancient usages, to defend itself, has lost its place, stands upon a fictitious ground, and shows that it cannot appeal to itself, to its own works, which alone are the certain and only proofs either of a true, or a false Christianity.

For the truth of Christianity is the Spirit of God living and working in it; and where this Spirit is not the life of it, there the outward form is but like the outward carcase of a departed soul.

For the spiritual life is as much its own proof, as the natural life, and needs no outward, or foreign thing to bear witness to it. But if you please, gentlemen, we will end for this time.

Such, then, may be considered a brief ^{general} popular representation of the nature and design of the grand Enochian revelation comprised in the series of works heretofore described, as interpreted by this GREAT ORACLE of Divine wisdom, and master of all solid erudition and literary accomplishments.

As to a particular and philosophic elucidation of the effects which have thence already ensued, and are manifestly in progression, in the moral and religious, the scientific and political renovation of this country, and of others, and of the world at large,—that must, of course, be reserved to the biography. Wherein will doubtless be abundantly demonstrated, the Elias-baptist character of this notable individual, incidentally with regard to philosophy, but directly in the consummate restoration of Christian doctrine to its original evangelical purity of principle and practice, and in laying the groundwork for the dissemination of it, in all its simplicity, power, and efficiency, to the ends of the earth, (to be, however, again referred to in this treatise;) thus answering to the proclamation of the evangelical prophet, in respect to the latter day's glory, and the characteristics of its precursory messengers:—(Isaiah xl. 3, 4, 5.)—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God.—Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain:—And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Indeed, such is the clearness and fulness of light in which every part of Christianity, both in theory and practise, is now set forth in the immediate and espoused works of this learned author, that when seen through such a medium, it may be said to be irresistible.

We now conclude the present section, in order to proceed with the enumeration of the further qualifications necessary for the adequate and accomplished editorship of the proposed standard biography,—in continuance of the remarks of the two first pages of this treatise. Which latter, however, it has been deemed advisable, for reasons which will appear at the commencement of the next following section, to postpone to the next subsequent section.

END OF SECTION FIRST.

SECTION II.

[BEING PROPERLY A NOTE BELONGING TO THE FOLLOWING SECTION.]

The contents of the present section, as above described, originally formed the substance of a note in the next following section, (which was then the second section,) under the divisions therein numbered VII., VIII., IX., X., and containing a recommendation of select and edifying treatises, both of active and contemplative divinity, by the most spiritually-minded ascetic, and mystical writers; with illustrations of their principles and characteristics of piety, in the lives of holy saints, of various ages of the church. But on account of the great extent of the note, it has, upon reflection, been deemed better to render it a section of itself, and to place it in the order in which it now appears in this treatise.

The design of the whole is to afford to the candidate, a comprehensive and interesting view of mystic theology, or of that science of active and contemplative piety into which Christianity had been resolved by her most devoted, experienced, and erudite students, down to the early part of the eighteenth century, the epoch at which the subject of the proposed biography appeared; omitting mention, however, of the English experimental and devotional writers, they being supposed to be familiar to every theological student of this country. Which, it was considered, would be best effected, consistently with the necessary brevity of the present treatise, by presenting a CATALOGUE OF ALL THE EMINENT SPIRITUAL OR MYSTIC WRITERS, of all ages of the church, accompanied by brief general observations upon each, with more extended annotations upon such as should appear to deserve a more particular notice, either with regard to the distinguishing characteristics and complexions of their piety, or on any other ground; inserting, likewise, in each of those annotations, descriptive notices of other authors and writings of similar or corresponding principles.—This has now been done: and, regarding these writings in conjunction with others of a similar character, of the English, Greek, and other churches, they may be said to illustrate the great truth, that God has ‘never left himself without a witness,’ but has always delighted to dwell with the children of men, when he could find detached hearts and purified souls.

It is to be observed, however, that these authors are not to be considered as receiving indiscriminate sanction, by reason of their mention in this catalogue, or any other general favourable observations, attached to their names: on the contrary, many of them are to be rejected as either jejune and worthless in themselves, or utterly useless to a Christian of the present day. Such of them as are truly instructive and edifying, will be found specially referred to as such, either in the annotations above-mentioned, or in the smaller selection of devotional works inserted in the following section of the present treatise.—And, supposing the student of experimental religion to have passed through the rudiments of piety, to an elevated apprehension of the nature, scope, and design of the Christian religion, by means of these authors, in connection with those mentioned in the previous section, even all such writings might be laid aside, and the individual confine himself altogether to the Holy Scriptures,* totally yielding up himself in the spirit and fervency of prayer, to the now conscious openings and comprehended workings of the Holy Spirit, or manifestation of God in his soul,—to which the instructions of Scripture are an unerring guide, and of which its truths are an outward, though spiritual image and standard, both in their rudimentary forms, their diversified riches and wonders, and their boundless, unfathomable lengths and breadths, depths and heights. For, to individuals in such a state of Christianity, (more especially if grounded in the science of Theosophy, and who have attained to a philosophic apprehension of the mystery of truth, in her varied forms of material life, so as to enjoy the ‘triple testimony and witness of the Spirit,’ as alluded to, p. 34;) to such individuals, what can surpass the light and unction contained in the words of the blessed JESUS, or of his SPIRIT in the instructions and exhortations of the apostles, all which are livingly spoken afresh, by that unchangeable eternal-speaking WORD, in the enlightened Christian’s soul? or what the profundity of philosophic truth couched in the relations of the book of Genesis, or embraced in the rapturous views and expressions of St. Paul concerning the “great mystery of CHRIST, for whom, to whom, and by whom, are all things?” or what the devout verities and aspirations concerning the glory of GOD, contained in the book of Psalms, also the deep solid Christian prudence and wisdom of the Preacher; and so on, with respect to the whole of the varied contents of that sacred and majestic book?

The object of the insertion of this catalogue is, of course, with reference to Mr. LAW, he, in addition to passing through a very extensive† course of the-

* The extracts on pages 113—117, with those which immediately follow, will felicitously illustrate this point. Of the latter, the first is from a letter to a friend, who had sent Mr. Law a present of some books, [supposed Dr. Holloway’s “Originals,” 2 vols. Oxford, 1751,] to whom he thus writes:—“With much gratitude I acknowledge the receipt of your generous present by the carrier, and the favour of your kind letter that followed it, which I was glad to see written by your own hand.

The two books you are so kind to bestow upon me, I thankfully receive. I suppose them to be very good in their kind, and reasonably adapted to the state of the times.—But as to myself, I have no ability to meditate much on such kind of books.

Reading is eating; and therefore I only read such books as have food suited to the state of life and hunger that is in me. I leave learning to the learned, and reasoning to those that seek help from it. Hebrew roots and Hebrew Grammars are of no more regard with me, than the water that could be drawn from Jacob’s well.

“If any man thirst,” saith Christ, “let him come unto me, and drink; and out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.” All my religion and reading are devoted to this heavenly Christ and Spirit of God within me; loving, praying, hungering for nothing but this water-spirit of heaven [John iv. 14]; that the meek, humble, patient, suffering, heavenly Spirit of the Lamb of God may be fully revealed within me.”

The other extract proceeds thus:—“Mr. W. will convey Rusbrochius to you.—Every one has his proper way from God, if he is so happy as to find and follow it, without seeking out one of his own. I never could go through the divine Rusbrochius, in his spiritualizing the Mosaic tabernacle, and all that belongs to it. His illuminated eye saw Christ figured and typified in every part, and what he saw he told the world.—But as to myself, I cannot go back to search for the shadow of the mystery, under its types and figures, because the substance itself is come. And I find more enjoyment of it, by simply giving myself up to that which is to be had from a Christ, not as known under Jewish prophecies, or “after the flesh,” but as come in the Spirit, and made man in every one who receives him.

Next to the Scriptures, my only book is the illuminated Behmen. And him I only follow so far as he helps to open in me that which God had opened in him, concerning the death and the life of the fallen and redeemed man.

The whole kingdom of grace and nature was opened in him, and the whole kingdom of grace and nature lies hid in myself. And therefore, in reading of him, I am always at home, and kept close to the kingdom of God that is within me. Wishing you every blessing of divine light and direction, I remain, etc.”

† To be able to form a conception of the extent and severity of his purely theological studies, the reader might refer to Dupin’s “Complete Method of Studying Divinity,” 8vo. London, 1720, after perusal of the extract below; which latter may be supposed to represent Mr. Law’s sentiments, (after he had got out of the sphere and din of Babel,) upon the scholastic mode of teaching divinity: as was partially referred to in the note of p. 105. The extract is taken from one of his works previously quoted, and is doubtless calculated, by its wit, to amuse the reader, if not by its sound reason, to make him a convert to the sentiments embodied in it.—Academicus is therein ological study, having, as he himself states, 'been a diligent reader of all the mystic writers from the apostolic Dionysius (mentioned Acts xvii. 34; and whom, as before observed, St. Paul first instructed in the mysteries of eternity,) down to the great Fenelon, of Cambray'—that is to afford the candidate a somewhat adequate conception of the universality, depth, and solidity of Mr. Law's Christian science, both as a theologian and a practical evangelical divine; em-supposed to represent Mr. Law himself, when at college, to whom Theophilus is thus made to speak:—"If you, my friend, having read many old Greek and Latin books, should intend to publish Homer, or Cæsar's Commentaries, with critical notes, I should have nothing to object to your ability; you might be as well qualified by such means for such a work, as one man is to make baskets, or another traps to catch flies. But if, because of this skill in old Greek and Latin, you should seem to yourself, or others, to be well qualified to write notes upon the spirit and meaning of the words of CHRIST, I should tell you that your undertaking was quite unnatural, and as impossible to be free from error, as when a blind man undertakes to set forth the beauty of different colours.

For the doctrines of redemption belong no more to the natural man, than the beauty of colours to him that never saw the light. And from this unnatural procedure it is, that the Scriptures are as useful to the Socinian or Arian, the Papist or the Protestant; and they can as easily, by the light of reason, charge one another with absurdities, and confute each other's opinion, as two blind men can quarrel, and reject each other's notions of red and green.

JESUS CHRIST is the light of that heavenly man that died in paradise; and therefore nothing in man but that awakened seed of life that died in paradise, can have the least sensibility or capacity for receiving the redeeming power of JESUS CHRIST. But light and life have no dependence upon words or phrases; they both can only proceed from a birth, whether it be the light and life of God, or the light and life of this world. How absurd would it be, to suppose that a man, naturally blind, must be taught grammar or logic, to fit him for the reception of the light of the sun, and the knowledge of colours! Yet not less absurd than to think that skill in Hebrew and Greek words, [or even a knowledge of the sublimest evangelical doctrines,] can open the light of God and heaven in the soul. If you now, Academicus, can set this matter in a juster light, I am ready to hear you.

Academicus.—Standing upon the ground that you, Theophilus, stand upon, all that you have said of reason, science, historical knowledge, or critical skill in words, is unanswerable. For what can all these things avail, if redemption is purely a birth of the Divine nature, light, and Spirit of God, offered to fallen man; which birth can only be received by the faith, hope, and desire of that inward man which is divine in us? For nothing else can have any hunger or thirst after the divine nature, but that which is itself born of it.

Now this true ground of the Christian redemption gives the greatest glory to God, and comfort to man. It explains the fact, why plain and simple souls, having their inward man kindled into love, hope, and faith in God, are capable of the highest divine illumination; whilst learned students, full of art and science, can live and die without the least true knowledge of God and Christ, and slaves to all the lusts of the flesh. For thus, this redemption belongs only to one sort of people, and yet is common to all. It is equally near, and equally open, to every son of man. There is no difference between learned and unlearned, between Jew or Greek, male or female, Scythian or barbarian, bond or free; but the same Lord is God over all, and equally nigh to all that call upon him.—It is told us, as the glory of the divine goodness, that it giveth fodder to the cattle; and feedeth the young ravens that cry unto it. What cattle? Surely not only to the cattle of Jacob; or only to the young ravens that cry in the land of Judah. Yet this would be much more consistent with the goodness of the one universal God, than to hold that only the sons of Jacob, or the children of the circumcision, were in the covenant of God's redemption.

But now, though this one ground of Christian redemption stands in the highest degree of plainness from Scripture, and is absolutely certain from the very nature of the thing; yet, till I met with honest Rusticus, I never conversed with any man, or read any book, that gave me the least hint of it.—When I had taken my degrees, I consulted several great divines, to put me in a method of studying divinity. Had I said to them, Sirs, what must I do to be saved? they would have prescribed hellebore to me, or directed me to the physician as a vapoured enthusiast. And yet I am now fully satisfied, that this one question ought to be the sole inquiry of him who desires to be a true divine. And was our Saviour himself on earth, who surely could do more for me than all the libraries in the world; yet I need have asked no more divinity-knowledge of him, than is contained in this one question.

It would take up near half a day, to tell you the work which my learned friends have cut out for me. One told me, that Hebrew words are all; that they must be read without points; and then the Old Testament is an opened book: he recommended to me a cart-load of lexicons, critics, and commentators, upon the Hebrew Bible. Another tells me, the Greek Bible is the best; that it corrects the Hebrew in many places, and refers me to a large number of books learnedly writ in the defence of it. Another tells me that church-history is the main matter; that I must begin with the first fathers, and follow them through every age of the church, not forgetting to take the lives of the Roman emperors along with me, as striking great light into the state of the church in their times. Then I must have recourse to all the councils held, and the canons made, in every age; which would enable me to see, with my own eyes, the great corruptions of the Council of Trent. Another, who is not very fond of ancient matters, but wholly bent upon rational Christianity, tells me, I need go no higher than the Reformation: that Calvin and Cranmer were very great men; that Chillingworth and Locke ought always to lie upon my table; that I must get an entire set of those learned volumes wrote against popery in King James's reign; and also be well versed in all the discourses which Mr. Boyle's and Lady Moyer's lectures have produced: And then, says he, you will be a match for our greatest enemies, which are the popish priests and modern deists. My tutor is very liturgical; he desires me, of all things, to get all the collections that I can of the ancient liturgies, bracing, as it did, all the theoretical instructions and highest experiences of the most learned doctors, and devoted saints of God, when fullest of Divine light, and all the best thoughts, and most sublimated discoveries of evangelical truth, of the most erudite contemplatives, and practical devotees of all previous ages and all the authors that treat of such matters; who, he says, are very learned and very numerous. He has been many years making observations upon them, and is now clear as to the time when certain little particles got entrance into the liturgies, and others were by degrees dropped. He has a friend abroad, in search of ancient manuscript liturgies; for, by the bye, said he, at parting, I have some suspicion that our sacrament of the Lord's Supper is essentially defective, for want of having a little water in the wine, etc. Another learned friend tells me, the Clementine Constitutions is the book of books; and that all that lies loose and scattered in the New Testament, stands there in its true order and form; and though he won't say, that Dr. Clarke and Mr. Whiston are in the right; yet it might be useful to me to read all the Arian and Socinian writers, provided I stood upon my guard, and did it with caution. The last person I consulted, advised me to get all the histories of the rise and progress of heresies, and of the lives and characters of heretics. These histories, he said, contract the matter; bring truth and error close in view; and I should find all that collected in a few pages, which would have cost me some years to have got together. He also desired me to be well versed in all the casuistical writers, and chief schoolmen; for they debate matters to the bottom; dissect every virtue, and every vice, into its many degrees and parts; and shew, how near they can come to one another without touching. And this knowledge, he said, might be useful to me, when I came to be a parish-priest.

Following the advice of all these counsellors, as well as I could, I lighted my candle early in the morning, and put it out late at night. In this labour I had been sweating for some years, till Rusticus, at my first acquaintance with him, seeing my way of life, said to me, Had you lived about seventeen hundred years ago, you had stood just in the same place as I stand now. I cannot read; and therefore, says he, all these hundreds of thousands of disputing books, and doctrine-books, which these seventeen hundred years have produced, stand not in my way; they are the same thing to me, as if they had never been. And, had you lived at the time mentioned, you had just escaped them all, as I do now; because, though you are a very good reader, there was then none of them to be read.

Could you, therefore, be content to be one of the primitive Christians, who were as good as any that have been since; you may spare all this labour.—Take only the Gospel into your hands; deny yourself; renounce the lusts of the flesh; set your affections on things above; call upon God for his Holy Spirit: walk by faith, and not by sight; adore the holy Deity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in whose image and likeness you was at first created, and in whose name and power you have been baptized, to be again the living likeness, and holy habitation, of his life, and light, and Holy Spirit:

Look up to Christ, as your redeemer, your regenerator, your second Adam; look at him, as truly he is, the wisdom and power of God, sitting at his right hand in heaven, giving forth gifts unto men; governing, sanctifying, teaching, and enlightening with his Holy Spirit, all those that are spiritually-minded; who live in faith, and hope, and prayer, to be redeemed from the nature and power of this evil world. Follow but this simple, plain spirit of the Gospel, loving God with all your heart, and your neighbour as yourself; and then you are Christ's disciple, and have his authority to let the dead bury their dead:

God is a spirit, in whom you live and move and have your being; and he stays not till you are a great scholar, but till you turn from evil, and love goodness, to manifest his holy presence, power and life, within you. It is the love of goodness, that must do all for you; this is the art of arts; and when this is the ruling spirit of your heart, then Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, will come unto you, and make their abode with you, and lead you into all truth, though you knew no more of books than I do.—

So ended Rusticus. It is not easy for me, Theophilus, to tell you, how much good I received from this simple instruction of honest Master Rusticus; for master I may well call him, since he, in so few words, taught me a better lesson of wisdom, than ever I had heard before.

What a project was it, to be grasping after the knowledge of all the opinions, doctrines, disputes, heresies, schisms, councils, cautions, alterations, additions, inventions, corruptions, reformations, sects, and churches, which seventeen hundred years had brought forth through all the extent of the Christian world: what a project this, in order to be a divine, that is, in order to bear true witness to the power of CHRIST, as a deliverer from the evil of flesh, and blood, and hell, and death, and a raiser of a new birth and life from above! for as this is the divine work of CHRIST, so he only is a true and able divine, that can bear a faithful testimony to this divine work of CHRIST.

How easy was it for me to have seen with Rusticus, that all this labyrinth of learned inquiry into such a dark, thorny wilderness of notions, facts, and opinions, could signify no more to me now, to my own salvation, to my interest in Christ, and obtaining the Holy Spirit of God, than if I had lived before it had any beginning! but the blind appetite of learning gave me no leisure to apprehend so plain a truth. Books of divinity indeed I have not done with; but I will esteem none to be such, but those that make known to my heart the inward power and redemption of JESUS CHRIST. Nor will I seek for anything even from such books, but that which I ask of God in prayer; viz. how better to know, more to abhor and resist the evil that is in my own nature; and how to attain a supernatural birth of the Divine life brought forth in me: all besides this is pushpin.—The shipwrecked man wants only to get to shore. Did we see the truth of our state as he does, we should have but one want, and that would be, to get possession of our first created state. There is no misery but in the evil that is in our own fallen state; this is our shipwreck, and great distress nor is there any happiness, but in having the first life of God, and all goodness, opened again in the soul. He that is not intent upon this one thing needful, is not a wise Christian, much less a divine, or one qualified to make known to others the mystery of the power of CHRIST in the work of redemption. [* such as are recommended in the present treatise, to that end.] of the church. The substance of which science, both in its profundity and diversity, he, as stated in the following section, was to be the instrument of concentrating, simplifying, and rendering of popular apprehension; and at the same time of laying the foundation for the propagation of gospel truth, with all its so verified power, capacity of enlargement, and efficiency, even to the ends of the earth: which was accomplished, not by learnedly and demonstratively tracing back those practical elaborations of truth to their principles and form in the Holy Scriptures, but (through the aid of the mystery opened in Behmen's writings,) by experimentally carrying on those discoveries of the Divine life in the soul, to their perfect fruition, and then embodying his theological, devotional, and experimental knowledge in a simple methodical form, for future dissemination.—For as the seed, or grain of wheat in the ear, in its full maturity, necessarily contains in itself, in unity, all the original and by their manifestation, enriched outflowing properties and powers of the first seed, and is capable, by a judicious sowing and cultivation, to produce an abundant increase, and finally a plenteous harvest; so the seed contained in Law's own and espoused writings, (as hereafter alluded to,) coming, by the providence of God, to be sown in its proper place, sprung up as the spirit or spiritual tree of Methodism, the blossoming and full development of which (whatever it may produce in the interim, according to the manifold wisdom of God), will be in what is mystically termed, the time of the LILY, when the kingdom of grace and nature are ONE, as promised to come to pass on the earth; that is, when, by the right fathoming of the Behmenic revelation, the piety, purity, and perfection of the sons of God shall be crowned with virgin-SOPHIA, or the Divine wisdom. For as the richly-impregnated seed, in its fulness of manifestation as a lovely aromatic flower, (by favour of a genial soil and atmosphere, and a proper scientific cultivation,) necessarily displays all the central perfections of its nature that were hidden within it—which, standing in such a perfection of development, is a true figure and emblem of the Divine manifestation as MAN; so may not we justly hope to behold the perfect restoration of the original glorious image of God, which the second Adam has absolutely redeemed, on that earth which was created for him:—which 'great day,' [p. 5, 6, 52,] may be nearer at hand than is generally believed. For "that the seven thousandth year is but a little way off, is undeniable; and it may be affirmed upon sufficient ground, that the six days' creation will last no longer than till it comes;" and we know that the paradisaical sabbath commenced on the afternoon of the sixth day.* And what penetrating and reflective mind cannot, even now, perceive the signs of its immediate advent in the motions of the great spirit of nature, with its mystical earthquakes and signs, overturning the mountains, and levelling the valleys, throughout all nations, all driving† towards the grand consummation, the sabbatic unity or rest? May God hasten the time, according to his wisdom and will!

Mr. Law's sentiments respecting the truly spiritual mystic and ascetic writers are well known, being stated in his published works, and will be presented to the reader's notice at the close of the present section; but as regards the spurious mystics, with their transcendentalism and empty reasonings upon divine subjects, (as if a man were a regenerate living member of the mystical body of Christ, the resurrection and the life, because of his indulging his imagination with spiritual, psychological, or other metaphysical playthings, and his feeling an inward glow during such speculations,)—it is equally certain, that he held all such in the utmost abhorrence; also, that he disapproved of all professed visionaries, with their imaginary revelations, which, in those who were devoted to God, he considered to betoken a diseased state of Christian understanding, and but a mongrel species of gospel experience. For such visions, even if true, could only be personal matters, in which the bulk of spiritual persons could have nothing in common, nothing to imitate, and no object in the perusal of the relation of them, to seek after; and therefore to lead the attention of Christians in general to such matters, as if they were something essential to be known, or to any object but the one thing needful, true regeneration, and an universal Christ-like spirit and holiness of life, the foundation, accompaniment, and top stone of all Divine philosophy,—could only proceed from a misapprehension of the design and implied permissions of the gospel. But, indeed, how could he,* who was to be the harbinger and baptist-preparer of the way for the renovation of the gospel spirit and practice over the face of the earth, do otherwise than point all to the standard of the Holy Scriptures, and, in order to preserve the church in its divinely-originated

* The reader may here be opportunely cautioned respecting the insidious dangers to which he is subject, particularly if not well grounded in experimental piety, or unprovided with a faithful and enlightened spiritual director, on his making acquaintance with the mystic writers. These dangers arise in many ways, but consist chiefly in temptations to SPECULATION and reasoning, supposing thereby to attain to a knowledge of supersensual matters, or as the Scriptures say, by searching to find out God. But whosoever will truly find and know God, can only do so by treading in the steps, and following the counsels of him who himself is the way, the truth, and the life; at the same time, if by nature of a meditative turn, not failing to mix up with his profoundest contemplations, self discipline, and devotion, the public exercises of religious worship, personal activity in union with a professedly spiritual outward church, and diligence in all good works. These are the means whereby God will open in the soul the right knowledge of himself, and all needful mysteries, and by which it is preserved in the true divine order: as indeed may be testified to, by such as have had experience both in the contemplative and practical life, and who have witnessed the ill consequences of isolation from the action of diversified spiritual-mindedness, in the comparatively useless lives, and manifest low state of experience, if not bondage, of those who keep aloof from outward christian union. For it is the same in spiritual as in physical nature, mutual action and re-action are necessary for high development and perfection.

The reason, indeed, why GICHTEL, the accomplished editor of the uniform German edition of Behmen's works—the worthy, the learned, the devout, the Bramwell-spirited, the omni-powerful, [Hebrews xi. 29–34,] the highly-illuminated, and scientific theosophist, Gichtel—the reason why his light was so comparatively hid under a bushel, and confined in its operations, (notwithstanding what may be said in favour of his case,) was for want of his being united with a systematic outward spiritual church. Had that, happily, been the case, the influence of his life, his holiness, his practical divine science, and intimate knowledge of the things of the Spirit, might have outstripped in blessedness of effects, the fruits of Bramwell's ministrations; who, perhaps, was the deepest grounded Gospel Christian that England ever saw.—And even at this very time, and in this country, and in this hey-day of gospel philanthropy, how many devout mystical and theosophical Christians are there, who, for want of being united with a praying, active church, are almost lost to the world, living solely to themselves; and all through a self-deceptive persuasion to which they cling, and by which they ward off the blows of the Spirit, in the admonitions of their friends, viz., that they are not called out, and therefore must not run before they are sent—all the time overlooking or forgetting what their prime teacher has said upon this point: [Theos. Quest. v. 19.] that man's mind is as the sense and nerve of the Holy Spirit; and secondly, that God's wisdom and providence works in and by human efforts, either accompanying or overruling them, nothing being done by God, but through something done by man.—But how to persuade such individuals out of their fallacies, and draw them forth from their secluded retreats into the light of Gospel day, whilst they so continue to hug themselves in their own opinions, and fancy they know better than those who have passed through their experience, and who admit they could never attain full liberty of soul until they died to their former opinions, and entered heartily into outward Christian church action, retaining likewise their wonted private devotion, and theosophic researches,—how to effect this, is the question. But is not this a call, if they have not heard one previously; and does not the Spirit, by its motions in the soul, while perusing the above, answer to and affirm it?

And what is the reason that the piety of Germany is at this day in such a poor, sickly, unpurified, and contracted state, comparatively speaking, and so uninfluential upon the world? For that such is the case, the writer concludes from the information which he has received, in answer to his pertinent inquiries, from a devout party who has recently travelled almost in every part of Germany, purely in search of enlightened theosophists, but who found the truest devotion in private families of the Romish communion. What can be the reason, then, of this spiritual lethargy in that great nation; but simply because Protestantism there has no band of union, no simple, systematic, universal, religious society to draw it together, and to direct its motion,—such, for instance, as original Methodism? Were that supplied, its wondrously talented, and, in many cases, holy children, who are now as sheep without a shepherd, would then be able to bring their diversified talents into the right sphere of action, and Germany would contribute its due and honourable quota of influence to the evangelisation of the nations. How, then, is the regeneration of Germany to be effected? But as that of England was effected, viz., by Law's "Christian Perfection," and "Serious Call;" by "Taylor's Holy Living and Dying," and the three vols. of "Kempis," falling upon, and enkindling the spirit of a young, ardent, devout, Wesley-Ignatius; for like causes produce like effects. If these were translated in the same purity of language and logic, into the German, as that of the two former in English, and were sent with the Bible to all the German universities, the rest might be left to God.

unity, purity, and simplicity for ever, to insist upon their being the every-day starting post of believers, whatever books of a similar spirit they may take with them, for recreation on their way.

It only remains to observe, that the brief observations or descriptions which will be found attached to the several authors of the catalogue are, in general, those of the original compiler, POIRET, by whom it was originally published about the year 1700: so that we have yet to receive an impartial and philosophical account of the chief writers, and eminently devoted characters, appertaining to the theosophic, mystic, and purely gospel school, both of Germany, France, and England since that period, etc.—It will be observed, that the names of the authors herein-mentioned are, as a general rule, given in Latin, in order to render the work of more general reference, though it does not follow from thence, that either they wrote, or their works are to be met with in that language.* Many of the works of these authors, (though this fact may not be generally known,) have anciently been translated into the English language, being published at Douay, Paris, and other towns of France and Belgium, and at Rome itself; of which printed translations the writer of these lines has a good collection.—But no nation is so rich as the French in original writings upon the experimental science of mystic divinity, whilst none are equal to the German (the modern German school of reasoners being, of course, not included therein,) for original works on the grounds and philosophy of spiritual truth, and at the same time none are equal to the English for the scriptural improvement and practical application of the essential merits of each of those peculiar national endowments, though without understanding the philosophy of truth. The work from which the following descriptive extracts are chiefly made, appeared originally in French, as an appendix to the “Theologie Réelle ou Germanique,” it was afterwards rendered more comprehensive, and then translated by the author, as before said, into Latin, under the title of “Biblio. Mystico: 1708.” It has likewise been retranslated into English, but not published in print.——Finally, this section is to be considered as embracing and terminating with the history of spiritual mystic divinity up to the period of Law’s consummating baptist-ministration: the particulars of which epoch, as respects Germany, may be gleaned from the German “Lives of Remarkable and Awakened Christians,” “Gichtel’s Life,” and other works alluded to in this treatise; and with regard to France, from the history of the Quietists, Molinos, Guyon, Fenelon; and with regard to England, from the history of the Philadelphian Society, and the writings of the celebrated Dr. Lee, Roach’s Books, Freher’s MSS., etc.—These were all to centre in WILLIAM LAW, and be reproduced in a new, pure practical form, as the spirit of Methodism, with its action and reaction, for the renovation of gospel Christianity: (N.B.) though the high attainments, or wranglerships of Divine science and the power of faith, are yet to be taught and aspired after, hitherto little more than the elements, or first principles, having been regarded. [p. 43, 44.]

The candidate may content himself with a passing perusal of the contents of this section, glancing over, also, one or two of the works before referred to, —(“Du Pin’s Study of Divinity,” etc.) as such of the herein-mentioned authors and their writings as are advisable for him to study, are described in the

* The compiler (a French writer,) has had regard chiefly to Latin and French authors, or to translations into those two languages, and others have but occasionally been introduced. To have a complete catalogue of the latter sort of writers, it would be necessary, not only that each nation form one of those of its own tongue, but that each religious order and sect, both Catholic and Protestant, do also the same, of their respective orders.—A collection of the most edifying and truly-spiritual works of all ages, if rendered into English by a number of individuals of the literary talent, and fervent enlightened character of piety, which is endeavoured to be obtained by the present treatise, (as one of the qualifications for the proper editorship of the biography of Law,) would form a most delightful and invaluable spiritual library. They would, it is supposed, form some six hundred to a thousand regular 8vo. volumes.

ANGELA DE FULGINIO. Theodidacta.

ANNOTATION.—La croix de Jesus Christ et les graces qui en resultent, c'est à dire, l'amour de la vie, des vertus, de la mort de Jesus Christ, la purification de l'ame par là, et ensuite l'infusion de la vraie Théologie celeste et surnaturelle, et de la connoissance savoureuse et experimentale de Dieu, de ses attributs et perfections, de la rédemption, et d'autres merveilles divines et faveurs très-sublimes, sont l'élément et le caractère particulier de Ste. ANGELE de Foligni, dans laquelle règne une cordialité, une simplicité, et une sincérité si naïve, qu'on sent bien qu'elle est exempte de toute fraude et de toute déception. Sa doctrine et sa vie sont le substantiel de l'Evangile tout pur et tout pratique, et c'est une voie où l'amour-propre ne saurait trouver ni asyle ni soutien.

Les œuvres et la vie de cette sainte Dame, qui vécut à Foligni dans le Duché de Spolette il y a quatre cents ans, et qui convertie lors qu'elle avait encore son mari se mit après qu'il fut mort dans le tiers ordre de S. François, furent publiées en Latin par son confesseur. Outre les éditions qu'on en a faites, à Paris, et à Cologne, 1601, elles se trouvent aussi dans les actes de Bollandus au quatrième de Janvier, qui fut le jour de la mort de cette sainte. On les a aussi publiées en diverses langues, nommément en François à Paris, et en Flamen à Anvers, 1628. [Propter eas quæ illic loci memoratæ sunt, dicuntur et eadem Beatæ Angelæ Opera, anno 1618; à puella nobili Madritensi, Francisca de los Rios, duodecim annos nata, in Hispanicam linguam è Latina esse conversa et publicata.] Mais comme on n'en trouvait plus de françoises, on vint d'en faire depuis peu (en 1696.) une nouvelle traduction qu'on a publiée sous le titre de la "Théologie de la Croix de J. Ch.; ou les Œuvres et la vie de la Bienheureuse ANGELE de Foligni." On y a digéré le tout en meilleur ordre.

Ses œuvres contiennent une recommandation très-pathétique de la vie de J. Christ, et de ses trois compagnes indissolubles, la pauvreté, le mépris, et les souffrances; de l'oraison; de l'humilité; de l'amour spirituel; des dons de Dieu à ses amans; du sacrement de l'amour: de la présence et de l'habitation de Dieu dans l'ame, et des communications surnaturelles de Dieu, avec des précautions nécessaires contre les illusions. Sa vie y est divisée en trois parties, dont la première contient la description de sa conversion, de sa pénitence, et de sa purification terrible: la seconde les manières surnaturelles dont Dieu lui a communiqué ses consolations, ses lumières, les connoissances de soi, de ses attributs, et des choses qui regardent notre redemption et notre salut: et la troisième, ses derniers discours, son Testament, et sa très-heureuse mort, qui avint l'an 1309. On trouve joints à cette édition les exercices de Blosius sur la passion de J. Christ.

* Sola plerumque Auctorum nomina descripta sunt; rarius et casu, librorum tituli adscripti. Prætor Latinos aut Gallicos auctores, pauci in alijs idiomatibus scripti hic recensentur; quod rarius occurrit his in locis, imò in Bibliothecis vel Bibliopolis alioqui instructissimis, unde et mystici, ut plurimum, exulunt. Hinc quoque non pauci à mysticis sunt hic prætermitti, quos vero è catalogis variorum, in quorum nonnullis libri mystici cum asceticis, imò et satis vulgari modo pijs interdum recensentur, nolui desumere, ne forte, iis à me non visis, catalogus hic, solis destinatus qui mysticum characterem, vel ascetico-mysticum habent, alios vel vulgarioris vel alterius ordinis, licet alias suo modo bonos ac pios, contineret qui nihilominus si istriusmodi unum atque alterum contineat forsitan, inde id erit, quod mihi commendati fuerint, nec tamen adhuc conspecti.

Monsieur de BERNIERES LOUVIGNY, conseiller du Roi, et Trésaurier de France au bureau de Caen, où sans maladie il est mort du baiser de l'amour dans l'ardeur de l'oraison, l'an 1659, est bien, quant à l'affectif, dans le caractère de Ste. Thérèse : mais pour le sujet et le dogmatique il est entièrement dans celui de Ste. Angele, dont il était admirateur et grand imitateur, ne prenant rien tant à cœur à son exemple que la croix de Jesus Christ, l'imitation et l'inculcation de la pauvreté, de l'abjection, et des souffrances du Fils de Dieu, choses que ce saint homme recommande par tout comme le haut point de la perfection en cette vie. Ses divins écrits sont remplis du véritable esprit du Christianisme le plus solide. Son Chretien interieur, qui a été imprimé des vingtaines fois en France, et qu'on a traduit et publié en Flamén, et même en Italien, outre le sujet qu'on vient d'indiquer en général, traite spécialement des matières mystiques, de la présence de Dieu et de l'oraison, dans les livres 3 et 7. On avait dessein de publier encore beaucoup de ses autres ouvrages, et cela s'était commencé par l'addition d'un second tome au Chretien interieur, et par l'édition de ses divines Maximes et de ses excellentes Lettres; mais sa vie, et quatre autres ouvrages qu'on avait promis dans la préface qui est à la tête de ses Œuvres spirituelles, n'ont point encore vu le jour, et peut-être ne le verront jamais, vu l'opposition que la science acquise selon le monde forme journellement contre l'avancement de la science infuse par l'Esprit de Dieu, et la contrariété qu'il y a entre la piété d'apparence, qui domine par tout, et celle qui est véritablement solide, intérieure et cachée.

HENRI SUSO, un saint Dominiquain du quatorzième siècle est aussi dans l'esprit et dans le caractère de Ste. Angele de Foligni. Le vieux original Allemand de ses œuvres ne se trouve plus : mais on en a, comme de Taulière, une traduction Latine par Surius, imprimée à Cologne plusieurs fois, dont la dernière est de l'an 1615, et c'est sur elle qu'on a fait la traduction Allemande d'à présent, imprimée aussi à Cologne, en 1661. Entre ses œuvres, le Dialogue de la sagesse éternelle avec son disciple, quatre sermons, douze lettres, sa vie (qui est une très belle pièce écrite par une de ses filles spirituelles, mais qui est incomplète,) ses Méditations sur la passion, et ses Exercices, Heures, et l'office de la sagesse éternelle, ont pour matière principale les souffrances et la croix de Jesus, aussi bien que la patience et la resignation avec quoi nous devons y participer. Son Dialogue de la Verité et de son disciple, traite encore d'autres matières sublimes et mystiques, aussi bien que son traité des neuf Roches, que l'on doit monter pour retrouver notre principe, après avoir montré auparavant par une description de la corruption qui regnait alors dans toutes sortes d'états de la Chrétienté, combien tous, tant ecclésiastiques que séculiers, étaient déçus et éloignés de Dieu. Toutes ses œuvres, à la réserve du Dialogue de la Verité, ont été traduites en Français et imprimées à Paris, en 1614, et tout fraîchement (en 1684,) on y publia une nouvelle traduction de son Dialogue de la Sagesse éternelle, dédié à l'Evêque de Meaux.

Suso était un homme d'une mortification incroyable, d'une humilité sans bornes, d'une douceur et d'une patience à toute épreuve, et un amateur incomparable de la sacrée humanité du Fils de Dieu et de ses souffrances, qualité qu'il semblait avoir hérité de sa sainte Mère, laquelle mourut un Vendredi Saint, de pure compassion aux souffrances du Fils de Dieu et de la sainte Vierge, qui le voyait agoniser sur la croix.

Outre les exercices de Taulère et les méditations de S. Catherine de Sienne dont on fera mention, et qui sont dans le caractère de la croix de Jesus Christ, il y a aussi la plus grande partie de la vie de Ste. Marie Madeleine de Patzi : l'aiguillon de l'amour divin de S. BONAVENTURE : La quatrième partie des méditations de LOUIS DU PONT, dont l'ouvrage vaut bien tous les sermons imaginables de ce temps, n'y ayant nulles vérités chrétiennes dont la connaissance soit nécessaire, qui n'y soit réduite en méditation utile et pieuse : Les Elevations sur la passion, d'un Père de l'Oratoire, à Paris, 1677. Le livre Flamén Sponsus sanguinus, imprimé souvent à Anvers, qui comprend une vingtaine de méditations en forme sur la passion de notre Seigneur, dont l'auteur (Michael Zachmoter) est celui du Thalamus Sponsi. A quoi je dois ajouter (en laissant là plusieurs autres) un autre petit livret Flamén presque inconnu, mais fort solide, intitulé le Secret de l'état et de la vie de J. C. à Amsterdam, 1653. L'auteur était éclairé, quoiqu'idiot et homme de métier, et se nommait Henri Gerrits, marqué par ces deux lettres H. G.—De doloribus Christi mentalibus sive spiritalibus, qui omnium præcipui sunt, exstant Virginis cujusdam anonymæ Meditationes egregiæ octo, quæ, ut plurimum libello Pugnæ Spiritualis P. BERTOT.—Le Directeur Mystique, ou les œuvres spirituelles, etc. Cologn. 1726.

ANNOTATION.—Les écrits et les lettres de Monsieur Bertot enseignent la même doctrine que les œuvres de Mons. de Bernières (à qui il était l'ami intime et le fils spirituel) et ne marquent pas moins la solidité de ses lumières et de ses expériences dans les voies de l'oraison, sur tout dans celles de l'oraison passive en pure et nue foi, que les beaux talens qu'il avait reçus de Dieu, pour y bien acheminer les âmes capables de ses grâces, pour y animer et affermir celles qui y sont déjà entrées, et pour préserver les unes et les autres de toute illusion.

Ceux qui auront vu l'Histoire de la Vie de Madame Guyon écrite par elle-même, y auront remarqué sans doute, que notre auteur a été son directeur presque durant tout le tems que le divin amour la conduisit par les voies les plus dures et les plus rigoureuses pour lui faire trouver la vie resuscitée en Dieu par le moyen assuré de la croix et de la mort entière. On trouvera même entre ses lettres plusieurs qui ont été écrites à cette dame, et que ceux qui auront lu sa vie avec quelque application, discernent aisément. Il est vrai qu'elle reconnaît, que par une providence toute particulière, et pour lui oter tous les appuis qui auraient pu empêcher en elle la perte de toute vie propretière, et pour lui oter pour son intérieur. Cependant M. Bertot étant mort dans les commencemens de la vie nouvelle, où la divine bonté la fit heureusement entrer après l'avoir délivrée de toutes ses peines, elle nous marque que non seulement elle eut quelque signe de sa mort, et même qu'elle fut la seule à qui il s'adressa, mais aussi qu'il lui a semblé qu'il lui fit part de son esprit pour aider ses enfans spirituels.

En effet on trouvera une entière conformité entre les principes et les avis de ce directeur éclairé et de cette grande âme si profondément instruite de Dieu par une longue expérience dans les secrets les plus intérieurs de son amour, qu'elle éclaircit avec une netteté et une facilité qui semble même surpasser celle de son directeur, qui cependant ne laisse pas d'expliquer les mêmes sujets avec onction et avec force d'une manière qui peut beaucoup servir à en applanir les difficultés, et à rassurer et avancer les âmes appelées à ces sacrés voies, si cachées aux sages et aux justes propriétaires.

Monsieur Bertot était natif du diocèse de Coutances en Normandie, où il fut fait prêtre. Il était grand ami de feu Messire Jean de Bernières-Louvigni, trésorier de France à Caen, si connu par ses œuvres spirituelles, qui mourut en odeur de grande piété le 13. Mai 1659. Après la mort de ce cher ami, qu'il regardait comme son père spirituel, il s'appliqua à diriger les âmes dans plusieurs communautés de religieux. Plusieurs personnes de considération de l'un et de l'autre sexe [et même quelques uns qui étaient engagés dans des charges importantes tant à la cour qu'à la guerre] le consultèrent pour apprendre de lui les voies du salut, et il tâcha de les aider par ses instructions et par ses lettres. Il continua cet exercice jusqu'au tems que la providence l'attacha à la direction des religieux Benedictines de l'Abbaie de Montmartre proche Paris, où il est resté dans cet emploi environ douze ans jusqu'à sa mort. C'était un homme de bon conseil et fort intérieur, comme on verra par ses œuvres. Ses expériences lui avaient fait connaître que pour servir Dieu en esprit et en vérité, il fallait beaucoup plus travailler à se rendre à Dieu par le cœur que par l'esprit, et s'efforcer davantage à vaincre ses humeurs et sa nature dans l'anéantissement et la pratique de la croix, qu'à se nourrir de spéculations stériles des sciences humainement acquises. Après avoir travaillé avec beaucoup de zèle dans la communauté où il est mort, il y mourut [environ le commencement de Mars, 1681,] après une longue maladie de langueur, où il passa par toutes les épreuves des plus douloureuses croix. Son corps fut enterré dans l'Eglise de Montmartre au côté droit en entrant. Les personnes de considération qu'il avait dirigées, ont toujours conservé un si grand respect pour sa mémoire, qu'ils allaient souvent à son tombeau pour y offrir leurs prières.

BOURIGNON, Antonia.

ANNOTATION.—Cet écrivain n'affecte ni le style ni les matières sublimes des mystiques : elle n'insiste que sur le substantiel de la doctrine evangelique, l'abnégation, la mortification de la nature, l'imitation de Jesus Christ, la pratique des vertus, l'amour de Dieu et la dépendance de lui. —Voici le véritable caractère de ses écrits. C'est une force lumineuse, libre, naïve, douce, solide, simple, facile, d'usage universel et proportionné à la capacité de tous et des enfans mêmes ; (so writes her admirer, Poiret,) impartiale, pure, animante, et qui détermine vivement et circonscrit véritablement les âmes sincères à des actes réels et-particuliers de conduite, de pénitence, d'abandonnement du monde et de ses affections, de renoncement à soi, d'amour de Dieu, et de dépendance de lui par la resignation de notre volonté entre ses mains, afin que reprenant domination sur nous comme sur Adam avant le péché, il rétablisse et gouverne en suite pleinement toutes choses selon sa divine volonté.

Dans plusieurs autres écrits, pour bons qu'ils soient, on n'aperçoit souvent les choses qu'en général et de telle sorte, que quand on veut en venir à la pratique particulière, on ne sait encore bien de quelle manière s'y prendre. Ici on se sent tiré hors de cette indtermination, et on se voit montrer pas pour pas où il faut mettre le pied. Ou se sent comme mené et appliqué par la main à l'œuvre qu'il faut entreprendre, et animé au dedans d'une manière qui n'est pas ordinaire. De plus on y trouve des explications et des lumières non-communes sur les grands principes de la puissance, bonté, justice, vérité et sagesse de Dieu : sur la création glorieuse du monde et de l'homme : sur sa chute et sa corruption déplorable et infinie : sur Jesus Christ, sa naissance d'Adam,* (1) ses fonctions, son royaume, celui de l'Antéchrist, le déchet du vrai Christianisme dans toutes les religions par la faute de leurs conducteurs, la destruction des méchants, le renouvellement de l'Eglise et du monde. Ou y trouve l'essentiel de la religion et de la vertu, distingué de leur accessoire : l'anéantissement des controverses inutiles et des hérésies pernicieuses : la conduite qu'il faut tenir en toutes choses : le réveil de l'inquiétude où l'âme doit être si long temps qu'on ne s'est pas rendu entièrement à Dieu ; et la découverte de la tromperie du cœur humain en tous, et particulièrement dans les faux spirituels et dévots, qui se piquant de faire grand cas de toutes sortes de livres spirituels et mystiques, n'ont pu tenir bon devant ceux-ci pour lesquels seuls ils ont une aversion qu'ils voudraient bien inspirer à tous, les uns finement, et les autres plus manifestement : parce qu'ils voient que ces vérités les dégradent de leur prétendue spiritualité, et les font paraître à leurs yeux et à ceux des autres pour tout autres qu'ils ne voudraient.

Quoique je ne trouve point d'écrivains qui soient pleinement dans le caractère de Madlle. Bourignon tel qu'on vient de le marquer, néanmoins comme une des choses qui a éclaté le plus dans

* Her works in French are comprised in nineteen volumes, and were published in 12mo. 1686. The editor was the devout and indefatigable Poiret, who was not so discriminating in his approbations, as talented in defending what he deemed to be the interests of vital christianity. If an author did but write in the strain he admired, he seemed to adopt all their peculiarities, visions, and revelations, with what was orthodox in their performances. In the present case, this authoress, along with much that was good and solid, advances several confused and heretical notions, (which she had made to herself, doubtless from misconceived scraps of Behmen, and other writers,) concerning the state of Adam when in paradise—among other things, that 'Jesus Christ was then born of him,' (as the "first born of the creation,") 'who, at Adam's fall, became invisible, only occasionally showing himself to the patriarchs, prophets, etc., until the time of the virgin;' with a number of similar fantastic conceits, all which she gives forth as a pure revelation from God to her! The Chevalier Ramsay adopts a few of these crudities; as likewise Dr. Garden, in his "Apology for A. Bourignon," 8vo, London, 1699; also Marsay, and others, of her own country. Seven volumes of her practical works were translated into English, and published partly at the expense of the Hon. Robert Boyle. She appears to have been, naturally, of a dark sour temperament; and, when a young woman, being subjected to severe trials from a cross-grained step-mother, and an unfeeling father, she turned to religion, with many prayers, fastings, self-denials, and ascetic practices, and in due time, after the ordinary experience of such a complexion, was brought into liberty. Her constitutional temperament seems still to have predominated in her regenerate state, as manifest in her published life and works. The former is about as profitable for perusal, as any of her other writings, two or three of which may deserve a perusal. There is an affecting anecdote elle a été la déclaration vive et intrépide qu'elle a faite de la corruption universelle de l'Eglise chrétienne, et spécialement de l'état ecclésiastique, il me semble que le saint Dominicain du siècle pénultième, SAVONAROLA, en approche beaucoup de ce côté-là. Ceux qui auront lu quelques sermons de ce S. Religieux, par exemple ceux qu'il fit sur le livre de Ruth, (pourvu que l'exemplaire qu'on aura ne soit pas de ceux de Salamanque, 1556, dont les gens d'Eglise ont fait arracher le septième sermon, qui était tout pour eux,) ceux sur Michée, ou du moins le peu qui s'en voit dans les additions de sa vie, publiée à Paris, en 1674, avec une partie de ses révelations et de ses lettres spirituelles, pourront juger si je dis vrai, sur tout quand ils auront pris garde, que comme les ecclésiastiques otèrent la vie à ce saint homme à cause de sa liberté à leur dire leurs vérités, (aussi bien qu'à Molinos.) Madlle. B. l'aurait de même perdue cent fois pour le même sujet, si Dieu ne l'avait continuellement empêchée de tomber entre les mains de ses persécuteurs.

ANNOTATION.—Cet auteur ayant dessein de faciliter l'acquisition de la perfection par la recommandation d'un moyen le plus évident, le plus incontestable, le plus facile, et le plus accompli, composa en Latin, en Français, et en Anglais, un petit traité sous le titre de Règle de la perfection, où il réduit tout à l'unique principe de la volonté de Dieu, qui est le caractère de son livre. Ce principe indisputable et approuvé de tous les chrétiens, même de toutes les créatures raisonnables, sert beaucoup à faire qu'on réduise tout en acte et en pratique, aussi bien qu'à désabuser ceux qui s'imaginent pour eux, ou qui veulent persuader aux autres, que la vie spirituelle ne consiste qu'en je ne sais quelles spéculations abstraites d'un esprit tout oisif et sans action. Il veut que la seule volonté de Dieu soit le principe et le but que nous regardions en toutes choses : et ayant divisé cette volonté en trois, par application à un passage de l'apôtre, assavoir, en volonté extérieure et bonne ; intérieure et agréable ; et intime ou essentielle, suréminente et parfaite ; il emploie la première partie de son livre à faire voir, comment la volonté de Dieu, qui regarde nos actions, étant connue par la loi de Dieu, ou par la droite raison, ou par le commandement des supérieurs, ou par l'événement des choses qui nous arrivent, doit être faite ou admise actuellement, uniquement, volontairement, confidemment, avec lumière et avec promptitude. Après quoi, la volonté de Dieu se fait sentir dans l'intérieur de l'âme, et s'y manifeste d'une manière toute lumineuse et savoureuse, suivie d'admiration, d'humiliation, d'exultation et d'élévation de l'esprit à Dieu : ce qui fait sa seconde partie, suivie d'une troisième qui traite d'une communication toute intime et surnaturelle. Ce Dieu-même, de laquelle communication l'auteur rapporte le moyen, qui est unique ; et les manières qui sont deux, et qui sont applicables à deux sortes de personnes : il fait sur l'une et sur l'autre de ces manières, l'énumération de plusieurs points et de diverses observations et précautions nécessaires touchant la vie mystique et intérieure, lesquelles pourtant reviennent toutes à l'anéantissement passif, qui est pour l'amour fructif de contemplation et d'union ; et à l'anéantissement actif, qui est pour l'amour pratique, par lequel on doit agir spirituellement ou corporellement au dehors.

Comme cet auteur était savant, il est autant méthodique et systématique que solide, éclairé et circonspect, ne manquant d'aucune précaution nécessaire non seulement contre la fausse mystique et la fausse quiétude* ou oisiveté de la nature, mais aussi contre la surprise où l'on pourrait être à l'occasion des mots et des manières de parler dont il se sert, lesquels il fait voir dans les saints docteurs qui l'ont précédé ; sujet que *Sandaeus a pourtant traité plus amplement dans son ouvrage Latin, intitulé "Clavis seu Onomasticum Theologiae Mysticae," Coloniae, 1640. Comme aussi related therein, of the pastor of Blatton, George de Lisle, who having, in a state of worldly folly and inebriety, escaped sudden death, was so struck with the goodness of God in thus preserving him from rushing into perdition, that he became a true penitent, and most zealously holy man. She relates his burning devotion to God, and love to his neighbour, also the great austerities he practised upon himself. He renounced all studies and all curious learning, reserving only two books, viz : the Holy Bible, and the Lives of the Saints ; in which this man of God read every day a chapter, and in the other a life, saying of these two books, here's the doctrine ! (the Bible) : and here's the practice ! (the Lives of the Saints). He had thus lived many years, when A. B. first met with him, being then sixty years of age ; and continued in it twelve years more.—Her works are now of little value, as what is edifying in them, though there is much force in her practical exhortations, may be found in a more attractive form, and free from all unprofitable admixtures, in other theological and devotional authors. She died 1680, and doubtless was an instrument of the Divine wisdom, in the renovation of the Gospel spirit. For further particulars concerning her, and the times in which she lived, consult Poiret's works, and the "Apology" for her, published, 1699. Poiret, and some others, I take to have been the correspondents in Holland, of the Philadelphians of London, 1697—1703.

le D. le Brun dans son traité Français Eclaircissement de la théologie mystique, imprimé à Rouen, 1659; et tout récemment M. l'Archevêque de Cambrai dans ses Maximes des saints, qui ont fait tant de bruit, et qui nonobstant les censures que chacun sait, ne laissent pas d'avoir encore beaucoup d'approuvateurs, qui même croient que bien loin que l'auteur y ait porté les choses trop haut, il y en a qui y sont trop étendue, et bien loin encore de la sublimité du sens des saints et des vrais mystiques.

Le livre de Canfield a été traduit en Flamen et en plusieurs autres langues, et imprimé plusieurs fois. La dernière édition Française de Paris, 1666, est augmentée d'un Eclaircissement général sur la division de l'ouvrage et de la conversion, comme aussi de la vie de l'auteur, qui était noble Anglais de nation, et prédicateur Capucin de profession, dans laquelle il mourut à Paris, l'an 1620, après avoir prononcé ces paroles dans une extase d'amour : o merveille ! o abyme sans mesure de l'amour de Dieu ! On a imprimé un très-petit abrégé Latin de tout son livre à Lucerne, 1649.

Le traité de la Sagesse chrétienne, ou de la Science de l'uniformité aux volontés de Dieu, que M. D'ARGENSON, conseiller du Roi, fit en prison, et qui est imprimé à Paris, l'an 1651, roule sur le même principe de Canfield, et n'est pas moins solide, spirituel, et facile, que très-bien écrit.

ANNOTATION.—Cette illustre et sainte dame de la très noble maison de Fieschi, et dont le Père fut vice-roi de Naples, a été, quoique femme mariée, une ame des plus spirituelles et une des plus parfaites amantes de Dieu qui ait vécu des long temps sur la terre. Son caractère est un amour de Dieu si pur, si relevé, si fort, si singulier, qu'il ne se trouve sur ce sujet ni dans les exemples ni dans les écrits des saints et des docteurs rien qui approche de la sublimité et de la force de ce très-pur amour, qui l'ayant parfaitement investie et convertie en un instant, lui brûlait l'ame et le corps tout le temps de sa vie, et ne lui laissait rien respirer, rien pratiquer, rien dire, rien écrire, qu'A-mour tout pur et tout incomparable.

On voit dans elle et dans ses écrits comment ce noble et ce pur amour, qui ne cherche uniquement que Dieu et sa seule gloire, comprend en soi seul toutes choses, et la fin souveraine, et toutes les voies, et tous les moyens pour atteindre au plus haut degré de la perfection. Elle y fait voir, comment de la source de l'amour se dérivent la connoissance et la reconnoissance de notre corruption et malignité infinie; celle de notre néant et de notre impuissance à bien faire; celle de l'absurdité de la vaine gloire; le renoncement à soi et à tout, la parfaite contrition, l'horreur du péché, la mortification et la sanctification du corps de l'ame et de l'esprit, l'acquiescement à la justice de Dieu, la patience parfaite, une charité et une compassion toute vive pour le prochain, et choses de cette nature, qui sont du devoir de tous ceux qui veulent être sauvés. Elle déduit ci et là de la même source mille belles et convaincantes lumières sur les plus importantes et les plus difficiles matières de la théologie, sur l'incompréhensibilité de Dieu et de son amour, sur les attributs de sa puissance, de sa sagesse, bonté, miséricorde, justice, et sur la manière dont ils correspondent avec les créatures tant bonnes que mauvaises : sur la grace, sa prévention, son universalité, sa manière d'opérer, la résistibilité à elle, son efficacité; sur le franc-arbitre, la puissance, et l'impuissance de l'homme, sa coopération avec Dieu dans l'œuvre de son salut; et enfin, sur toute la théologie mystique et sur ses voies de purification, d'illumination, d'ancantissement des puissances, d'union, de transformation, et de déification. Toutes lesquelles choses sont des écoulements et des irradiations ardentes de l'amour tout pur de l'Esprit de Dieu, qui la remplissait et la gouvernait.

Les œuvres de cette grande sainte, qui vécut et mourut à Gènes il y a deux siècles, furent traitées de l'Italien en Français et publiées il y a environ cent ans à Paris par les P. P. Chartreux de Bourgfontaine; puis réimprimées diverses fois à Paris et à Lyon, jusqu'à ce qu'en 1667. On en retoucha le style et les réimprima à Paris, mais en y faisant plus de retranchemens et de changemens qu'il ne convenait : à quoi l'on a eu dessein de remédier par la nouvelle édition qu'on en a faite depuis peu aux Pays Bas sous le titre de la Théologie de l'Amour, ou la Vie et les œuvres de Ste. Catherine de Genes, 1691. On y a divisé sa vie (qui est un ouvrage de son confesseur, en trois parties, qui sont sa conversion, ses discours et entretiens, et ses dernières heures. Les trois Dialogues ont pour sujet, le premier la chute de l'ame, sa conversion et sa purification active par l'infusion de l'amour : le second, la purification passive de l'ame et de l'esprit par de nouvelles infusions du même amour; et le troisième, plusieurs questions de l'ame et réponses de Dieu sur la nature, les causes, les opérations, et les effets de ce pur amour de Dieu : par lequel principe aussi elle explique à part la nature de la purification des ames après la mort. Tout cela d'une manière infiniment solide et touchante.

Quoique cette admirable sainte soit unique dans ce genre là, et qu'il n'y ait rien de pareil à ses écrits pour échauffer et enflammer les cœurs dans l'amour de Dieu, néanmoins Ste. Catherine de Sienna, dont on vient de parler, approche au plus près de ce caractère là, mais sur tout le noble et saint aveugle de Brétagne, JEAN DE S. SAMSON, Carme déchaussé, qui mourut à Rennes, l'an 1636, après avoir dicté bien soixante traités spirituels et mystiques sur différents sujets, dont pourtant on n'a imprimé jusqu'ici, (que je sache) que deux volumes in quarto, le premier, qui contient sa Vie, ses maximes, et quelques autres traités, à Paris, l'an 1651, et celui-ci a été traduit et publié en Latin à Lyon, 1655; le second, l'an 1654, avec réimpression du premier. Ce dernier contient ses Contemplations sur tous les mystères du salut, avec quelques autres petits ouvrages, qui, comme tout le reste, ne sont, que des saillies ou des torrens d'un amour infini qui y domine par tout, et qui lui fait donner à Dieu par tout le nom de son Amour et de son cher Amour, et a ses livres les titres de Miroirs et de Flammes d'amour: Amour aspiratif: Consommation de l'âme en Dieu par l'Amour: soliloque. Epithalame de l'Époux divin, etc. Son traité de l'amour aspiratif a été réimprimé depuis peu dans le second volume de la Théologie du Cœur; et l'on trouve un abrégé de ses Maximes annexé à la dernière édition de la Théologie Récèle.*

Entre les anciens il paraît par les sept lettres véritables de St. IGNAÇE d'Antioche, que ce saint Martyr était entièrement du même esprit et le même caractère de l'amour divin. Sa seule lettre aux Romains (que le P. Ruinart vient de publier le premier en grec avec les actes de son martyre, à la fin de ses Acta martyrum sincera) en est une preuve singulière et divinement convaincante, aussi bien que ses six autres lettres qu'on a réimprimées plusieurs fois sur la publication de Vossius, qui au reste, a témoigné trop de mépris pour les lettres qu'on nomme interpolées, et trop de passion contre l'auteur de cette interpolation, lequel a plutôt prétendu donner une manière de paraphrase des lettres du S. Martyr, que d'en corrompre le texte, puis qu'en effet, il en a conservé toute la substance et le caractère de l'esprit d'amour.

* Hæc dum primum scriberem, nondum videre licuerat vitam ARMELLE NICOLÆ, vulgo bonæ Armellæ dictæ, a religiosa quadam Virgine idiote Gallico solide admodum conscriptam, ac Parisiis, anno 1683; secundis typis impressam: alioqui minime dubitasset eam S. Catharinæ Genuensi haud secus ac veram sodalem adjungere, quippe eodem divini ardentisque Amoris Dei dominante principio, ac proinde eodem admirabili sacroque cum eo Characterè imbutam. Quin et asseri potest hujus vitam ejusque singulas agendi rationes quippiam esse si non admirabilius, imitabilius tamen, ac proinde generalioris utilitatis pro quibusvis. Certus ego sum omnes eos quibus ad divina aliquid cordis sinceri superest non minus hinc emolumenti quam commotionis esse nacturos; neque dubito quin quisquis me suadente admirandam istam vitam legere in mentem inducturus est, gratum erga me ea de causa sentiat animum. Id verò bonum quo magis cum omnibus communicetur, nuperime (anno 1703.) data est opera ut Vita hæc, idque correctius, sub prælo in hisce provinciis revocaretur cum titulo, L'École du pur Amour de Dieu ouverte aux Savans et aux ignorans dans la vie merveilleuse d'une pauvre fille idiote, paisanne de naissance et servante de condition, ARMELLE NICOLAS, decedee depuis peu en Bretagne, etc. quam dolendum sit inventum fuisse [Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, 1703] qui, nescio quo instinctu, certe non Dei, ut tantum bonum supprimeret, vel cassum redderet, simulque confirmaret, se (quod non pauci dudum animadverterunt) nullius libri analysis ac contenta debito modo exhibendi pacem esse, dissimulatis vitæ hujus solidissimis virtutibus ac veritatibus reique medulla, collegit tantum ex ea pusilla quædam quæ putavi plerisque fore vel invisa vel ridicula, atque adeo eos ab insigni hocce pietatis ac sanctitatis adminiculo deterrentia: quo vero artificio pudendo vel ipsa Biblia Sacra possint a quolibet animo traduci improbo, vel Protestantium probissimi condemnari quod pia Romano-Catholicorum scripta plurima, v. g. Sed cum relationis istius auctor amicus esset intimus sodalisque celeberrimi hominum diviniorem (veluti Davidis) sacramentum rerum irrisoris Bailii, qui etiam in posthumo scripto suo ultimo (cui noster cum elogio præfatus creditur) libertatem hominis irrisurus divinum ex Armellæ testimonium pro ludibrio adducit; quid mirum si hanc diviniorem irridendi methodum noster ex ejusmodi socio imitari didicit? ANNOTATION.—Il va de pair avec Harphius en sublimité, et le surpasse même dans les choses qui lui sont particulières. Son but est de recommander la pureté de l'âme* en faisant voir quelque échantillon des caresses et des délices de Dieu avec une âme épurée. Outre la voie de la purification active (qu'il propose d'une manière fort propre à purger l'esprit des savans qui cherchent Dieu,) et la même en tant qu'elle se fait par la pratique des vertus, (où il veut qu'on se rende toujours à ce qui est le moindre et le plus pénible,) le caractère singulier de J. de la Croix est—celui d'une nudité si universelle de l'âme et de ses puissances, que même elles s'étendent jusqu'à se dénuer de l'attachement à toutes les grâces sensibles et particulières que Dieu donne souvent aux commengans, soit qu'elles viennent par la voie des sens ou de l'imagination, ou par celle des autres puissances, à la réserve seulement des paroles substantielles et des attachemens substantiels de Dieu. Il prémunit l'âme plus qu'aucun autre auteur contre toutes les illusions spirituelles, quelles qu'elles puissent être; de sorte que moyennant qu'on suive ses principes, on marchera à pied ferme et hors de tout peril d'illusion dans les voies de l'Esprit par la pureté de la foi nue, de l'espérance, et de la charité.—Une autre partie du caractère particulier de ce sublime auteur, est la purification passive tant de l'âme que de l'esprit, ou la préparation prochaine pour s'unir à Dieu, de laquelle purification il traite plus à fond, plus en détail, et plus vivement (dans sa Nuit Obscure) que personne ait encore fait.—Et pour troisième, il traite (dans sa Vive Flamme de l'Amour) de l'union divine et de ses merveilles, d'une manière beaucoup plus particularisée et plus merveilleuse que qui que ce soit; comme aussi (dans son Cantique de l'Epoux Divin et de l'Epouse) des différentes conduites et des vicissitudes de caresses amoureuses et d'épreuves amères qui se passent entre Dieu et une âme qui est arrivée à l'union divine; mais qui durant cette vie doit être exercée de Dieu en diverses manières pour les fins que Dieu sait.†

Cet auteur profond et solide dit les choses d'une manière qu'on sent bien venir de source et d'expérience, et qui leur attire beaucoup d'attention et de respect. Il a écrit en Espagnol, étant Carme dechaussé de cette nation et coadjuteur de Ste. Thérèse dans le siècle où se firent les grands schismes qui divisent encore aujourd'hui la chrétienté. Sa vie, qu'on a en petit abrégé, et dans un autre traité plus au long fait foi que c'était une âme d'une pureté Angélique; avantage qui donne un grand poids à tous ses écrits. On les a traduits et publiés en Latin à Cologne, 1639; en Alleman à Prague, 1697; et ailleurs en plusieurs autres langues. On en a deux traductions Françaises, l'une ancienne, qui a été imprimée à Paris quatre ou cinq fois, dont la dernière est de l'an 1665, avec l'addition d'un traité d'un autre religieux touchant l'union de l'âme avec Dieu, par où il prétend mettre un supplément nécessaire aux œuvres de notre auteur; quoique cette pièce ne soit qu'un morceau assez sec de la scholastique, qu'on a bien fait d'omettre dans la nouvelle traduction. Cette seconde traduction des œuvres de notre auteur publiée à Paris, l'an 1694, par le P. Maillard Jésuite, est d'un style très-pur, elle tourne bien des choses d'une manière plus claire que l'ancienne et avec des expressions plus heureuses: mais outre qu'il semble que le traducteur n'ait pas bien compris le sens de quelques endroits, l'on y a fait trop de retranchement sous prétexte d'éviter des redites, mais peut-être pour par même moyen supprimer des passages à présent incommodes à plusieurs, ou de la nature de celui qu'on a retranché dans Harphius, de quoi l'explication du 3e. couplet du Cantique de la vive flamme d'amour pourrait bien donner des exemples. Et ainsi ceux qui voudront avoir cet auteur dans toute son intégrité s'en tiendront aux premières éditions, d'autant plus qu'on y trouve aussi trois discours et deux livres ou parties d'éclaircissements tant sur la Théologie Mystique que sur ses phrases ou ses expressions et sur celle de l'auteur: traités qui éclaircissent ces matières là, et en enlèvent beaucoup de difficultés, tant par des raisons, que par quantité d'autorités qui y sont produites pour prévenir la foiblesse ou la malignité de ceux, qui pourroient les tirer en sens désavantageux. La dernière édition a cependant un autre avantage, c'est qu'on y trouve à la fin un recueil très utile de toutes les Maximes spirituelles de notre auteur, lesquelles on a ramassées de toutes ses œuvres sur toutes sortes de sujets. ||

Si vero opera mea exspectas, ut ipsis intercedentibus annuas orationi mee, da illa tu, Domine et in me illa operare; nec non poenas quas tibi placuerit acceptare, mitte; ec sic fiat! Quod si opera mea præstolari non vis, quid, o Clematissime Domine, exspectas? cur moraris? cur tandem, si gratia et misericordia futura est, quam in Filio tuo requiro? Accipe operum meorum teruncium siquidem tibi placet; et hoc mihi bonum largire siquidem etiam et hoc tu vis. Quis evadere poterit infimos modos ac terminos, nisi tu, o Deus meus, in puritate amoris eum erigas ad te?*

Comme cet Auteur a redonné dans ce dernier siècle beaucoup de poids et un grand lustre à la Théologie Mystique, aussi plusieurs qui en ont écrit, se sont fort servis et prévalus de ses lumières, les uns en le nommant et les autres sans le nommer. En voici quelques uns, qui pour ce sujet approchent les uns plus et les autres moins de son caractère :

Le Père Jean DE JESUS-MARIA, dans sa Théologie Mystique,* écrite en Latin et mise en Français par le Traducteur ancien des œuvres de J. de la Croix, à Paris 1666.

THOMAS à JESU, dont le Traité latin de l'Oraison divine imprimé à Anvers l'an 1623. est en quelque sorte un système de Théologie Mystique disposé selon les trois voies, de purification, d'illumination et d'union, et muni de quantité d'autorités de plusieurs auteurs spirituels. Cet auteur a encore écrit un autre traité latin de la Contemplation, imprimé au même lieu l'an 1620, où il déduit son sujet fort en détail et l'appuie de beaucoup d'autorités. Le reste de ses œuvres n'est pas de ce sujet. Il a écrit un Traité très touchant, sur les douleurs de Jesus Christ.

Le P. CONSTANTIN DE BARBANÇON, Capucin, semble n'avoir pas peu incorporé les vérités de notre auteur, particulièrement touchant la purification rigoureuse, dans son petit et excellent traité des Sentiers secrets de l'Amour Divin, qui fut publié presque en même temps en Français, en Latin et en Alleman, et qui vient d'être réimprimé fort nettement en latin sous le titre de Veræ Theologiæ Mysticæ Compendium, sive Semita occultæ Amoris Divini, Amstelod, 1698, et qui en effet est une espèce de Système Mystique. Son Anatomie de l'Ame, en trois partis, pp. 874, est une addition au livre des Secrets Sentiers. Cet Auteur est expert, pénétrant, court, et fructueux.

Je rangerais entre les Ecrivains Mystiques qui ont particulièrement profité des œuvres de J. de la Croix, le P. VICTOR GALENIUS, Capucin de Trèves, n'était que dans son Traité Latin, summa Practica Theologiæ Mysticæ, imprimé à Cologne, l'an 1646 et 1652. Il a voulu profiter indifféremment des lumières de toutes sortes d'Auteurs spirituels, à fin de donner au public le plus universel et le plus étendu de tous les systèmes qui aient encore paru sur les matières mystiques, tant de théorie que de pratique.

Les petits traités de l'Abrégé de la Perfection Chrétienne, et de l'Abnegation Interieure, ou de la Ruine de l'Amour propre et écrits le siècle passé en Italien, rendus publics en diverses langues, et réimprimés au Pays-bas, en 1690 et 1696, dans le premier volume des Recueils intitulés la Theologie du Cœur, § vont en substance sur les même principes, par les mêmes voles, et au même but “fundamento ponit affectuum, sensuum interiorum ac externorum, memoriae, intellectus et voluntatis mortificationem; ut anima a creaturis et a se ipsa liberata, se ad Deum elevet per obsecrationem fidei, firmitatem spei, et ardorem divinæ charitatis.

* Auctor hic Joanni à Cruce ac S. Teresie non parum debet, quippe qui eorum ope videatur ad divinarum rerum experientiam adductus; unde et hujus liber cum scriptorum illorum substantia apprime conspirat, et hominem divina passum, non obscure indicat. Huc autem redit ejus summa, animam puritati vitæ spiritusque humiliationi deditam, ac suos Deo affectus jungentem, ab ejus sapientiæ radio illustrari; unde vero Deum melius noscens atque excellentius amans, suaviusque gustans postquam ardentius ad eum aspiravit, tangitur tandem a Spiritu Sancto. quo vero in tactu sublimissimo ac ineffabili, Dei demum singulari atque intima cognitione ac contemplatione, purissimo amore, gustuque et fruitione ineffabili donatur. et hac quidem in re ipsam Theologiæ Mysticæ substantiam, imo et apicem, constituit auctor hic, eique insistit præcipue, prætermisiss quæ ad animæ purificationem pertinent, suntque inter præparatoria, ab aliis repetenda.

§ Hujus libri utrumque volumen prodiit Germanice Francofurti ac Lipsiæ, anno 1702. At primi voluminis tractatus primus, de Perfectione Christiana, præter interpretationes ac Editiones in Epistola recensitas, Germanice olim excusus est Norimbergæ, anno 1634, et Belgice Antverpiæ 1631. Similis ferme tituli atque argumenti (De Perfectione) reperitur tractatulus Accessionis instar adjectus Anonymi libro, Fides et Ratio collatæ dicto, nuperque (1707) mea cura emissio, qui liber divinarum ac spiritualium rerum tam theoreticarum quam practicarum principia capitæque præcipua contra errores perniciosiores, Rationalistarum præsertim, uti et tepidorum adulorum, soliditate nervosa, fructuosa, ac minime communi, palam ac sine respectu partium exhibet.

que notre Auteur, sans autre communication pourtant que celle du même Esprit: On aurait peine à trouver quelque chose de la force, de la régularité, de l'excellence, et en même temps de la brièveté de ces deux petits et admirables livrets, dont on tient que l'Auteur était une femme, quoique l'édition Italienne de Cologne 1642, dédiée au Nonce Chigi, qui depuis fut le Pape Alexandre VII, attribue le premier de ces ouvrages au Jésuite Gagliardi, contre l'opinion commune et celle des Editeurs de Paris de l'an 1598. On peut regarder ces deux petits traités, et sur tout le dernier, comme des petits abrégés systématiques de la Théologie Mystique la plus exempte des atteintes tant de l'illusion, que des chicaneries, de toutes sortes d'adversaires.

Enfin un Auteur, et même un Tableau original et vivant du caractère de J. de la Croix sur la matière de la Purification passive et rigoureuse, est MATHIEU WEXER, particulier qui mourut à Wesel l'an 1650, homme de douleur et homme éclairé d'en haut, comme en font foi ses Lettres pénétrantes et le recueil de ses divins Discours.

D. G. Anonymus Belga (David Georgius)—ill.

ANNOTATION.—Quant à l'anonyme Flamen (que l'on dit être le même qui est souvent marqué par les lettres D. G. ou D. J.)—il y a plus d'un siècle qu'un homme savant et qui paroissait avoir une pleine connoissance et de la personne de cet auteur, et de ses écrits, publia un petit abrégé du substantiel de sa doctrine qui revient à ceci :

De ramener les hommes à la vraie connoissance et au vrai culte de Dieu dont ils s'étaient tout égarés, les uns en faisant consister leur culte en une morale et en des devoirs purement humains, civils et pharisaïques; les autres, en l'usage de quelques cérémonies extérieures jointes à des spéculations, à des persuasions, et à des applications purement idéelles; au lieu que le vrai Culte consiste à donner à Dieu son cœur, ses sens, ses pensées, ses inclinations, et sa vie, le prenant pour principe et pour fin de tout ce que l'on fait et que l'on veut faire.

Que pour en revenir là, il est nécessaire que l'homme connoisse la profondeur effroyable de la corruption universelle où il est abîmé, tant par le péché originel, que par ses péchés actuels et habituels, laquelle corruption il doit avouer, sentir, gémir et déplorer devant Dieu, cherchant fermement et constamment sa délivrance réelle en J. Christ, dont la grace et l'esprit doit venir dans lui, y faire cesser et mourir le mal, et y produire une vie nouvelle en foi, sainteté, justice, et charité; de sorte que le cœur et l'esprit soient tellement occupés des choses célestes, que désormais dans toutes les pensées, dans toutes les entreprises, dans toutes les œuvres, et dans toutes les paroles, on ait toujours devant les yeux la haute Majesté de Dieu avec crainte, révérence, et reconnaissance. Et que c'est de la sorte qu'on pourra subsister devant Dieu dans le jugement effroyable qu'il est prêt de faire sur la terre, pour l'extermination du mal et le rétablissement du bien.

Que c'est là le substantiel de ce qu'il recommande, et que pour des opinions particulières et qui ne sont pas de nécessité au salut, comme touchant la nature des Anges, des Démon, de l'Enfer, de la place du Ciel, et choses semblables, il ne prescrit les siennes à personne, et laisse chacun libre d'en croire ce qu'il en découvrira dans les saintes Ecritures, selon la mesure des lumières qu'on en aura. Et en effet, la plupart des S. S. Pères de la primitive Eglise ont bien eu plusieurs opinions différentes, et même erronées, sur ces sortes de sujets, sans que pour cela on les ait moins estimés ou moins tolérés. Pour les assemblées et les cérémonies sacrées, qu'il est bon de s'en servir, tant pour son propre avancement, que pour celui des foibles et des infirmes.

L'Abréviateur ajoute, qu'il n'a jamais vu d'Auteur qui ait écrit avec tant de force et d'énergie, quoiqu'il ait lu avec assez de soin tous les écrivains qui sont de quelque considération dans l'Eglise Chrétienne.

Le Jurisconsulte Werdenhag dans la préface de son Introduction Latine aux livres de la République de Bodin; et Christien Hônouge, Ministre Protestant d'Allemagne, qui a écrit entre autres livres, une Théologie Mystique et un Christ inconnu, dans la préface duquel il fait mention de cet Auteur, en parlant comme d'une personne fort éclairée de Dieu. Le pieux et savant Castaro le consultait sur le sens de la Bible qu'il traduisait en Latin, et dont il ne publia la préface que sous ses avis.

J'ai oui faire le même jugement à plusieurs personnes qui avaient lu tous ses écrits, et qui d'ailleurs étaient gens d'esprit, pieux, sages, et même savants et très-savants. J'en ai connu qui ne pouvaient y lire sans se sentir tout remués de componction jusqu'au fond du cœur, et enflammés jusqu'à l'admiration. D'autres m'ont exprimé le caractère de cet Auteur en ces propres termes : "Cet homme divin (disent-ils) s'est bien peiné à inculquer aux âmes ce grand principe du vrai Christianisme, qui est de connoître d'expérience dans la lumière divine, les profondeurs de notre corruption et de notre misère; d'en porter intérieurement le deuil, avec un désir intime pour le bien et une vraie aversion pour le mal; et croire qu'on ne peut être délivré de l'un et acquiescer l'autre que par la grace de J. Christ dans nous." Cette même personne tenait cet Auteur pour un de tous les hommes qui ait le mieux entendu l'Ecriture. Pour moi, je puis assurer, que je n'ai rien vu que de bon et que de conforme à ce que dessus dans ceux de ces livres dont j'ai fait lecture. Mais si quelqu'un veut s'assurer par soi-même du fond de cet Auteur, il n'aura qu'à consulter ou ses Lettres, ou ses quatre petits Manuels; comme aussi les extraits qu'a produits tout fraîchement de ses écrits M. Gottfriede Arnoldi, ci-devant Professeur à Giessen, dans son Histoire (allemande) des Heresies, qu'il vient de rendre publique.

HERMAN HERBERTS, Ministre des Protestans Réformés à ter-Goude il y a plus d'un siècle, approche fort de l'esprit et du caractère de cet Auteur dans l'excellent Traité flamen qu'il publia l'an 1584, sous le titre de Courte Explication des Paroles de S. Paul, Rom. ii. 28: celui la n'est pas Juif, qui l'est au dehors, etc. qui est une espèce de système de Théologie positive (n'en déplaît à Voetius dans sa Bibliotheca studiosi Theol.) le plus solide et le plus fructueux qui se puisse trouver, et dont il fit l'an 1591, une très belle Apologie. Il avait beaucoup profité des écrits de notre Anonyme, et même contribué (à ce qu'on dit) à l'impression ou à la réimpression de plusieurs de ses ouvrages.

Diacre d'Edesse dans le quatrième siècle, homme vénéré et admiré de toute l'Eglise Chrétienne, et dont S. Chrysostôme disait, "Où est maintenant ce grand Ephrem, l'éguillon des endormis, le consolateur des affligés, le maître l'instructeur et l'exhortateur des jeunes gens, le miroir des solitaires, le chef des pénitents, le glaive et le dard contre les hérésies, le réceptacle des vertus, l'habitation et la demeure du S. Esprit ?" Cet homme était (aussi bien que notre anonyme) sans lettres humaines et sans étude ; mais le S. Esprit lui avait versé dans l'esprit et dans le cœur la substance et même les paroles de toutes les Saintes Ecritures, et lui avait donné une langue qui les expliquait et les imprimait dans les cœurs des autres d'une manière dont nulle éloquence d'école ni de nature ne pouvait approcher, ainsi qu'en font foi ses divins écrits, qui en effet ne sont qu'un tissu et de la substance et des termes de la Saint Ecriture, aillant à rappeler dans les cœurs l'esprit de componction, à détourner très-vivement les hommes du mal, et à les animer très fortement au bien par tous les motifs de crainte, d'espérance et d'amour qui se puissent concevoir. Aussi étoient ils tellement estimés, qu'on les lisait publiquement dans les Eglises d'Orient. On en a une traduction Latine imprimée plusieurs fois, dont la dernière est de l'an 1675, à Cologne. Son Testament, avec quelques-uns de ses Opuscules, a paru ci-devant en vieux français ; mais on en a une nouvelle Traduction du P. Lallemant, Chancelier de l'Université de Paris, dans son livre de la Mort des Justes imprimé en 1673. On trouve aussi dans les Vies des S. S. Pères de la traduction de M. d'Andilly, une pièce du même S. Ephrem, qui est la vie de S. Abraham, et celle de sa niece penitente.

Un autre Ancien du même esprit et du même caractère, est le grand et le divin S. MACAIRE d'Egypte, contemporain d'Ephrem, solitaire, et disciple de S. Antoine, homme quoique sans étude, puissant néanmoins en miracles, en vertus, et en paroles. Les cinquante Homélies que nous avons de lui sont à mon avis, la plus divine et la plus excellente pièce qu'on ait de toute l'Antiquité. C'est un ouvrage du S. Esprit qu'on ne saurait se lasser de lire non plus que ses opuscules, qui sont dans le même caractère. On sent bien que c'est l'Esprit de Dieu qui y découvre la grandeur de la misère de l'homme et de sa captivité sous le péché et sous le Démon ; les moyens d'en sortir par Jesus Christ et de revivre à son Esprit, qui après cela gouverne désormais les âmes victorieuses, et produit dans elles des opérations et des grâces que le monde ne connaît pas. On n'a pas besoin d'avertir ceux qui ont des yeux pour voir, qu'ils y trouveront la substance de toute la Théologie Mystique,* jusqu'aux termes mêmes qui surprennent le plus étrangement ceux à qui cette divine Théologie déplaît, d'autant plus que plus ils y sont indisposés par les ténèbres de leur raison corrompue et par le trouble de leurs passions.

Mais nous devons aux soins de M. Pritius l'Edition la meilleure et la plus complète de toutes les œuvres de S. Macaire, laquelle il vient de publier tout nouvellement à Leipsic (en 1698, et 1699,) et qui est préférable aux autres tant à raison de l'exactitude avec laquelle il a corrigé le texte Grec, et redressé la version Latine des Homélies et des Opuscules, que par les additions des apophthegmes, et de tout ce qui s'est pu trouver ailleurs du même Père dans Cassien, dans Roswey-dus, et dans les Monumenta de M. Cotelier.

ANNOTATION.—Fenelon's "Pastoral Letter concerning the Love of God," translated into English, and published by 'Nelson,' 12mo. 1715, contains allusions to all the chief spiritual mystic writers, and may be considered as a kind of introduction to Guyon's "Justifications," in 3 vols., they being a more comprehensive book of reference upon the same subject; which, with Poiret's "Biblio. Mystico," and the references of the present treatise, will leave nothing to be desired concerning writers upon the ascetic and mystic divinity.*

* With respect to treatises recommended to be studied by contemplatives, the following extract is from a little 18mo. vol. of devotions, entitled "The Holy Practices of a Divine Lover," printed at Paris, in 1657. The author considers the 'active way' as but the stepping stone to the 'perfect, or contemplative divinity.' Among all the practical works which have been presented to the world, respecting that way of returning to God, it will, perhaps, be difficult to find one more adapted to the purpose, in connection with the popular writings of Law and Kempis, than Ignatius Loyala's Spiritual Exercises, which, it is hoped, will, ere long, be published in a classic English dress, and divested of all unpalatableness to protestant idiocracy. The extract above referred to, proceeds thus: "A catalogue of such books as may much help, comfort, and increase the devotion of contemplative spirits, such as are already well-grounded and instructed in the catholic faith, and who have passed through the necessary rudiments of active preparations. For such, and, in very deed, only such, is this summary of instructions, catalogue, and exercises, by me set forth, viz:

"A.—All the Ven. Father Augustine Baker's Manuscripts, of the Holy Order of S. Benedict, of the English Cong., which are kept as precious treasures (as indeed they are) in the English Monastery of Comfort, of the same Order and Cong., at Cambray. . . . B.—All S. Bernard's works, S. Bonaventure's little works, or Opuscula. Fath. Bennet of Canfield's Books of the Three Wills. C.—The works of Climachus. Cassian's works, corrected. The Colloquies of S. Catherine of Siena. . . . D.—Dionysius Areopagita, his Mystic Divinity. The little work of Dionysius the Carthusian of Contemplation. The works of S. Dorotheus. . . . G.—The works of S. Gregorie the great. . . . H.—Hugo of S. Victor. Harphius, his Mystic Divinity according to the Roman impression. . . . I.—The golden book of the Imitation of Christ. John of the Cross's works. L.—Lincolniensis: or, Hugo, Bishop of Lincoln. . . . R.—Regnum Dei intra nos: or, the Kingdom of God within us. Rusbrochius, his works. Richard of S. Victor's works. The Revelations of Saint Gertrude and Saint Brigitt. . . . S.—The Scale of Perfection. Suso, his Life and Works. The Secret Paths of Divine Love. . . . T.—Thaulerus, his Life and Works. S. Teresa, her Works, and her Life written by herself. . . . V.—Vitæ Patrum; or, the Lives of the Fathers. —Many other books (he continues) there are, very proper for thee, and which may happen to fall into thy hands; but these I only reckon up, that thou mayest easily find out, O devout reader, what may serve thy turn. But to save thee labour, never look to find any book suited for thy turn, written by any of the 'Society of Jesus,' whose genius is in the active way, and in that they are excellent, and very commendable; but in this contemplative way, few or none have appeared ever since their first institute, above these hundred years."

Besides other translations of Fenelon's writings into English, part of his "Spiritual Works" were published in 2 vols. 8vo. Dublin, 1771. They were translated by, and published at the expense of Mrs. Theodo. Blachford, widow of the former librarian of St. Patrick's, Dublin, sister of Richard Tighe, and daughter of Lady Mary Tighe. She also published a translation of Guyon's "Torrents," ("Opusculum," vol. i.) and of the Baroness de Chantal's "Letters;" also her "Life," which is a very edifying pious memorial, and a much more enlivened translation than that of Dr. Coombes; also a "Guide to Rest," chiefly extracts from Law. In imitation of those holy saints, and of Law's 'Miranda' and 'Eusebia,' (certain portions of which portraits there is reason to think Mr. Law painted after De Chantal, and not, as Gibbon, in his ostentatious account of his family, states, after his aunt Hestor, who was a poor model of perfection.) Mrs. Blachford spent the latter years of her life in all practical piety and devotion. She founded the House of Refuge, Dublin, in which her daughter, Mrs. Mary Tighe, endowed a ward for the sick, with the proceeds of her celebrated poem Psyche. See more of this lady in connection with the family of Henry Brooke, of Dublin. The modern title she gave to her translation of Guyon's "Torrents," was "A Treatise, by Jane Mary Guyon, on Sanctification; with direction how to avoid the many hindrances of attaining to that state of holiness and entire union of the soul with God." It is to be found in a Dublin publication, entitled the "Christian Library," edited by a Mr. Holdercroft, son-in-law to Henry Brooke. Henry Brooke was nephew to the author of the "Fool of Quality," and other works; whose daughter was the authoress of the "Relics of Irish Poetry," etc. Mr. Holdcroft published, at Dublin, St. Helen's, and Wigan, in one vol. 12mo. 1820, all the pieces (except the author's letters) wanting to complete the large 4to. edition of Behmen; at the end of which he inserted an extensive catalogue of spiritual books, including almost all that had been translated and published in English, up to the middle of the eighteenth century. The Brooke family and acquaintances were great admirers of Mr. Law, and of the truly spiritual mystics: as also was the celebrated Hannah More, of Bristol, who, with her friend, the Rev. Richard Symes, Rector of St. Werburgh, a correspondent of Mr. Law when living, and Mr. Thomas Mills the publisher, occasionally met together, to converse upon their favourite author. It is supposed Mr. Law's "Serious Call" furnished Hannah More with the original idea of Cælebs; many of the sentiments and characters of which work are feeble imitations of Law's powerful genius.—The above Mr. Mills was the father of the respected aged gentleman now residing at Bristol, from whom the writer obtained a great number of MSS. of Freher, Law, etc., with other books; in whose family they had been preserved upwards of half a century, having descended to him in a direct channel from immediate friends of Mr. Law, and other learned students of Behmen's philosophy of the last century.

Amongst the most warm-hearted of the admirers of Law, and collectors of the aforesaid MSS., was a Mr. Edward Fisher, of Bath, to whose philanthropy we perhaps owe the preservation of Freher's inestimable productions. Freher was a profound philosopher, (by birth a German,) of great learning and piety, and of amazing capacity, originality of genius, and strength of mind. The latter years of his life he spent in London, where he died, in 1723, aged seventy-nine. He appears to have been altogether taken up with his MS. demonstrations and illustrations of Behmen's writings, having also continually with him a friend, of the name of Leuchter, a draftsman, to execute the beautiful drawings and symbols with which his demonstrations are so abundantly illustrated, as well as to make copies of the same for others. Freher lived on intimate terms with the Rev. Mr. Waple, and other admirers of J. B.'s writings; among whom might, perhaps, be reckoned some of the remaining members of the Philadelphian Society.—This latter society, which began publicly in 1697, and terminated its meetings in 1703, having correspondence with individuals of similar sentiments in Holland, and various parts of the continent, owed its existence, originally, to one or two devout persons of the complexion of piety peculiar to the Cromwell times, giving up themselves to the study of Behmen's writings, which had then just been published in English; and then fancying themselves to be the subjects of visions and revelations, which they also published in print, till, in about a dozen years or so, the Philadelphian Society was formed. This society, the writer considers, however, was more immediately brought into existence and kept together by the pious zeal of the learned Francis Lee, who was then the son-in-law of the chief heroine of the society, a Mrs. Jane Lead. She being a very devout woman, [a seeker of visions, Mr. Law seems to intimate, while he at the same time deprecates the folly of such attempts, as knowing that it is God who selects his prophets, and not for man to take that office to himself, which truth does not appear to have crossed the minds of these Philadelphians,]—her admirers were probably thereby induced to conclude that what she termed her visions, being by them found to be in harmony with Behmen's principles, with which they might have been acquainted, were true revelations to her from God. And as to her style, whatever the modern reader might say to it, they professed it to be quite consistent with her pretensions, and fully equal to that of Hosea, or other second-rate ancient prophets; nay, they found a beauty in it which was admirable, if not inimitable! Her published visions, would we obtain a general idea of them by a modern illustration, may be described to be such as we should expect from the devout and sincere, moaning, quavering, unknown-tongue professors, had they been dipping largely into the transcendental of Behmen's philosophy, and thereupon turned prophetesses. And as these obtained abettors of their innocent self-deceptions as to their 'extraordinary vocation,' in sincere and pious, though, as respects theological knowledge, partially informed individuals; so did this Mrs. Lead, in her day, make her converts, though not of the simple only, but of some very respectable persons of the University of Oxford: for she captivated the very learned and ingenious Lee, Fellow of St. John's, and that to such a degree that, for a time, he would seem to have given up his brilliant talents entirely to the propagation of her views, or, as he considered, the interests of Divine truth. The purport of the Philadelphian Society may be ascertained by a reference to their periodical of "Theosophical Transactions," 1697, of which five numbers only were published, to Roach's two publications, and others, up to 1727. Without Lee, however, the thing would perhaps never have been heard of, as the other members, including Dr. Edwards, Hooker, do not appear to have been very eminent in literary ability. But how great were Lee's talents, and the devotion he brought to the cause, may be inferred from his defence of Mrs. Lead, in a long letter he addressed to Mr. Henry Dodwell, who had reproached him for encouraging her groundless enthusiasm, and thereby bringing a reproach on the university; as also from his writings in connection with the Philadelphian Society. If an opportunity offers, we hope at the conclusion of this section, or elsewhere, to afford a few sparkling illustrations of the genius, ability, and Christian science of this celebrated individual—that "most pious, ingenious, and ready writer," as Dr. Hickeys is supposed to call him in that observation. After the dissolution of the Philadelphian Society, Dr. Lee returned again to his wonted sober occupations of practical philanthropy, and incessant activity in the promotion of learning and piety, and of general good to his fellow-creatures. He was supposed to be the author of Nelson's Feasts and Fasts, of the second volume of "Kempis's Christian Pattern," with the preliminary dissertation therein, and of "Kempis's Christian Exercise," by Nelson; also of the translation of Fenelon's "Pastoral Letter," besides being the editor of numerous other ingenious and devotional publications, translations and originals, and, perhaps, partly of Nelson's "Life of Bull." For any one who has read his prefaces to "Lead's works," (which he edited,) his poems therein, his writings in connection with the Philadelphian

Society, and the above-mentioned works in the order of their appearance, may perceive the identity of style, and when he compares them with Nelson's own undoubted letters, dedications, etc., will recognise the difference in the authorship.

Among other "revelations" which this Mrs. Lead published abroad, was one which she termed the "Everlasting Gospel," which was to be preached to the devil and his angels, after the restoration of the whole human race; for she gave out that the whole lapsed creation, both of men and devils, should return to their original state, as brought forth by God, the immutable God of Love and Goodness, whose designs by the creation should not be eternally frustrated, but rather his glory be the more infinitely glorified in triumphing over every opposition and self-will of the creature, all which, after having expended itself, and been conscious of its possibilities, should return to the unity and harmony of the Divine life. To overturn such a bold assumption, Freher wrote a deep grounded philosophical treatise, illustrated with elaborate symbols, demonstrating from Behmen, in accordance with Scripture, the absolute impossibility, according to the known powers and possibilities of eternal nature, of the restoration of devils. But when Law, in after life, had obtained a clear philosophical apprehension of the whole subject, he declared that both sides stood in the same position, viz. in a necessity of neither affirming nor denying the thing,—that neither Behmen nor Scripture sufficiently reached the question, that it all depended upon the possibility which at present could not be proved, but if it was possible it would surely come to pass.—Another celebrated character, who will deserve notice in connection with Freher, Law and others, immortally identified with Behmen, is John George Gichtel, the original compiler and publisher, in a uniform German edition, with notes, of Behmen's works—a man of the deepest practical piety, and at the same time highest scientific and theosophical abilities. His life, in German, was published at Leyden, in 1722, entitled, "The wonderful and holy Life of that elect instrument and man of God, John George Gichtel;" as also his "Theosophia Practica." These should all be translated into English, preserving their theosophic idiom.—But to return.

Some time after Mr. Law's decease, his surviving friends, to whom had been committed a few of his MSS. in order to the publication of Behmen, found among them several long extracts in his own hand-writing, apparently from some eminent writer upon theosophical science; which, however, remained by them without further notice, for nearly twenty years. About this period, it would seem that Mr. Fisher, who, as stated, had been a strong admirer of Mr. Law's talents and genius, conjectured there must be more memorials existing of him than what had appeared, and feeling that nothing of so great a man should be lost for want of collecting, he commenced inquiry, through Mrs. Gibbon, Mr. Law's nephew Mr. Wm. Law, and Law's remaining intimate friend, Mr. Langcake, the joint editor with Mr. Ward of the incomplete four vol. 4to. edition of Behmen. One of the results of this inquiry was, Mr. Fisher's ascertaining the existence of Freher's MS. works and drawings. Thereupon, he began to make further researches, and was, at last, enabled to discover and purchase (chiefly from the widow of Denis, the bookseller, formerly of New Bridge Street, Blackfriars,) two almost complete copies of Freher's works, with their numerous and beautiful symbolic illustrations. These he preserved by him with the utmost care, believing that he possessed a treasure that could not be matched in the world. His admiration, however, grew into a sentiment of enthusiasm; as an amusing illustration of which, the present Mr. Mills related to the writer of these lines the following anecdote, the circumstances being familiar to his recollection. About the time of Buonaparte's expected invasion of this country, Mr. Mills, the father, was suddenly roused from his sleep one night, by a loud knocking at the door. Getting up to ascertain the cause, he found there his friend Mr. Fisher, in the greatest anxiety, who, on being asked the reason of this midnight visit, replied that he had heard of Buonaparte's intended invasion of this country; that the rumour of his descent on the southern coast was all a pretence, for that the true secret was, he intended to sail up the Severn, direct to Bristol, his object being to get possession of Freher's MSS. and drawings in his (Fisher's) possession; and that as there was no time to be lost, he had thought it best to come off at once and consult with his friend Mr. Mills, as to the best way of depositing the MSS. in a place of safety. Mr. Mills having succeeded in allaying the fears of his friend, prevailed upon him to return home again. However, some time after, Mr. Fisher proposed to send one copy of the MSS. to the Bodleian Library, at Oxford, and the other to the British Museum, as being there probably out of the reach of Buonaparte, in case he should suddenly invade England. Accordingly, one of the copies was forwarded from Bath, where Mr. Fisher resided, to the British Museum, and is there at present; which, however, does not contain all Freher's works. The remaining copy he, for some reason, delayed forwarding to the Bodleian, and at his decease it was purchased by Mr. Mills, who also reverentially preserved it, with other MS. and letters of Law, and of similar valued writers, until his decease; whereupon it came into the possession of his son, the present Mr. Mills, and so to the writer of these lines. If the reader would judge of the beauty and ingenuity of those symbols, he has only to refer to the four vol. imperfect edition of Behmen's works, to the illustrations therein, which are, in fact, not so beautifully executed as the original designs, all of which were of Freher's and Leuchter's talent, as before observed, in illustration of the former's demonstrations of the central philosophy of Behmen. Mr. Fisher and Mr. Mills had some reason for their high esteem of those MSS., for they are, perhaps, the most ingenious MS. curiosities in existence; there being, it is supposed, nothing of a similar character, save the few engraved illustrations to Gichtel's German edition of Behmen.

ANNOTATION.—The reader (writes the editor of the abbreviated German life of Gichtel,) is here presented with a man of a very peculiar character, a singular saint—and yet a saint. * * *

But in the life of extraordinary persons, such as Gichtel was, [and such as Bramwell's diary had shown him to have been, had it not been destroyed,] if some things appear too wonderful, we ought to remember that we are here in the dominion of inward wonders, where, he that is experienced, may measure and understand according to his experience, but cannot, and must not exceed it. For, although his eyes may be opened, yet all heaven is not therefore opened to him.—He who has never travelled in the inward way, in which wisdom leads her true disciples; he who lives not entirely from faith, as did Gichtel, but is yet governed by worldly prudence and self-love, may see nothing, and probably will not hesitate to affirm that there is nothing herein but refined enthusiasm and ‘error.’ Such individuals, however, had better not read Gichtel’s life at all: it was not lived for them, neither is it written for them. But to those who are able to take and read this life without offence, and to profit, [continues the editor, Kanne, an evangelical protestant minister,] I have endeavoured to make the perusal of it as smooth and easy as I possibly could, and refrained from using the theosophic idiom of the original. This latter, a memoir of 366 8vo. pages, rather irregular and heavy in its composition, was published about twelve years after Gichtel’s decease; together with the third edition of his “Theosophia Practica,” which consists of a complete collection of his theosophical letters. The publisher, both of these letters and of the memoir, was Gichtel’s most intimate friend, Ueberfeldt, who had lived twenty-seven years with him in the closest intimacy; but he was not the author of the memoir, which was written by an anonymous individual, who had not known Gichtel personally. The materials for it were supplied by several parties, but principally by the above Ueberfeldt; and the composition was laid before Gichtel’s friends for examination, previous to its being sent to the press. That Ueberfeldt was not the author of the work, there is every reason to believe, though, as his own writings show, he could have written it much better than this biographer has done. The reason of his declining the task might have been that, as Gichtel’s intimate friend, and constantly mixed up with his movements, he would have had continual occasion therein to speak of himself, and this his great modesty could not endure. His name, which often occurs in the work, he would only permit to be signified by the letter U, desiring, as regarded himself, to remain altogether in the back ground of the wonderful picture, if impossible to be altogether concealed. [A few episodes of Gichtel’s life might have been selected for insertion in this place, from the MS. translation of the abbreviated and popular memoir of Gichtel in the possession of the writer, illustrative of the wonderful, yea, omnipotent powers of faith, wielded by this Sampson man of God, and which reside in the soul of all believers, who have, like him, under the light of theosophy, laboriously pursued the counsels of the gospel, and realised the full developments of the Christian life in the human nature, the lengths, and breadths, and depths, and heights, of the love, and wisdom, and power of God made man. But as this treatise is only preparatory, having reference chiefly to the obtaining of a duly qualified biographer of Law, whose character will necessarily involve a comprehensive view of the root, stem, and diversified branches of the whole tree of faith, considered, microcosmically, to blossom in him,)—it has been deemed better to withhold those extracts on the present occasion.]

ANNOTATION.—Toute le monde sait la fameuse dispute de feu Mons. de Fenelon, Archevêque de Cambrai, sur le PUR AMOUR. Mais on ne sait pas, peut-être, que Madame Guyon a été l'innocente victime de l'aveugle zèle, de la jalousie ambitieuse, ou des vues politiques des ennemis de cet illustre Prélat. Un des moyens dont ils se servirent pour décréditer la Doctrine de ce grand homme était, de faire passer Madame Guyon, avec qui il a toujours eu une étroite liaison, pour une autre Priscille corrompue par les maximes du faux Quétisme. Dans le tems qu'on examinait les écrits de cette Dame, elle composa l'ouvrage de ses Justifications pour montrer la conformité de ses expériences, et de ces expressions, avec celles des Auteurs canonisés, ou approuvés par l'Eglise.

Pour lire la vie et les ouvrages de Madame Guyon avec intelligence et profit, il sera peut-être nécessaire de donner une idée claire et simple de la DOCTRINE DES MYSTIQUES. Car quand on en parle, ceux qui blasphèment ce qu'ils ignorent, le regardent comme un amas de termes obscurs et de pensées bizarres, qui n'ont aucun fondement, que dans l'imagination échauffée des esprits foibles, ou des femmes visionnaires.—

2.—Aimer Dieu de tout notre cœur ; prier sans cesse ; porter notre croix chaque jour : voilà l'essentiel de la morale chrétienne, et en même tems la substance de la THÉOLOGIE MYSTIQUE. L'Evangile nous propose la Charité comme la consommation de la loi ; l'Oraison continuelle et l'Abnégation de soi-même, comme les deux moyens d'y parvenir.

3.—Dieu s'aime souverainement et uniquement, parce qu'il est souverainement et uniquement aimable. Il aime toutes ses créatures, selon qu'elles participent plus ou moins à ses divines perfections. La perfection de DIEU est la règle de son amour. Or la règle la plus parfaite des volontés finies, est sans doute celle de la volonté infinie. Qu'on dispute, qu'on raffine, qu'on subtilise tant qu'on voudra sur les motifs différens de l'amour, on n'osera jamais nier, que la règle suprême de l'amour ne soit d'aimer Dieu pour lui-même et toutes choses pour lui.

C'est une vérité immuable, fondée sur l'idée que nous avons de l'Etre Infini. C'est la religion éternelle et universelle de toutes les intelligences. C'est un devoir auquel la créature est obligée dans tous les tems, et dans tous les lieux, supposé même qu'elle dût être anéantie après la mort, ou que Dieu ne lui accordât jamais d'autre connaissance de son infinie perfection, que celle que nous en avons pendant cette vie.

L'Espérance de la vision béatifique est sans doute une vertu divine, un légitime motif d'amour, une source de consolations infinies, une ressource puissante contre toutes les tentations et les misères de notre exil : mais elle n'est pas la pure Charité. L'Ecriture distingue ces deux vertus. Il ne faut jamais les confondre, ni rejeter la chaste espérance en recommandant la pure charité.

Ce qui fait croire que l'homme est incapable de ce parfait amour, c'est qu'on juge de sa capacité par ce qu'il fait, et non par ce qu'il doit faire. Les hommes n'agissent ordinairement que par un principe d'amour-propre plus ou moins raffiné ; et par nos propres forces nous ne pouvons agir autrement. Comme l'homme n'est pas la vraie lumière qui éclaire son esprit, de même il n'est point la cause du parfait amour qui doit animer sa volonté. Il faut qu'une puissance supérieure à l'homme agisse sans cesse en lui, pour l'élever au-dessus de lui-même et le faire aimer selon la loi immuable de l'amour.

4.—Le premier moyen de parvenir à cette pure charité est l'Oraison : et l'Oraison la plus parfaite est de recevoir passivement l'impression de Dieu qui nous porte sans cesse vers lui-même. L'Eglise n'attribue point d'autre activité à l'homme dans la grace que celle de consentir ou de dis-sentir à l'action Divine, qui l'excite et qui le meut. C'est DIEU SEUL qui est la force mouvante de l'âme ; mais elle peut toujours céder ou résister à l'opération divine, et son concours le plus parfait est celui de laisser DIEU agir en elle.

Il faut d'abord, que la volonté excitée et muée par la grace fasse des efforts, et forme des desirs multipliés, et des actes distincts pour se détourner des créatures et pour se tourner vers DIEU : mais après s'être long tems accoutumée à ces retours fréquens, on contracte peu à peu l'habitude de vivre continuellement dans la présence Divine d'une manière plus simple, plus intime, et plus uniforme. L'Âme agit, mais c'est DIEU seul qui est le principe de son action. C'est lui seul qui la meut, qui la pousse, qui l'anime, qui l'entraîne ; mais elle suit librement ce qui l'attire. Ce n'est pas une inaction ni une coopération nécessitée, mais un concours libre à l'action Divine. Plus l'âme s'y livre, plus cette action devient forte et vigoureuse, comme le mouvement des corps, qui augmente à proportion qu'ils tombent vers leur centre.

C'est là l'Oraison évangélique, que Madam Guyon appelle après les Mystiques, l'Oraison passive, l'Oraison de silence, de repos, etc. Ce n'est ni la multitude de paroles, ni l'effort de pensées, ni l'enthousiasme d'une imagination échauffée ; mais un commerce de cœur avec Dieu, dont les plus simples sont capables. Ce n'est pas nous qui prions, c'est le S. Esprit qui prie en nous, qui gémît, qui désire, qui demande pour nous ce que nous ne savons pas demander pour nous-mêmes. Selon le style de l'Ecriture Sainte, tout paraît l'action de Dieu en l'homme, à laquelle l'homme n'ajoute rien que le simple consentement, ou la non-résistance.

5.—A proportion que l'homme s'unit ainsi à Dieu par l'Oraison, il faut qu'il s'éloigne de la créature et de soi par le Renoncement, qui est le second moyen de parvenir à l'union divine. L'un est une suite nécessaire de l'autre.

Cette Abnégation Évangélique n'est pas une austérité qui surpasse les forces humaines, qui détruise la santé, et qui nous fasse mener une vie extraordinaire. Jesus-Christ ne faisait point de ces austérités. Sa vie était toute commune pour l'extérieur ; mais son intérieur était tout Divin. Le renoncement qu'il propose, nous porte non seulement à fuir les faux plaisirs, à combattre nos passions grossières, à nous contenter du simple nécessaire selon notre état ; mais à retrancher tous les amusements frivoles, toutes les activités de l'esprit, tous les charmes de l'imagination, qui ne servent qu'à nous dissiper, et à nous entretenir dans le goût du créé. L'Abnégation évangélique nous défend le moindre regard de la créature hors de Dieu, le moindre plaisir contre son ordre, le moindre retour de vaine complaisance sur soi. Elle nous fait aimer la dernière place, quoique nous soyons nés dans les grandeurs, le silence, et la solitude intérieure, parmi le bruit et la foule, la pauvreté d'esprit et le détachement parfait au milieu des richesses. Ce n'est pas tout. Cette Abnégation nous porte à dégrader le moi, idole si chère à l'homme, à recevoir avec joie ce qui le crucifie, à supporter les imperfections d'autrui avec patience et douceur, nos propres défauts avec humilité et paix, les rigueurs purifiantes de la Justice Divine avec abandon et souplesse. Voilà une pénitence universelle—un martyr d'amour—une mortification, ou plutôt une mort qui s'étend sur les sens, sur l'esprit, sur le cœur, sur tout l'homme, et qui ne laisse aucun asile à l'amour déréglé des créatures ; ni de soi-même.

La première opération de Dieu est sensible, agréable et pleine de charmes. Elle porte l'âme à agir, à combattre, à s'exercer dans tous les travaux d'une vertu active, et d'une mortification extérieure, pour se détacher des objets étrangers. C'est le fondement de la vie intérieure, sans lequel toute spiritualité doit être suspecte. Alors on goûte dans l'Oraison une onction douce et une délectation savoureuse. On se mortifie avec une noble et mâle vigueur. L'âme voit sa vertu, se soutient par son travail, est charmée de son courage.

7.—Ensuite Dieu commence en elle une autre opération, où elle est toute passive, où elle ne coopère que par son abandon. Il s'agit alors d'ancrer le moi ; et c'est ce que Dieu seul peut faire. Ce n'est plus l'âme qui combat au dehors, c'est Dieu qui l'attaque par le dedans pour la faire mourir à elle-même. Il l'introduit dans son propre fond. Il lui montre tous les plis et replis de son amour-propre. Il en dévoile tous les mystères. Elle se voit, elle a horreur de ce qu'elle voit. Tout en elle s'élève contre elle, elle ne trouve plus de ressource dans son ancienne ferveur, ni dans sa propre justice, dont il lui montre toutes les impuretés. Elle tombe en défaillance, elle demeure fidèle sans voir sa fidélité. Tout ce qui lui reste, c'est la volonté ferme de souffrir mille morts plutôt que de déplaire à Dieu. Encore n'a-t-elle pas toujours la consolation d'apercevoir en elle cette volonté. L'action de Dieu devenant plus fongière, plus intime, et plus centrale, semble disparaître de plus en plus ; mais elle n'en est pas moins réelle. Comme cette lumière pure et universelle, qui éclaire, qui pénètre, et qui meut tous les corps, est elle-même impereceivable à nos yeux grossiers, ou comme l'amour-propre qui agit sans cesse dans l'homme naturel ne se distingue pas toujours ; de même l'action du VERBE, qui est la vie, la lumière et l'amour de toutes les intelligences, agit dans l'homme surnaturel très réellement, quoique d'une manière insensible.

8.—Le dessein de Dieu, en agissant ainsi, est de cacher son opération à notre amour-propre, qui ne prenant plus de goût aux plaisirs impurs, aux objets sensibles, aux passions grossières, s'établirait un nouvel empire sur nos vertus mêmes, se complairait dans sa propre excellence, et corromprait l'action divine par une idolâtrie de soi d'autant plus dangereuse, qu'elle est plus raffinée. On ne pécherait peut-être plus en homme mais on pécherait en Démon par l'orgueil et la vaine complaisance. C'est pour cela que les états plus avancés de la vie spirituelle ne sont remplis que de tentations, de peines, de privations, de sécheresses, d'incertitudes, de misères, d'obscurités, de désolations, et de souffrances intérieures, jusqu'à ce que l'empire de l'amour-propre soit détruit, et que le règne de Dieu, qui est au-dedans de nous, soit établi dans l'âme.

9.—Alors cesse cette foule tumultueuse de pensées vagues et de passions déréglées, qui met l'homme naturel dans une frénésie perpétuelle. L'esprit est délivré de toutes ses activités inutiles, la volonté de toutes ses agitations inquiètes, et toute l'âme est réduite dans une paix, dans un vide, dans une solitude divine, où les sens et l'imagination, l'esprit-propre et la volonté-propre se taisent, pour écouter la SAGESSE ÉTERNELLE, qui parle au cœur, non par des visions, ni par des révélations, ni par des lumières sublimes, ni par des spéculations subtiles, mais un langage bien plus parfait et moins sujet à l'illusion, viz. le tout de Dieu et le néant de la créature, et l'hommage profond que le rien doit au Tout. Alors l'homme ne vit plus de sa propre vie, mais JÉSUS CHRIST vit en lui. Il renaît et devient enfant, sans esprit et sans volonté-propre. La lumière du VERBE devient son unique lumière, et l'amour du S. ESPRIT son unique amour. Sa vie est cachée avec JÉSUS CHRIST en Dieu, et cette vie nouvelle prend la place de l'ancienne vie d'Adam. Voilà la régénération dont parle l'Évangile.

Ce sont là les trois états de la vie spirituelle que les Mystiques appellent Purgatif, Illuminatif, et Unitif, et que Madame Guyon nomme Actif, Passif, et Divin, c'est-à-dire le renoncement aux vices grossiers, la destruction de l'amour-propre, et le rétablissement de l'ordre divin par l'amour pur.

10.—Voilà la substance de toutes les expériences de cette Dame. Tel a été le caractère de sa dévotion. Telles sont les Vérités qui remplissent ses écrits. Verités éternelles fondées sur la souveraine raison. Verités que la Sagesse suprême enseignerait également à tous esprits droits et à tous les cœurs humbles, supposé qu'il n'y eût point de Révélation. Verités connues dès le commencement du monde aux saints Patriarches. Verités qui les faisaient marcher continuellement devant Dieu sans être connues des hommes, comme Enoc et Job. Verités puisées dans l'Évangile, et qu'on y découvrirait, si on connaissait le don de Dieu, et si on ressemblait à ces petits et simples à qui il révèle ses mystères. Verités qu'on trouve plus ou moins développées dans les Ecrits des plus saints Pères de l'antiquité, en S. Ignace, en S. Clément Alexandrin, en S. Basile, en S. Ambroise, en S. Jean Chrysostome, en S. Augustin, etc. Verités dont les grands Solitaires se sont nourris dans les déserts les plus affreux. Verités par lesquelles les grands fondateurs des Ordres comme S. François d'Assise, S. Bernard, Ste. Thérèse, le B. Jean de la Croix, S. François de Sales ont renouvelé en différents siècles la face de l'Église. Verités qui ont engagé une infinité de Vierges et de Religieuses à s'ensevelir tous vivants dans la solitude pour se livrer à ces opérations purifiantes de la Divinité, que le bruit du monde et le soin des choses terrestres ne troublent que trop souvent. Verités enseignées par les plus éclairés Docteurs de l'Église, comme Albert le Grand, S. Thomas, S. Bonaventure, Grenade, Rodrigues, Sylvius, le Cardinal Bona, Gerson, et beaucoup d'autres. Verités enfin dont la tradition est universelle et immuable dans tous les tems et dans tous les lieux.

ANNOTATION.—Cet auteur approche du caractère de Taulère ; mais il est plus méthodique, spécifie davantage, et va bien plus loin : l'on peut même dire, qu'avant lui, et peut-être après lui, personne n'a pénétré comme lui dans la profondeur des états intérieurs d'une âme abandonnée à Dieu ; en quoi l'on s'aperçoit bien que Rusbrochius ne lui a pas été peu à secours. Son caractère est, de proposer la resurrection gradative des états de vies spirituelles dans l'âme épurée et éprouvée. Il montre comment après diverses mortifications purifications et épreuves de l'âme, il se suscite dans elle de degrés en degrés de nouveaux états de vie divine, premièrement active, puis passive, dans les puissances inférieures de l'âme, après cela dans les supérieures, (la mémoire, l'intellect, et la volonté :) ensuite dans son essence fongère, et enfin par dessus son être et les opérations de ses puissances, par l'investiture qu'en font les trois personnes de la Sainte Trinité, qui y manifestent leurs opérations adorables. C'est le Système le plus beau, le plus substantiel, et le plus avancé et profond de la Théologie Mystique qui se soit jamais vu.

Mais pour s'en apercevoir il ne faut pas s'y prendre selon l'ordre où les Éditeurs ont mis ses Œuvres mystiques, qui est fort mal conçu. A les voir avec le titre commun de Théologie Mystique en trois Livres, on dirait que ce tout n'est qu'un seul corps de Théologie divisé en autant de livres comme en autant de parties qui le constituent. Cependant ces trois prétendues parties sont trois ouvrages très-différents, dont chacun est complet par soi seul. Le premier, qui est le plus grand et le plus prolixe, est beaucoup plus moral que mystique, et ne fait que très peu notre sujet. C'est proprement le second et le troisième qui sont mystiques, et encore dans le second (intitulé le Directoire des Contemplatifs) faut il avoir patience jusqu'au chap. 25. (des anciennes Editions,) après quoi il entre droitement dans les profondeurs de son sujet, jusqu'à la fin. Son Troisième livre, autre traité à part, intitulé l'Eden des Contemplatifs, y entre bien plutôt. Il y retouche les mêmes choses que le Directoire, y en ajoutant néanmoins de nouvelles et de considérables ; expliquées plus dans le détail ce qu'il n'avait touché que brièvement, et le munit de plusieurs autorités des Docteurs et des Saints. On lui attribue encore plusieurs autres écrits que ne se trouvent guères, et qu'on ne fait point entrer en comparaison avec ceux que je viens de marquer.

Harphius était Gardien des Franciscains de l'observance étroite à Malines il y a plus de deux cents ans. Sa Théologie Mystique fut mise au jour en latin, et pour la première fois à Cologne, l'an 1538, et puis l'an 1556. Le P. Mabillon a raison de préférer pour l'intégrité ces Editions-ci à toutes les autres, quoique pourtant celles-ci aient été prohibées ensuite par l'Inquisition, non à cause des dogmes mystiques, mais à cause de trois ou quatre lignes contre l'incapacité des Directeurs et des Spirituels de ce temps là. L'Auteur après avoir dit dans le Douzième Chap. de son Directoire, que les parfaits, ou ceux qui ne l'étant pas sont néanmoins tellement mus et attirés de l'Esprit de Dieu, qu'ils sont obligés de suivre uniquement son attrait, n'ont pas besoin d'être sous l'obéissance ou la Direction des hommes, avait ajouté ces paroles : sur tout en ce temps-ci, auxquels communément tous les Supérieurs qui conduisent les autres sont plus adonnés aux choses extérieures, qu'aux intérieures ; de sorte qu'ils n'entendent que fort peu ou rien du tout de la vie du dedans ; et parlant sans plutôt à obstacle qu'à secours à ceux qui étant attirés de Dieu à cette vie intérieure, sont soumis à leur direction. Et c'est la cause pour quoi il y a tant de relâchement et tant d'immortification entre les Religieux, je veux dire, que c'est parce qu'ils ne reglent pas leur conduite de la manière que le requiert la vie intérieure et les progrès qu'on y doit-faire. Ces paroles firent sa disgrâce. Aussi les a-t-on rétranchées de l'Edition de Rome, 1585, de celle de Cologne, 1511, et des autres, d'où ils ont aussi oté un mot que l'auteur disait des creatures éternelles ; expression qui passait leur intelligence.

Les œuvres mystiques de cet Auteur ont parues en Français à Paris, l'an 1616, de la traduction de M. de la Mothe-Romaincourt, Conseiller du Roi : mais ce langage étant vieilli, une nouvelle Traduction, à tout le moins de son Directoire qui est sa meilleure pièce, ne serait pas maintenant hors de saison. On trouve encore ce dernier traité en vieux Flamen, mais rarement. Cet auteur se déclare beaucoup contre l'amour-intéressé, par rapport à ceux qui veulent tendre à la perfection.

ANNOTATION.—In all his practices of piety hitherto, (says his biographer,) he had only proposed to himself his own perfection. But God, who designed him for the evangelical ministry, and without his knowledge had already prepared him for it, by contempt of the world, by retirement, mortification, and prayer, now gave him other lights and measures. He began to consider that souls having cost our Saviour so dear, nothing could be more acceptable to him than to hinder their eternal ruin; he comprehended that the glory of God was most displayed in the salvation of souls, purchased with the blood of his Son. These were the sentiments which kindled in him his ardent zeal for souls. It is not enough (said he) that I serve my Lord; all hearts must love him, all tongues must praise him.

As soon as he had turned his thoughts toward his neighbour, howsoever dear solitude was to him, he gave it all up; and lest he should frighten those from him, whom he designed to bring to God, he changed his austere penitential dress for a more decent attire. Moreover, knowing that the ministry to which he was called required health and vigour, he moderated his austerities, and partook of ordinary food.

He preached publicly concerning the things of heaven; and to be better heard by the people, who gathered round him to hear him, he got upon a stone before the ancient hospital of St. Lucy. His mortified countenance, his modest air, his words animated with the spirit of truth, his zealous and affectionate entreaties, inspired his auditors with sentiments of the deepest compunction, with the love of virtue, and a horror of vice. But his private ministrations produced wonderful effects; he converted the most obstinate sinners, by laying before them the maxims and duties of Christianity, and by causing them to meditate upon them in retirement. Some were so wrought upon, that they renounced the world, and changed at the same time both their manners and state.

The many reflections which Ignatius made upon the force and power of the evangelical maxims, and the many trials of their operation both in himself and others, moved him to write a book of SPIRITUAL EXERCISES, for the good of souls that live in the world. This book has so great a part in his history, and is so little known abroad, that it will not be unprofitable to give an account of it.

The SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of Ignatius are something more than a bare collection of meditations, and christian considerations: if they were that, and no more, there would be nothing in them particular and new.

Ignatius is not the first who has taught us the way of raising our minds to God, and of looking into our souls, by the means of prayer and contemplation. Before him, were known the several heads of meditation, as concerning the end for which we were created, the enormity of sin, the pains of hell, the life and death of our Saviour; but this much may be said, that before him, there was not a certain and prefixed method for the reformation of manners: to him enlightened by God, we owe this method, and he it was who, in a systematic way, after a manner altogether new, reduced (as it were) into a holy art the conversion of a sinner. Knowing, on the one hand, the perverse inclinations of the heart of man; and on the other hand, the power and virtue of the particular truths of Christianity, when rightly applied, to rectify those corruptions, he has set down a process or way, by which man with the succour of grace may recover himself out of his sin and degradation, and climb to the highest degree of Christian perfection. In effect, if we look narrowly into the matter, there is as much difference between the ordinary meditations of religious books and these exercises, as between the knowledge only of simples and the entire science of medicine; which has its principles and aphorisms, (the result of accumulated experience,) for the cure of diseases, according to the constitution of bodies, the nature of distempers, and the quality of remedies. But that the reality of what is above stated may be apparent, we shall here set down the whole order and SCHEME of IGNATIUS'S SPIRITUAL EXERCISES; which are adapted for a FOUR WEEK'S RETREAT, for such as desire to ENTER UPON A CHRISTIAN LIFE. . . (See the account of them in his Life, as also of the original principles, spirit, and rules of the 'Society of Jesus.'

ANNOTATION. — This individual, as already observed, was the occasion of the Philadelphia Society, which, after continuing its meetings during some five or six years, was dissolved, the members of it having thereby "completed their public testimony." At its first institution, it created some sensation in the metropolis, by reason of the respectability and talent of its members, and by its declarations concerning the coming of the Lord, and the great natural and moral revolutions which were to precede and follow that event. One of the professed objects of the association, was to promote the cultivation of a pure spiritual and practical piety, and indeed some of the writings that issued from it to that end, are most excellent and enlightened performances; whilst the leading members of it themselves aimed at a highly transcendental knowledge, according to the superior lights which they considered distinguished their age through the writings of Behmen, and themselves in particular, as being under the immediate direction of Mrs. Lead, whom they believed to be subject of the Divine revelations, and a kind of illuminated prophetess of the last times, to reveal the Divine councils in respect to the declared approaching restitution of all things; whose pretensions to that office seemed to them to admit of no doubt, both from the nature and character of her published writings, and her holy walk and conversation. Being of inquisitive and devout minds, and well acquainted with the principles of Behmen's philosophy, and therefore with what he declares concerning the mystic signification of his revelation; and then considering the mystery of the six days' creation, and also the Scripture declarations concerning the coming of the Lord; and further observing Mrs. Lead's great piety, (and there are undoubtedly many passages in her writings which show her to have been a deeply experienced person in the interior life,) and finding her visions, divested of her individual form of conception, to be in harmony with Behmen's principles, and the subjects of them accordant with their own speculations, — I say, considering all these points, they, probably, by degrees were induced to believe her, as she considered herself to be, extraordinarily inspired of God. For they deemed it a false principle, and highly subversive of gospel privileges to maintain that God had ceased to reveal himself to man since the days of the apostles, and that all pretensions to the same are illusions, and but the fancies of complacency or enthusiasm.

It would not, perhaps, be difficult to dissect Mrs. Lead's character, and demonstrate the philosophy of her prophetic assumptions, from a consideration of the constitution of her mind, the character of the piety of the Cromwell-Muggletonian-fanatic days in which she lived, her undirected study of Behmen's works then first published in English, and the popular spiritual topics of her age; but that belongs not to this place.

These observations are not to be taken as casting ridicule, or even venturing a determinate judgment upon her writings, but only to afford a general notion of their character and constitution. But whatever may be thought of her own compositions, there cannot be two opinions as to the merit of the prefaces and poems with which some of her latter works have been illustrated by their gratuitous publisher, her son-in-law, the learned Francis Lee. Wesley's hymns may stand on an equality with those poems for expression of true christian experience; but there is, perhaps, no poetry extant in English, equal to them for the fine classic, sparkling, Pope-like poetic genius, applied to the illustration of the spiritualities of the life of faith, according to the true evangelical theory.

The following is a list of her pieces: — 1. — The Heavenly Cloud; or, the Ascension Ladder. 4to. 1682. pp. 40. 2. — The Revelation of Revelations; an Essay towards the Unsealing, Opening, and Discovering of the Seven Seals, the Seven Thunders, and the New Jerusalem State. 4to. 1686. pp. 130. 3. — The Enochian Walks with God, found out by a Spiritual Traveller. 4to. 1694. pp. 38. 4. — The Laws of Paradise; given forth by Wisdom to a Translated Spirit. 8vo. 1695. pp. 69. 5. — The Wonders of God's Creation manifested in the Variety of Eight Worlds, as they were made known experimentally to the Author. 8vo. 1695. pp. 89. 6. — The Message to the Philadelphia Society, whithersoever dispersed over the whole Earth, together with a Call to the several gathered Churches. 12mo. 1696. pp. 108. 7. — The Tree of Faith: or, the Tree of Life, springing up in the Paradise of God; from which all the Wonders of the New Creation must proceed. 12mo. 1696. pp. 122. 8. — The Ark of Faith, or a Supplement to the Tree of Faith, for the further Confirmation of the same; together with a Discovering of the New World. 12mo. 1696. pp. 33. 9. — A Fountain of Gardens, Watered by the Rivers of Divine Pleasure, and springing up in all the variety of Spiritual Plants: blown up by the Pure Breath into a Paradise: Being a continuation of the process of a life according to faith, of the divinely magical knowledge, and of the new creation, in mutual entertainment between the Essential Wisdom and the soul, in her progress through Paradise to Mount Sion and the New Jerusalem: In a Spiritual Diary of the wonderful Experience of a Christian soul, under the conduct of the heavenly Wisdom, from the first vision in April, 1670, to the 2nd of August, 1686. 4 vols. 12mo. 1697, 1697, 1700, and 1701. 10. — A Revelation of the Everlasting Gospel Message, which shall never cease to be preached till the hour of Christ's eternal judgment shall come, whereby will be proclaimed the last love jubilee, in order to the restitution of the whole lapsed creation. 8vo. In the treatise of Mrs. Lead, entitled the "Fountain of Gardens," the warm-hearted Editor inserted an advertisement relative to Dr. Pordage's works, (which had been translated into German, and published at Amsterdam, 8vo. 1698, pp. 636,) only one of them having been printed in English. The advertisement is as follows : but were the writer called upon to give an opinion concerning Dr. P.'s works from the published treatise in English, he would judge them of little worth in a theosophical point of view ; and as to their being the fruits of a special divine illumination, he could not entertain such a question at all, any more than in the case of the sublimated conceptions of the before-mentioned individual :—

"Whereas, in the year 1683, there was printed a treatise of that enlightened philosopher and profound divine, Dr. John Pordage, Mrs. Jane Lead's most intimate friend, entitled 'Theologia Mystica ; or, the Mystic Divinity of the Eternal Invisibles, viz., 'the Archetypal Globe, or the Original Globe, or World of all Globes, essences, centres, elements, principles, and creations whatsoever ;' wherein many deep and hidden mysteries have been unfolded from a ray of the Divine light : and as the same, though published with great disadvantage to the author's memory, and the great things therein delivered, has excited in several searching spirits an eager and longing desire to see the rest of his writings made public : This is to give notice, that leave having been at last obtained, after many reiterated solicitations, from the executors of the said Dr. John and of Mr. Francis Pordage, the publisher of this book will undertake to gratify the world with all the theological, theosophical, and philosophical works of the said illuminated son of wisdom, which are come to his hands, if there shall be any suitable encouragement given to such a design. The titles whereof are these that follow, viz.—

"1.—Philosophia Mystica ; or, a Treatise of Eternal Nature, wherein the Distinction of God from Nature is discussed, and many weighty Questions, both Physical and Divine, relating especially to the Human Soul, are resolved. 2.—The Angelical World ; or, a Treatise concerning the Angelical Principle, with the Inhabitants thereof, and God Introducing himself in this Principle. 3.—The Dark Fire World ; or, a Treatise concerning the Hellish Principle, with the Inhabitants, and Wonders, and God manifesting himself in this Principle. 4.—A Treatise concerning the Incarnation of JESUS CHRIST : Wherein all the Present Controversies in this Particular, are Discussed, by a Lover of Truth, who desires to hold the Just Balance with the Even Weights. 5.—A Discourse concerning the Spirit of Eternity, in its First Being. 6.—Sophia ; or, Spiritual Discoveries. 7.—Experimental Discoveries concerning Union of Natures, of Essences, of Tinctures, of Bodies, of Persons, and of Spirits." There being, it is presumed, no encouragement given to the scheme, it fell to the ground, and the works yet remain unpublished in English.

ANNOTATION.—sur la "Perle Évangélique." Ce livre est vraiment anonyme ; et Sandæus se trompe de le donner à Eschius Prêtre d'Anvers, qui n'a fait que le publier. Il a été composé par une sainte fille qui a pour fondement principal de sa doctrine la présence continuelle de Dieu dans l'âme, comme celle du soleil dans le ciel, pour en déchasser le mal et les ténèbres, et pour remplir son fond de la vie heureuse et éternelle par l'action du Père sur la mémoire, en la faisant toujours penser vivement à Dieu ; par celle du Fils sur l'entendement, en l'illuminant de la vive et salutaire lumière de la vérité ; et par celle du S. Esprit sur la volonté, en l'animant saintement de l'amour divin : le tout en vertu des mérites et de l'entremise de l'Esprit joyeux, de l'âme affligée, et du corps mortifié et mort de Jesus Christ, afin qu'en l'imitant dans la voie de l'amour, de l'abstinence, et des souffrances, Dieu ait joie, paix, plaisir, et contentement éternel dans nous : Principes que cette sainte fille inculque et amplifie partout fort vivement et avec grande cordialité. On trouve dans ce livre plusieurs belles vérités et plusieurs principes importants touchant le fond et les facultés de l'âme, la présence de Dieu, ses opérations, etc., qui se trouvent rarement ailleurs, et qui servent beaucoup à soudre certaines difficultés considérables de la vie intérieure et de la Théologie Mystique.

La Perle Évangélique a été imprimée plusieurs fois en Français, en Latin, en Allemand, et en Flamen. L'Édition Française est des Pères de Bourg-fontaine de Paris, vieille de plus d'un siècle. Ils la firent sur l'Édition Latine de Cologne 1545, qui pourtant n'est pas le vrai original, mais une traduction d'Eschius, où l'ordre est changé pour de trois parties qu'elle avait, la réduire en quatre : mais la plus grande variation est, que de peur de choquer le monde savant en rendant ce livre à sa source, je veux dire à une fille, on en a retranché non seulement la première préface, mais changé en termes masculins les termes féminins de la reconnaissance que le premier Éditeur Flament (qu'on croit être le même Eschius) fait à la fin de l'ouvrage, d'avoir été converti à Dieu par le ministère de cette fille, qu'il appelle, une des épouses de Dieu, sa servante et son amie : au lieu de quoi on a substitué les termes masculins de serviteur et d'ami : comme s'il fallait avoir honte de faire paraître aux savans dédaigneux la vérité venante d'une femme, quoique pourtant le S. Esprit ait souvent plus de prise sur elles que sur eux, leur esprit étant plus libre des fatras de la science humaine, plus docile et plus porté vers la piété que celui des doctes, dont il plaît à Dieu de confondre la sagesse, la présomption, et l'orgueil par des moyens si propres à son dessein, et si mortifiants pour ces cœurs superbes. Quoi qu'il en soit, ce qu'en dit le même Eschius dans la première préface d'une des anciennes Editions Flamendes et originales d'Anvers, met la chose hors de toute doute, et est trop beau pour ne pas repaier ici par une citation qui sans cela serait hors d'œuvre, la suppression qu'on en a faite en Français et en Latin.

"Ce livre," dit il, "a été écrit par une fille vertueuse, inspirée du S. Esprit, et enseignée par propre expérience. Dès sa jeunesse elle s'était donnée au Roi de gloire, dont elle suivit constamment les traces jusqu'à la mort, par toutes sortes de voies, douces et amères. Elle vivait chez son Père, où la soumission à un Père spirituel, les jeûnes, les prières, les veilles, et autres pénitences, lui soumièrent la chair à l'esprit: ensuite de quoi exercée par de grandes et de nombreuses tentations de l'ennemi, par une résistance virile, par l'amertume de bien des morts spirituelles, et par d'ardentes prières, la grace de Dieu lui fit surmonter ses passions et ses tentations, et acquérir beaucoup de vertus. Dès là elle était souvent si détenue dans l'entretien de son esprit avec Dieu, qu'elle en oubliait les affaires, le temps du repos, et le reste. La garde qu'elle faisait continuellement de son cœur pour le maintenir en pureté, la remplissait si forte de la lumière et de la joie de Dieu, que toute autre chose s'en effaçait de son esprit. Elle fut éprouvée comme l'or par le feu dans le creuset des souffrances, des mépris, et des persécutions de la part des gens du monde et des personnes dévotes: et alors elle ne faisait que prier et demeurer ferme dans la voie cachée où Dieu l'avait mise, toujours bénigne, toujours aimable, toujours joyeux, et priant Dieu pour ceux qui la faisaient souffrir. Il n'y a que Dieu qui sache la grandeur des peines intérieures qu'elle ressentait pour l'égarément des hommes et la perte des âmes. Elle communiait tous les jours sur le désir et sur les mérites de son Bien-aimé; et toutes ses pratiques allaient à ce but, que Dieu put avoir gloire, paix, plaisir et contentement en elle: ce qu'elle répétait souvent, disant même au moment de sa mort en s'adressant à Dieu, O Seigneur, eussiez-vous joie, eussiez-vous paix et contentement en moi! paroles avec lesquelles elle rendit doucement son esprit à son Dieu le 28 Janvier l'an 1540, qui était le 77e. de son âge."

Quoique son livre ait été souvent imprimé, il ne laisse pas pourtant d'être maintenant assez rare. La dernière impression Flamende qui en fut faite est d'Anvers de l'an 1629. Et c'est une des plus belles et de plus fidèles. Je ne sais si on l'a remis en meilleur Français, celui de la première édition ne pouvant plus être d'usage.

Comme ce livre n'est pas seulement pour la vie passive et contemplative, mais aussi pour l'active et l'ascétique, à laquelle plus de gens sont plus propres qu'à l'autre, et dont plus d'Auteurs ont traité que de l'autre, il ne sera pas hors de propos d'indiquer à cette occasion quelques-uns de ces Auteurs qui ont écrit, soit pour ce dernier genre de vie, soit pour l'un et pour l'autre tout ensemble.

Chacun sait que THOMAS à KEMPIS ou le livre de l'Imitation de J. CHRIST, est d'un grand secours pour ceux qui veulent revenir à eux mêmes, être imbus des maximes de l'Evangile, et se rendre à Dieu par la voie du cœur, qui ne garde point de méthode artificielle. Il insiste particulièrement sur le dégagement de toutes choses et de soi-même, et sur le devoir de se donner à Dieu entièrement et sans réserve. Il serait inutile de parler des Traductions et des Editions d'un livre aussi connu que celui-ci, qu'on a publié en quatre livres pour l'usage des Protestans.

Le Combat Spirituel, autre très excellent livret, que la pluralité de voix attribue au P. LAURENT SCUPOLI, Theatin, est un manuel très propre à ceux qui cherchant Dieu par la voie du cœur, veulent y joindre aussi celle d'une perception plus distincte, et procéder par ordre et par principes. Il réduit toute l'affaire à quatre points principaux, qui sont, la défiance de soi-même, la confiance en Dieu, l'oraison, et la pratique ou le bon usage de nos puissances. Il donne sur chacun de ces points d'excellentes règles, faciles à imprimer dans l'esprit pour s'en souvenir au besoin à la faveur de l'ordre qu'il observe clairement. S. François de Sales recommandait ce livre sur tous les autres et il l'appellait son Directeur. La bonne Edition et la plus complète doit avoir non 33 mais 66 chapitres, avec un petit traité adjoind de la paix de l'âme ou du sentier du ciel, et un autre* des douleurs mentales de J. Christ, comme on les trouve dans la Traduction du P. Mazotti imprimée à Paris plusieurs fois, quoique celle du P. Brignon de l'an 1688, qui est la plus Française et qu'on a réimprimée depuis peu à Bruxelles, n'ait pas ce dernier traité. Ce livret se trouve aussi en Latin, en Flamen, et en plusieurs autres langues.

L'Art ou la Methode de servir Dieu d'ALPHONSE DE MADRID est un autre petit manuel ou livret exquis, solide, tout praticable, essentiel, méthodique, et de la portée de tous. Son but et l'abrégé de son contenu est, que par le motif de la gloire et de la volonté de Dieu, et en reconnaissant notre néant de nature, et notre néant de chute et de péché, on s'emploie à servir Dieu principalement par l'exercice de nos facultés spirituelles du désir et de la liberté, en faisant pénitence, en nous haïssant nous-mêmes, en priant assidûment, en apprenant l'humilité et la patience de J. Christ, et en doutant nos passions, pour parvenir au pur amour de Dieu, joint au légitime du prochain et de nous-mêmes selon Dieu et pour lui. Je ne sais si l'Auteur l'a écrit en Latin ou en Espagnol: outre ces deux langues, on l'a encore en Français et en flamen. Mais il ne se trouve presque plus.

La Theologie Germanique est une autre petit ouvrage anonyme, ancien et fameux, trèsradical et très-exquis, qui ne contient presque que de purs principes de la vraie Théologie Chrétienne intérieure et pratique. Le tout de Dieu, le néant de l'homme, le mal d'appropriation, l'abnégation de soi et du reste, le discernement de la vraie lumière d'avec la fausse, et de la vraie liberté d'avec la fausse, etc. sont la matière qu'il traite sans beaucoup de méthode, mais d'une manière qu'on sent bien substantielle et venir d'une âme éclairée de Dieu. La préface de la nouvelle Edition Française qui vient de paraître, en apprendra plus de particularités.—Un de ses Editeurs Allemands, le célèbre Jean Arndt, jadis Inspecteur dans le Duché de Lunebourg, en avait imbibé l'esprit, aussi bien que de S. Macaire, qu'il savait par cœur, et de Taulère, comme il paraît par tous ses ouvrages de piété et signamment par son insigne livre du Vrai Christianisme. Ouvrage qui par sa manière de proposer tout le solide de la piété et de la vie vraiment chrétienne sans jamais quitter l'autorité et les termes de la Ste. Ecriture, s'est acquis l'estime universelle de tous.

Le P. ALEXIS DE SALO, Capucin, dans son Chemin assuré du Paradis, tâche de faire réduire en pratique sur toutes sortes de choses, et à l'égard de tous nos sens, passions, affections, et dans tous nos actes d'esprit, le précepte de Jesus Christ tant recommandé dans la Théologie Germanique, qu'il faut se renoncer soi-même pour le suivre; et il appuie tout ce qu'il enseigne par des exemples fort simples et fort naïfs. Son livre traduit de l'Italien a été imprimé à Lyon 1620, à Douai 1627, etc.

Le Père JUSTE LANSBERG, chartreux, qui vivait il y a un siècle, a écrit solidement et d'une manière touchante des choses intérieures et spirituelles de la piété et de la vraie dévotion. Ses œuvres sont comprises en deux volumes (in 4to) et en cinq parties, dont les trois premières sont des sermons sur les dominicales, sur les fêtes et sur l'histoire de la Passion; et les deux autres, des traités de piété, une apologie de la vie monastique, des lettres, et des vers de dévotion. Il est méthodique et suit fort bien son texte dans ses Sermons sans y oublier le sens intérieur et allégorique. De ses traités de piété, l'un en a traduit deux en beau Français il y a peu d'années, l'un de la milice Chrétienne, ou le Combat spirituel, imprimé à Paris en 1670, qui contient des instructions salutaires pour se dépourvoir des vices, et de la corruption, et pour acquérir les vertus et la pureté afin d'atteindre à l'union divine; l'autre livre qu'on a traduit du même Auteur, est un Discours de J. Christ à l'ame devote en forme de lettre, publié à Paris 1674, et ce traité n'est que la dernière partie de son Amoris divini Pharetra. Ce livre est un excellent manuel de dévotion et de piété, qui renferme en abrégé toutes les règles les plus solides de la conduite et de la vie vraiment Chrétienne. ERASME a écrit un petit livre approchant de ces deux-ci quant au titre et à la matière: c'est son Enchiridion Militis Christiani, ou Manuel du soldat chrétien, qui est une très-bonne pièce: mais il n'est pas si intérieur que ceux de Lansberg et ne va pas si loin. L'Auteur Espagnol du livret le Tresor de l'ame, traduit en toutes sortes de langues, sous le titre de Desiderius Pergrinus (à Rotterdam 1674),* ne cède en rien à Lansbergius, quand sous l'emblème aussi utile que divertissant d'un berger qui voyage pour trouver l'amour de Dieu, il nous met devant les yeux les progrès d'une âme qui par les vertus Chrétiennes, par les souffrances et par l'amour divin, atteint jusqu'aux prémices de la jouissance de Dieu. Il paraît que cet Auteur était Religieux, et partant que c'est à tort que Sandibus a prétendu le donner à Servet dans sa Bibliothèque des Antitrintaires.

ALPHONSE RODRIGUEZ, Jésuite, dans son excellente Pratique de la perfection Chrétienne, traite des mêmes matières, mais avec plus d'étendue. Il procède assez méthodiquement par des règles et par des instructions qu'il accompagne des exemples les plus beaux et les plus édifiants, qui soient dans les vies des S. S. Pères des déserts et d'autres saintes âmes; ce qui, joint à la grande clarté et facilité de son livre, ne peut que le rendre très-atrayant aussi bien que très-utile à toutes sortes de personnes jusqu'aux enfans mêmes.

En fait d'instructions munies d'exemples, voici des sources qui en fourniront grande quantité. Les vies des S. S. Pères des déserts, recueillies par le P. Rosweyds, Jésuite, et publiées à Anvers deux fois en Latin l'an 1615, (qui est l'Edition la plus belle et la plus correcte,) et l'an 1628; et deux fois en Flamen environ le même temps: publiées aussi en Allemand à Francfort il n'y a pas long temps; et que les Français, qui n'en avaient qu'une petite partie en vieux Gaulois, ont en parfaite-beau langage par le célèbre Traducteur Mons. d'Andilly, qui pourtant y a fait de trop retranchemens et d'omissions; sans qu'on y ait rien rétabli ni dans ses réimpressions de France, ni dans la nouvelle d'Anvers de l'an 1694. Il est vrai qu'il les a augmentées de quelques excellentes vies, comme entre autres de celle de STE. SYNCLETIQUE; mais on la trouve plus correcte dans le monumenta Greco-Latins de M^r. Cotelier; Tom I. et on aurait pu sans tort ajouter des mêmes monuments (Tom II. et III.) les admirables vies de S. EUTHYME et de S. SABAS.

Les Actes des Martyrs quand ils sont sincères, et tels qu'en a recueilli le P. Ruinart dans son livre Acta Martyrum sincera et selecta, imprimé à Paris en 1689. Le recueil de la Mort des Justes par le P. Lallemand, reimprimé aux Pais-Bas en 1673, sur l'édition de Paris. A quoi l'on peut joindre la Relation de la mort de quelques Religieux de la Trappe, comme de celle de Dom Muce, du Comte de Santena, réimprimées plusieurs fois à Bruxelles.

Les Conférences de JEAN CASSIEN, Prêtre de Marseille en réputation de sainteté dans le cinquième siècle, traduites du Latin en Français, et imprimées à Paris en 1665, mais sans la 13e Conférence, que l'on s'est imaginée être pleine d'erreurs sur les matières de la grace, quoiqu'il les connût mieux d'expérience que ses censeurs, encore qu'il ne se soit pas expliqué avec toutes les précautions nécessaires pour prévenir les oppositions des esprits disputeurs.

Les Règles de S. BASILE, les Institutions de S. DOROTHEE, Abbé du sixième siècle, traduites du Grec en Français par l'Abbé de la Trappe, et imprimées à Paris l'an 1686, L'Echelle Sainte de S. Jean Climaque, Père et Abbé du même siècle, dont on a des Editions Grecques-Latines, Latines toutes seules, et une double traduction Française de M. d'Andilly, dont la première fut imprimée à part à Paris en 1653, l'autre se trouve et à part, et jointe avec de longues notes aux vies des Saints Pères des déserts, 1675. Ce qu'il y a d'Evagrius, quoique incomplet, dans les Monumens Grecs-Latins de Mr. Cotelier, (Tom. 3, à Paris en 1686.) Les Apophthegmes des Peres, auprès du même; Tous ces livres là, sont remplis d'instructions fort divines, et d'exemples très animans, et en même temps très-convaincans par des effets réels que la pratique d'une vie parfaitement Chrétienne, pénitente et spirituelle, n'est pas une chose ni impossible, ni seulement en idée.

On pourrait se convaincre vivement et salutairement de la même vérité par un très grand nombre d'autres Vies admirables de plusieurs personnes excellentes de toutes sortes d'états et de conditions*, de celles même dont la mémoire est encore assez récente : mais pour ne pas choquer la scrupulosité de certains gens, et pour éviter la prolixité, il me suffira de ne faire mention que de deux, l'une d'un homme et l'autre d'une fille. La première est la Vie de Monsieur de Renty, de qui la haute vertu fut depuis peu l'admiration de la France et de tout Paris où il mourut l'an 1649. Cette excellente vie, dont le P. St. JURE, Jésuite, (auteur pieux, spirituel et solide de plusieurs autres traités,) nous a donné l'histoire, est un raccourci de ce qu'il a et de plus exquis en fait de vertus Chrétiennes, et de plus solide dans la vraie spiritualité. L'on y peut remarquer non seulement les maximes, mais aussi la pratique de ce qu'enseignent le vrais Mystiques sur les différents états des âmes, sur l'amour pur, sur l'oraison et la contemplation, et autres matières semblables, qui y sont touchées, comme tout le rest, d'une manière si nette et si solide, que les lecteurs qui ont le moins de dispositions soit à ces sortes de sujets, ou à la lecture de ces sortes de vies, ne peuvent se défendre d'en avoir le cœur attendri et persuadé. Voici le jugement qu'en a fait un Protestant de considération, et qui ne saurait être suspecté de partialité non plus que de crédulité sur ces sortes de choses : Quelque entêtement qu'on ait encore pour la fable, il faut avouer que la Vie de Monsieur de Renty n'en ressent pas. L'on y remarque de si excellentes vertus, qu'on doit mettre avec justice celui qui les a pratiquées entre les plus grands modèles que la France ait fournis à notre siècle. Ce sont les paroles de M. Burnet, Evêque (Anglais) de Salisbury, dans sa préface sur la vie de M. Adele : et c'est le même, à ce qu'on dit, qui a traduit et publié en Anglais la même vie de M. de Renty dont il s'agit.—L'autre vie, dont je viens de dire que je voulais faire mention, est la vie de la Mere ELISABETH de l'Enfant JESUS, qui n'est inférieure en rien à celle de M. de Renty, lequel avait servi de Guide, aussi bien que le P. St. Jure et M. de Bernières, à cette excellente Religieuse, morte à Paris l'an 1677. Sa vie est imprimée au même lieu, l'an 1688. Celle de la Baronne de CHANTAL est trop célèbre pour avoir besoin de recommandation particulière, si seulement elle n'était pas si rare en ces pays. [V. les Vies.]

Au reste, en lisant les vies des S. Pères des déserts, il ne faut pas s'en rebuter d'abord par la lecture de celles qui sont tirées des Epîtres de S. JEROME, qu'on a mises les premières, et qui, à dire le vraie, se ressentent un peu trop des déclamations affectées de sa rhétorique. Celles de RUFFIN, de PALLADE, de THEODORE, de S. SULPICE SEVERE, les recueils de JEAN MOSCHUS, et de plusieurs autres, sont quelque chose d'une trempe plus simple, plus naïve et plus touchante.

Entre les auteurs qui ont écrit à dessein touchant les matières de l'Oraison, de la Méditation, de la Contemplation et des choses qui en dépendent, en voici quelques uns des plus familiers et des plus utiles.

S. PIERRE D'ALCANTARA, ami et contemporain de Ste. Thérèse, a écrit un petit Traité bien utile de l'Oraison et de la méditation, qui a été imprimé plusieurs fois en Latin, en Français, et en d'autres langues, de même que le traité de HORSTIUS, Paradisus animæ, manuel pratique et exquis sur tous les sujets d'Oraison. La première partie du Thalamus Sponsi, roule aussi sur cette matière, de même que la première partie de l'Introduction à la vie devote de S. FRANÇOIS DE SALES dont le livre entier contient de très-bonnes instructions de piété et de conduite pour toutes sortes de personnes, même pour celles qui sont dans le grand monde. Ce traité, avec celui de l'Amour de Dieu, et ses Lettres, excellent entre les ouvrages de cet Auteur, dont le caractère est, de tâcher à rendre facile à tout le monde la pratique de la vraie piété, et d'inspirer à tous la paix et une dévotion solide, tant par une condescendance équitable aux dispositions des âmes, que par un esprit de douceur toute singulière, caractère tant recommandé par Jésus Christ, et qu'entre les anciens S. CLEMENT, dans sa divine lettre aux Corinthiens, et S. POLYCARPE dans la sienne aux Philippiens, ont parfaitement exprimé.

Le P. NOUET, et le P. RAPIN, Jésuites, ont écrit de fort bonnes choses de l'Oraison et de ses espèces : le première plus amplement dans son Homme d'Oraison imprimé à Paris l'an 1674, et l'autre en abrégé, dans son Oraison sans illusion, qui est le même livret qu'on a réimprimé dans la seconde partie de la Théologie du Cœur, sous le titre d'abrégé de la Théologie Mystique. Dans la même partie de la Théologie du Cœur il y a un petit traité d'une fille, intitulé de la vie intérieure, où la matière et les espèces de l'Oraison sont expliquées avec une simplicité et une facilité non communes : et plus brièvement encore dans la quatrième conférence du divin Livret, le Berger illuminé, qui est le premier de cette même Théologie du cœur. Un pauvre villageois† (comme il paraît par le style) a aussi écrit d'une manière très-affective un traité de Méthode d'Oraison, ou Abregé de l'Agneau occis, imprimé à Rennes, 1669, où par la considération de Jésus Christ dans le cœur, il enseigne trois sortes d'oraisons proportionnées aux trois états de la vie spirituelle. Le petit traité de Madame GUYON,* Moyen court et facile de faire Oraison, avec son excellente, Exposition du Cantique de Salomon, est aussi au jugement de bien des personnes, un des plus concis et ensemble des plus faciles et des plus achevés qui se puissent trouver sur ce sujet, quoique d'autres en fassent des jugemens bien différens. Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli.

ANTOINE ROJAS, Prêtre Espagnol, dans son traité la Vie de l'Esprit, imprimé à Paris l'an 1660, et dont on a publié depuis peu à Cologne (1696) la première partie en Alleman : le célèbre MALAVAL de Marseille, dans sa Pratique facile de la Contemplation, imprimée trois fois à Paris, publiée à Rome en Italien par les soins du Cardinal d'Estrée, et qu'on a aussi mise au jour en Flamen : son continuateur le P. EPIPHANE LOUIS, Abbé d'Estival, dans ses belles et solides Conférences Mystiques, imprimées à Paris, l'an 1676, aussi bien que dans ses Lettres ; la Guide Spirituelle de MOLINOS où les prétendues erreurs qu'un certain Protestant prétend Historique-mystique lui impute dans l'abrégé qu'il en a fait, ne se trouvent point sinon que la passion et l'ignorance les y mettent par de fausses gloses ; puisque les premiers Approuvateurs dont quelques-uns étaient inquisiteurs, n'y ont point vu de mal, non plus que les gens de bien soit d'entre les Protestans, qui l'ont traduite en Latin et en Flamen, soit de toute l'Europe, où il s'en est fait plus de vingt éditions en diverses langues en moins de six années. Le frère LAURENT DE LA RESURRECTION, Religieux Carme, mort depuis peu à Paris, dans les traités qui ont paru de lui, sa Vie, ses Mœurs, ses Lettres, et ses Entretiens, qu'on a tous réimprimés en Hollande et joints aux traités de Madame Guyon.†

Enfin le P. PINEY, Dominicain, (qui écrit un peu trop en Prédicateur) dans son Traité des Trois différentes Manières de se rendre intérieurement Dieu présent, (savoir, par le souvenir amoureux de Dieu et de ses perfections ; par l'adhérence amoureuse à sa volonté ; et par la peine sensible où l'on est d'y manquer,) traité imprimé à Lyon, en 1685 : et encore toute la seconde Partie du Thalamus Sponsi ; — tous ces auteurs-là, dis-je, sont très-bons pour la Contemplation active ou ordinaire, et pour l'exercice continué de vivre en la présence de Dieu : en quoi la Méthode du Frère Laurent, § quoique homme sans lettres, excelle au dessus de tous par sa simplicité, par sa cordialité, par sa facilité, et par sa solidité. Le Cardinal BONA dans sa Voie abrégée pour aller à Dieu, trania Armorica, deinde et Parisiis. De eo sunt intelligenda quæ in Epistola decima P. Rigoleuci (in Opusculorum suorum volumine, pag. 405.) leguntur, ex Gallico sic Latine reddita : *Inler illos qui mundi negotiis (sive laboribus) sunt ex officio impliciti, reperuntur nonnumquam animæ illa ferventes quæque per interiorum mentis recollectionem, in qua se exercent, principio suo (Deo) tam arcte uniantur, ut hominum lotiusve mundi sermones ac rumores, qui earum aures continue circumsonant, non magis tangant atque officiant earum mentem ac spiritum quam ventorum sibilus vel aquarum susurri. * Prodiere postmodum, anno 1704, ejusdem Opuscula, quotquot eo usque protulerunt haberi, omnia, et nitidiora, et correctiora, et auctiora tractatulo insigni, cui nomen fecit, Les Torrents. Ea Editio, cujus Titulus est, Les Opusculs spirituels de Mad. J. B. M. de la Motte-Guyon, incipit ab Editoris generali Præfatione quæ Apologiæ species est tum pro Auctore, Domina Guionia, tum pro ejus Operibus ac doctrina contra ea quæ Episcopus Meldunensis in libro Instruction sur les États d'Oraison, etc. aliique opposuere. Post primum de Oratione facile faciendi tractatulum modo memoratum, sequitur hæc in editione, egregius iste qui Torrentes dicitur, quia sub torrentium aquarum emblemate ac similitudine describit illa admirabiliter vias non paucas purificationis, per quas transire oportet eas animas quæ hæc in vita ad statum veluti Apostolicum pertingere debent, ut alias deinde lucrifaciant Deo : cujus vero status vestigia multa passim in sequenti Explicatione Cantici Canticorum eadem exhibet. Adjunctus est et his opusculis tractatulus serius repertus Regularum pro illis qui Infantia Jesu Christi colendæ ac imitandæ sese devoverunt, et societatem aliquam propterea inter se instituerunt. Dicitur Nobilis illa Domina adhuc in vivis esse, et quidem libera, et in secessu, apud generum suum, Comitum de V. . . . in provincia Vastiniensi. Serius quoque exhibitus est libellus Directoris ejus P. E. DE LA COMBE, Brevis instructio ad Perfectionem Christianam, etc. qui deinde seorsum excusus est.

Notandum, verba Tractatus Torrenitium prima fuisse ambiguitati obnoxia. In manuscripto erant, primo, nomina Jesus, Maria, Joseph. Dein sequebatur titulus, Exordium de modo quo Deus format animas, etc., tum ipse contextus, Eorum nomine . . . scribere incipiam, quæ verba relativa Editor referri putavit ad illas animas, quarum scilicet, nomine, hoc est, rogatu, vel commodò, scriptio facta sit : quamvis forte Auctor eadem retulerit ad tres illos prænominos Sanctissimos, quos vero, quia a contextu per titulum exordii aliquot lineis constantis separabantur, non cogitavit Editor cum contextu relationem habere, sed sola Catholico-Romanorum quorundam consuetudine præponi, adeoque et omitti posse propter illos quibus ea consuetudo in usu non est.

duite du Latin en beau Français, et imprimée à Bruxelles, 1683 : et le F. Jean de S. Samson dans son Traité de l'Amour aspiratif, qui se trouve dans la seconde Partie de la Théologie du Cœur, vont au même but, par la voie des aspirations continues, à quoi conduit aussi un petit livret Français, fort solide et fort affectif, intitulé, Méthode pour converser avec Dieu, imprimé à Paris, l'an 1685, et réimprimé à Bruxelles quelque temps après.

Le P. GUILLORÉE, Jésuite, dont on a six ou sept excellents traités imprimés plus d'une fois à Paris ; les Lettres spirituelles d'un Ecclesiastique recueillies par M. de LASSOT et publiées depuis peu au même lieu en 5 petits volumes, peuvent être d'un usage fort grand et presque universel sur tout ce qui concerne tant la vie active et extérieure, que l'intérieure et la Contemplative. Il en est de même de l'excellent Catechisme spirituel du P. SURIN, Jésuite, imprimé plusieurs fois (la dernière en 1693) à Paris, en 2 volumes : aussi bien que de ses Fondemens de la vie spirituelle, réimprimés à Liège en 1679, dans lesquels l'auteur à l'occasion de plusieurs sentences de Thomas à Kempis, dont il donne l'explication par forme de demandes et de réponses, achemine solidement son lecteur à la vie spirituelle par la déduction de ses points le plus importants, de ses voies le plus faciles, et de ses obstacles le plus nécessaires à éviter et souvent les moins aperçus. Le petit Catechisme Chretien pour la vie interieure de M. OLIER,* supérieur du séminaire de S. Sulpice, imprimé souvent à Paris, et publié même en Flamen à Louvain 1686, contient le substantiel de ce que son titre promet, en se tenant presque toujours aux paroles et aux plus claires instructions de la Ste. Ecriture.

Pour finir par une fille cette section qu'on a commencée par une fille, disons un mot des Œuvres spirituelles de JEANNE DE CAMBRY, Religieuse recluse à Lille. Sa vie imprimée à part à Anvers 1659, contient beaucoup de particularités sur les conduites de Dieu envers les âmes. Ses œuvres, qui ont paru ensemble à Tournai en 1665, ne traitent pas moins solidement, ni même moins régulièrement et nettement des vérités et de la pratique des choses chrétiennes, intérieures et mystiques, que les écrits des hommes les plus étudiés. Dans son plus grand traité, qui est celui de la Ruine de l'amour propre, (qui fut imprimé séparément à Paris), elle traite par ordre toute la vie intérieure ; et elle en explique les états (comme Rusbrok dans son Ornatus nuptiarum spiritualium), par l'emblème de ce qui se passe successivement dans les quatre saisons de l'année. Ce traité divisé en quatre livres, parle dans le premier de l'amour-propre, et en général des grâces de Dieu pour le supprimer : dans le second, de l'avancement des grâces de Dieu dans les profiteurs, y appliquant plusieurs choses du Cantique de Salomon : dans le troisième, des privations rigoureuses, des tentations et épreuves spirituelles ; et dans le quatrième, du rétablissement de l'âme en état parfait. Ces deux derniers sont très-sublimes, aussi bien que très-propres à satisfaire aux difficultés qu'on fait souvent aveuglément contre les voies intérieures. Son Flambeau Mystique, qui se trouve aussi imprimé à part, est une courte explication tant des choses que des mots de la voie et de la Théologie Mystique, aussi bien qu'un abrégé d'instructions pour les Directeurs des âmes. Il y en a pour la Direction des familles dans son traité de la Reforme du Mariage. Celui de l'Excellence de la Solitude est plus pour les personnes retirées ; et l'Exercice pour parvenir à l'Amour de Dieu, qui est aussi solide que court et méthodique, est à l'usage de tout le monde, comme aussi celui qui a pour titre Lamentation de l'Âme captive dans son corps mortel, où elle fait voir, qu'en quelque genre et en quelque état de vie que l'on soit, même dans le plus charmant et le plus sublime de la vie spirituelle, il se rencontre néanmoins partout matières de lamentations et de larmes. Sa manière de dire les choses porte le caractère d'une naïveté cordiale et d'une netteté solide et forte propre à convaincre l'esprit et le cœur de ceux qui cherchent le vrai Bien avec sincérité. Il semble qu'il entre ordinairement moins de cela dans les écrits des hommes que dans ceux des femmes.

ANNOTATION.—A l'égard des Protestans, (remarks the Editor of the French edition, in his Introduction,) j'avoue que la pureté de leur religion et la simplicité de leurs idées ne s'accroissent pas des termes embarrassés des Mystiques. Le seul mot de Contemplation les effarouche, ceux de vue generale, de foi obscure et confuse, leur donnent de l'horreur, parce qu'ils sentent le Papisme, et lors qu'ils entendent parler de secheresse, de tenebres divines, de nuit obscure ou resplendissante, de inaction, de aneantissement, de voie interieure, de martyre spirituel, de purification active et passive, de contemplation infuse, d'union et de transformations divines, de deification ; ils ne peuvent s'imaginer comment il y a des gens si fous, pour dire sérieusement de si grandes pauvretés.

* Egregius admodum ac solidissimus hicce libellus novissime recusus est in Belgio, Gallice, annexis de Vita gratia fervidissimis inexplētæ abundantia animi elevationibus. Titulus libri est: Catechisme Chretien pour la vie interieure par M. Olier, 1703. Nullum unquam vidi Catechismum, et molis quidem adeo parvæ, huic æquiparandum.

Mais on les prie de considérer que les Mystiques pourraient bien avoir eu de bonnes raisons de se servir de ces termes, et les avoir cru très-propres à exprimer les idées qu'a donné la vie de JÉSUS CHRIST, resuscitée en eux-mêmes. On n'entreprend pas présentement de justifier ces idées; on dira seulement que puisque personne ne condamne les termes de Géométrie, d'Architecture, ou de Peinture, parce qu'il ne les entend pas, à cause de la persuasion où l'on est, que ceux qui possèdent ces arts et ces sciences, ont plusieurs connoissances que le vulgaire n'a pas, et qu'ils ont besoin, pour les exprimer, de mots qui lui sont inconnus; il n'est pas juste non plus de rejeter les phrases Mystiques, parce que ceux qui n'ont pas étudié les Théologiens, qui les emploient, ne les entendent pas du premier coup.

Voici le principe de l'erreur: Tout le monde s'imagine que la religion est quelque chose de fort facile; et l'on a raison. Il n'est rien de plus aisé que de comprendre les fondemens du Christianisme, et de devenir bon chrétien, puis qu'il ne faut que consulter attentivement la lumière naturelle, lire l'Evangile, vouloir donner son cœur à Dieu, et exécuter sincèrement cette résolution. Mais y a-t-il beaucoup de gens qui le fassent?

On tire de cette vérité une conséquence très fautive. La plupart du monde se contente d'une certaine honnêteté morale, ou de la profession du Christianisme, quoique cependant l'amour-propre règne toujours dans le cœur, et qu'on soit encore tout plein de soi-même et du siècle. Dans cette disposition d'esprit, on se persuade peu à peu que la piété ne consiste qu'en cela, ou tout au plus en quelques attraites de dévotion sensible: de sorte que lorsqu'on entend dire que ce n'est là que l'état de ceux qui commencent, et qu'il faut passer jusqu'à se renoncer entièrement, s'aneantir en la présence de Dieu, étouffer toutes ses passions, et même ses pensées et ses connoissances, n'avoir d'esprit ni de volonté que les lumières et le bon plaisir de Dieu, être uni et transformé en lui; on s'imagine que tous ces grands mots ne renferment qu'un pur galimatias, et que ce ne sont que des visions d'un esprit mélancolique, parce qu'on se croit homme de bien, et qu'on ne sent rien de semblable. Les plus soupçonneux, qui sont d'ordinaire les plus ignorans, regardent ces expressions comme des paroles magiques, qui ne sont inventées que pour tromper les simples, et qui renferment quelque erreur secret.

Si l'étendue d'une préface me permettait d'entrer dans le détail, je pourrais faire voir que beaucoup de termes des Mystiques sont tirés de l'Ecriture sainte, et qu'ils ne s'en sont servis que dans le sens de Jesus Christ et de ses Apôtres: mais cela demande un ouvrage à part. Il me suffit présentement d'assurer le lecteur qu'il n'a qu'à se donner tout à Dieu, et à faire une étude sincère de la piété et de la morale chrétienne, pour entendre bientôt le langage des vrais Mystiques: car j'exclus de ce nombre certains individus extravagans, qui font consister la contemplation en des ravissements et des extases; ce qui est sans doute la cause que cette espèce de Théologie est tombée dans le mépris chez les Protestans, et devenue l'objet de l'admiration des Catholiques superstitieux.

La contemplation, selon Molinos, Malaval, Jean de la Croix, Harphius, et les autres vrais Mystiques, n'est autre chose que cet état de l'âme, qui a toujours Dieu devant les yeux, qui n'entrepren rien que pour lui plaire, qui ne murmure jamais contre ses ordres, qui est parfaitement resignée à sa volonté, qui baise la main qui la frappe, qui se regarde comme indigne des faveurs du ciel, qui ne lui demande jamais des miracles ni des grâces extraordinaires, qui reçoit avec tranquillité et dans une sainte indifférence le bien et le mal, qui ne se croit rien, qui ne s'estime rien, qui ne veut que ce que Dieu veut, en un mot, qui ne vit plus elle-même, c'est Jésus Christ qui vit en elle, et son Esprit saint qui l'anime. C'est là cette nouvelle creature, que Dieu forme dans les âmes, qui regenere véritablement, et que je ne saurais décrire, parce que je suis encore trop imparfait, et que la langue et les expressions me manquent. Mais comment en pourrais je venir à bout, puis que le saint et savant Usherius, ayant commencé un traité sur la nature de la sanctification, à la sollicitation d'un de ses amis, avoua qu'il en sentait alors si peu les effets, qu'il n'en pouvait parler que comme un perroquet, sans connoissance ni intelligence de ce qu'il en aurait écrit. L'ami auquel il parlait, tout étonné d'entendre faire une confession si humble à un chrétien aussi parfait que l'était Usherius, et que Dieu avait souvent honoré du don de Prophétie: ce dévot Prélat poursuivit en ces termes: "Il faut que je vous dise que nous n'entendons pas bien ce que c'est que la sanctification et la nouvelle créature; ce n'est pas moins que d'être amené à un parfait renoncement de sa propre volonté, et une entière soumission à la volonté de Dieu, en sorte que l'on vive dans une continuelle offrande de son âme à Dieu, dans les flammes de l'amour, en s'offrant à lui en sacrifice, comme une parfaite holocauste en Jésus Christ. Il y a beaucoup de gens qui font profession du Christianisme; mais bien peu qui sentent par expérience ces opérations dans leur âme."

Je veux que cela soit, dira un Protestant: mais que fait cela pour justifier les phrases des Mystiques; pourquoi envelopper sous des termes obscurs la science du salut, et faire un langage à part de ce que Dieu veut révéler à tous les hommes? Ne sait-on pas combien les expressions des scholastiques ont corrompu la Théologie, et qu'en ces sortes de matières, on invente rarement de nouveaux mots, qu'on n'invente aussi de nouvelles choses, ou qu'on n'obscurcisse des idées claires, ou qu'on n'en détermine d'autres à un certain sens, que Dieu voulait qui demeuraient suspendues et confuses, ne nous en ayant pas dit davantage? J'avoue que cette objection suffirait seule pour faire rejeter tout d'un coup tous les termes nouveaux des Mystiques s'ils regardaient les mystères de la foi et de la Théologie spéculative, puisque les termes nouveaux sont extrêmement suspects en cette occasion, et qu'ils sont presque l'unique cause de toutes les disputes et de tous les schismes, qui déchirent le Christianisme; mais ces expressions ne concernent que la morale, et ne marquent autre chose que les différentes dispositions, où se trouve une âme, qui s'est consacrée à Dieu, et les divers états par où elle passe.

A l'égard de l'obscurité des livres mystiques, elle peut avoir diverses causes. Il y a des Mystiques Ideals, qui étudient cette science par vanité, comme on fait la plupart des autres, et qui n'ayant point de piété solide, ne peuvent parler des effets de la grâce et des opérations du Saint Esprit dans les âmes, que par imagination ou mémoire et le plus souvent d'une manière fautive et confuse. Ceux-ci, pour faire les savans, ont ordinairement mêlé, dans leurs explications mystiques, les conceptions confuses de la métaphysique d'Aristote; ce qui a achevé de gâter cette Théologie.

Cette obscurité peut aussi procéder du défaut d'attention et d'expérience de ceux qui les lisent. LA SCIENCE MYSTIQUE est la science du cœur de l'homme et de l'amour de Dieu. On peut bien

l'appeler mystique ou cachee; car il y a très-peu de gens qui l'étudient véritablement, et qui s'y rendent experts. Ceux qui ne rentrent presque jamais en eux-mêmes, qui ne sentent point leurs besoins spirituels, qui n'aiment pas Dieu sincèrement, qui ne se donnent pas tout entiers à lui, qui ne consultent point la vérité éternelle; comment entendraient-ils le langage des saints, et ne seraient-ils point éblouis des clartés célestes, auxquelles leurs yeux foibles ne sont pas accoutumés? * * * [So far from the editor's introduction to the "Spiritual Guide." The following sentence is taken from the commencement of the author's preface, and may be said to contain the principle which is carried out in almost every sentence of that most admirable practical treatise of Mystic Divinity:—

"Le but de la vraie philosophie est de perfectionner l'esprit, et de pousser la connoissance et la recherche de la vérité, aussi loin qu'on le peut. La fin de la THEOLOGIE MYSTIQUE est de PURIFIER L'AME, ET DE L'UNIR AVEC DIEU, AUTANT QU'ELLE PEUT L'ETRE EN CETTE V.E."]

In his introduction to "le Traité de la Communion Quotidienne," the editor thus observes concerning it:—"L'Auteur y prouve qu'on peut et même qu'on doit communier tous les jours, pourvu qu'on ne soit pas en péché mortel, c'est à dire, déchu de l'état de grace, et en état de condamnation présente. Il allègue une infinité de Pères et de Théologiens scholastiques, qui ont soutenu ce sentiment: mais si quelqu'un doute que la fréquente communion ait été en usage dans l'Eglise primitive, il n'a qu'à lire la Lettre 289, de Saint Basile adressée à la Dame Cesaria où cet Evêque traite expressément de cette matière, et montre dès l'entrée que c'est une chose bonne et utile de communier tous les jours. Il témoigne qu'encore de son temps, on communiait quatre fois la semaine dans son église, le Dimanche, le Mercredi, le Vendredi, et le Samedi, et même d'autres jours, si l'on célébrait la mémoire de quelque martyr."

ANNOTATION.—This learned, inquisitive, and most pious individual—notwithstanding his early variations from the orthodox christian theory, (through want of that perfect light which has since been afforded in Law,)—besides being the author of the above-mentioned voluminous and profound works, was also the editor of numerous other treatises, all relating to mystic divinity. Indeed, he may be said to have been the first to draw forth this science from its seclusion, to have shown the unity of its spirit in the ascetic, mystic, theosophic, or other forms, in which it had been found in various ages and individuals, and to have presented it in a proper point of view to the consideration of the world. The following is an enumeration of part of his labours, in this respect, being treatises which he collected together, studied, digested, and supplied with original introductions, prefaces, apologies, or other needful explanatory discourses, in some cases translating them into French; and also published, or obtained publishers for them, among the booksellers of Amsterdam, Cologne, and other places where Protestantism was tolerated, a Romish inquisition over the press not erected, and a just degree of religious liberty enjoyed; viz: Œuvres de Madame Guyon, 36 vols.; Œuvres de Bertot, 4 vols.; Œuvres de Bourignon, 18 vols.; La Vie de la bonne Armelle; de Grejoire Lopez; du Marquis de Renty; Catherine Adorna; les Œuvres et la Vie d'Angele de Foligni, with an appendix from Blosius; Théologie du Cœur, contenant Le Berger illumine, L'Abrege de la Perfection Chretienne, La Ruine de l'Amour propre, La Vie Interieure, L'amour Aspiratif, Abrege de la Theologie Mystique, du P. Rapin; Théologie Réelle, contenant une Preface Apologétique sur la Theologie Mystique, la Theologie Germanique, Traite du Retablissement de l'homme, (Marie Henrics) Lettre sur la Regeneration, Regles et Maximes Spirituelles tirees de celles de Jean de S. Samson; Molinos' Spiritual Guide, et concernant le Quietisme et les Quietistes; Théologie de la Présence de Dieu, contenant La Vie, les Mœurs, les Entretiens, la Pratique, et les Lettres du Frere Laurent de la Resurrection, etc.; with many other treatises of a similar character.

The labours and services to religion of this very worthy and indefatigable writer cannot, indeed, be duly estimated by us; there may, however, be occasion to refer to him again, in connection with the subject of the Philadelphians, or with that of the revival of the life and spirit of Christianity in the early part of the last century, to which, doubtless, the practical writings of Bourignon, through his instrumentality, in some degree contributed. His treatises may be profitably perused by the candidate, in their due place, that is, as he shall come to feel a necessity for the knowledge thereof; after having become thoroughly master of the works of that original writer and standard of all scientific, as well as practical divinity, the subject of the present proposed biography.—Would the reader judge for himself of the groundless fantasies, and grossly heterodox opinions promulgated in Bourignon's writings, (and indiscriminately espoused by Poiret,) which she unhesitatingly declares to be truths revealed to her by God,—as also of the great piety and ability, and great weakness of her adherents, he has only to refer to pp. 44—52—78 of Dr. Garden's "Apology" for her, and the other portions of that work. Poiret thus boldly speaks of the benefits he had derived from her writings, in the premonition to the fourth volume of his 'Divine Economy,' but it must be remembered that this was in the first ardour of his religious experience:—"I profess, honestly," says he, "that had it not been for the writings and conversation of Madame Bourignon, I had known nothing solidly in divine matters, nor indeed in natural. All the truths [and groundless theories] I have proposed in these treatises, are only the consequences of her principles, or of my own deductions, which I carried still deeper, encouraged by the light she gave me into all subjects whatsoever. Nay, more, had it not been for the Divine light I received from her, I should, to this day, have been in the darkness of death, in blindness of heart, in the slavery and idolatry of vain, proud, presumptuous, and chimerical corrupt reason; and such a creature, that it would have been better for me never to have been born.

"For whatever knowledge in the Scripture or divinity, in holy or mystical books, I might before have acquired,—and I fancied I understood all these very well,—yet was all but darkness till, by God's grace, I met with the writings and conversation of this remarkable instrument of God.

"For my own part, I confess I have taken, and do yet take the substance of what she says for truths coming from the mouth of God himself (!) being convinced thereof in my very soul, by such effects as can proceed from God alone [an illogical inference]. And so I made no scruple to embrace these truths as sure rules, to consider them thoroughly, and to search out the consequences of them, knowing that from truth nothing but truth could follow! * * *—And I cannot comprehend how any one, whose heart is not wilfully set against God, can condemn or slight her writings, if he has read them with any attention, or at least the chief of them, such as the Light of the World; Light risen in Darkness; Solid Virtue; Antichrist discovered; Renovation of the Gospel Spirit; the Touchstone; and the Apology before her life. [If the general reader has strength of understanding to separate the chaff from the wheat in theological writings, all the mere speculative novelties* from the true practical Christianity, he may derive profit from a perusal of these works.]

* Law, in a letter to Dr. Cheyne, speaking of MARSAY, an anonymous French writer of his day, the author of 'le Témoinage d'un Enfant de la Vérité,' and other 'Œuvres,' nine vols., 12mo. 1738—40, thus writes: " * * * I have read the Témoinage d'un Enfant, etc. The first of those discourses I read about three or four years ago, in the high Dutch. I was then acquainted with a German, who knew the author very well. He told me [query, P. B. in Somerset Gardens, 1738,] that he was an academic, of between forty and fifty years of age, famed for great learning, and much read in J. B. and the mystical divines; all which was too plain to be doubted of. I need not tell you that I much admire this author, where he only treats of the nature, progress, and perfection of the spiritual life. But I think it is as plain and unquestionable that he is a very fanciful writer; mixing ungrounded notions and flights [about the planets being inhabited by human beings, souls from earth, etc.] with that part of religion which should be frank from them. And therefore to me he appears an author not at all fit for the public perusal, and had been better only read or handed about in manuscript.

"Spirituality itself is such a contrariety both to learned and unlearned human nature, that nothing whimsical or conjectural should be connected with it. This gives Rationalists too great an opportunity of exploding it all as chimerical, and makes even people well-inclined to it, to be distrustful of it, and afraid of giving into it. Whereas, if the true spirituality of the Christian life was kept within its own bounds, supported only by Scripture doctrines, and the plain appearances of nature and experience, human reason would be strangely at a loss to know how to expose it.

"I could almost wish that we had no spiritual books, but those that have been wrote by Catholics. [This was written more than a hundred years ago.] Not a line or a thought in Bertot wants to be excused. You have every instruction from him that a person come from heaven could give you; and always see that he is only teaching you the true height and depth of the gospel.

"The Philadelphians here, in the last century, and their correspondents in Holland, are a full proof of what I have observed above [concerning the mixing up whimsical conjectures with true religion, and then baptizing the compound with the title of divine visions and revelations.]

"The author and translators of the 'Témoinage,' have plainly adopted the Bourignon scheme. I need not tell you that this scheme cannot maintain the most fundamental articles of our redemption, the necessity of the sufferings, death, and sacrifice of our Saviour, etc.—Prejudice, and fondness for singularity, carried even the pious and learned Poiret so far as to defend Bourignon in this and other matters, contrary to the gospel." Marsay's singular Life was translated into English, A.D. 1772, by a Moravian preacher, at the request of Henry Brooke, of Dublin, heretofore named, and the author of "Redemption," a poem: it exists only in MS. of which the writer has a copy.

Another individual demanding notice on the present occasion, is the celebrated BARON SWEDENBORG, a scientific mineralist, and natural philosopher, who, quitting those comparatively obscure studies, appeared in the field of theology about sixteen years prior to Law's decease. He was a man of a highly-cultivated mind, of great inductive powers, and research in theoretical science, and of a subtle imagination, though totally devoid of that masculine strength, penetration, and severity of judgment which are ever found to be the characteristics of powerful common sense, and a sound practical understanding.—It is supposed that his mind became ~~not~~ turned to the popular subjects of theology and metaphysics, by Law's 'Appeal,' 'Animadversions,' and other tracts then published; and by the indiscriminating perusal of the writings of Jane Lead, Bourignon, Poiret, Englebert, Marsay, Reeve and Muggleton, and other famous visionaries, and ideal writers of the German, Dutch, French, English, and other schools, orthodox and spurious, ancient and modern; then again by the reminiscence of occasional glimmerings of deep truth in the works of the ancient philosophers, correspondent with what is so fundamentally, systematically, and freshly revealed in Behmen; and along with all this must be taken into account his observations of the wrangling and janglings concerning 'faith and works,' and such like letter-learning topics of knight-errant religionists in his day, who, he plainly perceived, understood not their subject in its ground, and were therefore vainly fighting in the dark. To which must also be added, the consideration of his science as a physiologist, his apprehension of the truth of the principles of nature, and of the philosophy of spirit and body, so wonderfully opened in Behmen, and his endeavouring to elaborate that ancient philosophical subject, divested of Behmen's technicality, in a scientific manner. For there is not a truth of any import in all his works, which may not be instantly divested of the form he has given it, and traced to its source in Behmen's principles, whether derived immediately from him, or through his expositors. All these were splendid materials for a man of Swedenborg's peculiar constitution of mind, his great power of mental elaboration, calm even temperament, and indefatigable application, to work with; and what were the results he produced, may be seen in his writings after the year 1745. [In a new edition of part of Lead's works, published in 12mo., London: Ogle and Co., 1816, the editor makes the following remark: "Such persons as are favored with a clear comprehension of the profound works of Jacob Behmen, will also have the art of separating the pure gold from the pernicious and most infectious dross in the writings of the noble, truly excellent, and very learned Emanuel Swedenborg."]

Among the collection of Law's MSS. which came from Mr. Langcake, were found copies of two familiar letters written to a friend and admirer of Swedenborg, supposed to be Hartley, who had sent the writer one of his works, or a summary thereof, to peruse. As there are good grounds for considering Law to have been the author of those letters, we insert them in this place, leaving them to stand upon their own merits. The first proceeds thus:—

"I here return you the book of Dialogues relating to Swedenborg's doctrines, which are the following curiosities:

"First,—That the distinction of personalities, offices, powers, and operations in God, are, by no means, admissible; because God is immutable. See pages 52, etc., 163.

"That the man Jesus is the Holy Father, consisting of three essences, or principles,—the Divine, the Proceeding, and the Human; that as the Divine Essence, or Principle, he is the Holy Father, even the Jehovah of the Jews, the Creator of all things; that as the Proceeding Essence, or Principle, (which it seems must be distinguished from the Divine,) he is the Sanctifier; that as the Human Essence, or Principle, he is the Son of God, who suffered and died. See pages 52, 53, 54, 71, 72.

"Secondly,—That the merit, virtue, and efficacy of Christ's sufferings consist (not, as is the vulgar faith, in himself, but) in changing the state of man, by removing from him the power of hell and darkness; and placing him in a state of rising out of evil, through a renewal of the parts, powers, and principles of his life, both in soul and body; restoring him both to health and uprightness: which, says our author, was all that was necessary to the eternal well-being of the creatures.

"The baron, therefore, rejoins that Christ satisfied himself, and made an atonement to himself, etc., and that all this must be so, because God is immutable. See pages 55–67.

"Again he teaches, that Christ is no otherwise a mediator, an advocate, an intercessor, and no otherwise a sinner at the right hand of God, than he is a door, a vine, a lion, or a lamb: that he is all these alike and figuratively, or in a sense denoting his divine qualities and properties; of which the literal names door, mediator, lion, etc., are expressive signs. See page 67–75.

"Now, can any man of erudition, and in his right senses, adopt such needless stuff as is the above, for Divine revelation; or judge of it as other than the profusions of a distempered brain? Can this be that stable word of sound or rational doctrine [Tit. i. 9.] whereby we shall be able to convince gainsayers? And neither is it sustained by one single argument, or proof alleged, but is to be received, however absurd, unintellectual, and where intelligible, inconsistent, because of the ipso dicto of a fantastic mineralist, who has betrayed through all his works a notorious ignorance of both the diction and documents of theology.

REGLEMENT donné par une Dame de haute qualité. [Jeanne de Schomberg, Duchesse de la Roche-Guyon] a Madame sa petite fille [la Princesse de Marcillac, etc.] pour sa conduite, etc.

"Thirdly,—Our author being embarrassed by the Scripture form of sound words, which would in no wise tally with his wild freaks, proceeds to persuade, with these presumptions, his ductile disciples,—noviciates in Scripture language, and its modes of expression and revelation,—that Divine terms are to be interpreted figuratively, allegorically, symbolically, and mystically, wherever an internal sense and acceptation can be devised. And therefore, to diffuse some shine of plausibility on these pretences, he undertakes, cavalierly, to exemplify his postulate on the doctrine of the resurrection; assuring us, that when we read of the appearance of the Son of Man at the last day, and of his coming in the clouds of heaven, we are to understand even these promises also, far otherwise than they are vulgarly conceived as predictions of real, though future events; that we are to understand them figuratively, mystically, and symbolically; that therefore, the clouds in which Christ (or the Father, or the Holy Spirit,) will come, are in no wise those natural, visible clouds which present themselves to our sight in the skies (See page 197, 198); for that clouds denote veils, that cover or obscure; and that the clouds mentioned in these parts of Scripture, are clouds overshadowing the spiritual or internal sense of the coming of Christ, namely, of his internal appearance to his saints.

"Then, with a kind of preceptorial surprise at our simplicity, the baron advances to instruct us, that the book of God's word is a sealed book, (p. 199,) wherein the mysteries of truth and Divine wisdom are hidden under an external letter (p. 199, 200): that Christians ought to behold, as in a glass, the glory of God; and that this prospect of him is truly the sign of the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory! (p. 200, 201.)

"And it being a question naturally demanded of these new luminaries, when and where this coming of Christ is to be expected, since it will not be, as hitherto believed, an advent literally spread in the clouds of heaven; the answer is, that, wherever a fresh opening is made of the divine truths, and a new church established on earth, there is this advent of Christ manifestly displayed, and there is the place of Christ's coming.

"Now, to obduce a specious aspect upon this conceit, he describes in a similar mode, the descent of the New Jerusalem from God, out of heaven; assuring us boldly, in the following words, 'that thereby is meant a new dispensation of heavenly righteousness, or a republication of the word of God, opened anew, in order to a formation of a new church among men, which this (New Jerusalem) must needs signify, and be the same thing with the Lord's second coming; as denoting not the destruction of the earth, but its renovation, by purging it from sin, and purifying the hearts and lives of mankind, through the operation of genuine truth, opened anew from his own holy word.' (p. 204—6.)

"Reveries weak as these, Socinus, however befriended by the baron, would have been ashamed of: he would have repudiated such an abettor as burlesquing him,—nor have I leisure to canvass these fooleries as they deserve.

"Although the above are the capital doctrines of this book you sent me, yet, interspersed with them, we find many false distinctions, socinian tenets, deistical reasonings, and mystical whims. These, however, generally so feebly enforced as to be readily discernable, for they betray not only an utter ignorance of Christianity, but obviously a disordered intellect.

"And, indeed, neither could the latter have generated the wild absurdities which this baron has effused, had he acquired a moderate competency of theological knowledge. A philosopher, a novice in the revealed word, when turned enthusiast, is, of all men, the most liable to heresies; but the enormities of this baron's deliriums argue both the most abject illiterature, with the most egregious blindness and infatuation. * * *

The second letter proceeds thus:—"My dear friend,—I must impute your attachment to the baron to an indifference and want of ardour. You write me that he was certainly a good man. Was he a better man than Socinus, or Crellius, or Julian, the avowed enemy of Christ? Julian, the chaste, the temperate, the learned, the pious, the vigilant, the clement, for so is he characterised by historians.

"And whence are we to judge of the term goodness? From the Scriptures, or from Aristotle's Ethics? Says not St. Paul of the Pharisees, I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, though not according to knowledge? and yet are they not broken off because of unbelief? because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved, but departed with an evil heart of unbelief from the living God?

"And does not the apostle premonish the Jews thus, Heb. x. 28., He who despised Moses' law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses: of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, who has trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant wherewith we are sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite to the Spirit of grace? Who is the better man of the two that went up into the temple to pray; the pharisee, who rested his hope of favour from God on his own work of obedience and piety; or the contrite publican, who could only smite on his breast and say, God be merciful to me a sinner?"

"St. John writes, i. John, ii. 22, 23, Who is a liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son: whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father: iv. 3, every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God; and this is that spirit of antichrist whereof you have heard that it should come, and even now already is in the world : wresting the word to his destruction. ii. Peter, iii. 16.

"The Christ who is Jesus, and who came into the flesh from God, is the only begotten Son of the Father; him, therefore, to deny, is to deny the Son; and if not, to confess that he, this only begotten Son of the Father, is come into the flesh, is to be antichrist; what else can we conclude of your good baron, than that he is not light in the Lord, but an antichrist, who denieth the truth, and maketh God a liar; or that he has no truth in him.

"And if they escaped not who refused him who spake on earth, and much less shall not they escape who turn away from him who spake from heaven; what must be the sentence passed upon your good baron? for the word adds, How shall we escape, who neglect so great salvation?

"Also, that your good baron does deny that any only begotten Son of the holy Father is come into the flesh, is not doubted: and this more expressly and more dogmatically than either Arius or even Socinus, or Crellius; and this again without their plea of reasoning, or plausibility of argument: as confidently arrogating the character of a prophet, as did ever Simon Magus or Mahomet.

"To deny a begotten Son of the holy Father, made flesh, is at once to deny all revelation, our Scriptures being the only revelation from God; and so denying, to revoke mankind into Paganism: to prevent which, the Baptist assures us, (John iii. 16, 17, 35, 36) He who believeth not in the name of the only begotten Son of God, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him: and accordingly our Lord speaks in his prayer to his Holy Father. (John xvii. 3) And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent: and attests the same to the Jews, (John viii. 24) if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins, i. e. shall sink down into the æonian darkness, ignorance, and stupidity, knowing nothing further of yourselves or of my Father, than that yourselves are miserable, and that God is, you know not who or what.

"Christianity enforces that the belief of an only begotten Son of the holy Father, is essential to its profession, and without which its whole system of doctrines is a chimera: There are (saith St. John, John v. 7,) three that bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Logos, and the Holy Spirit; and these three are One: and there are three that bear witness on earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood [For the authenticity of this passage, see Bengelius.] and these three agree in one (i. John ii. 13), or concord in this one testimony, that the Holy Father has begotten a Son, who, having been the creator of all things, is the restorer of all things. For,

"Firstly, The Spirit, sent of the holy Father and given to the saints on earth, is a testimony of the Father's acceptance of us, establishing the Gospel report concerning his goodwill towards us in his beloved Son.

"Secondly.—The water, which answers to the second witness, who is the Logos, signifying our baptism in him, testifies his acceptance of us, for his own property, even for members of his new creation, and his new kingdom in the heavens.

"This appears, because in the Logos resides as in its source, the element of this new life; and our baptism testifies our immersion into this element in Christ, arguing our fellowship with him therein: and that being buried with Christ into his death, we are with him risen into his new element of life; are with Christ dead to our old or former nature, and stand in Christ renewed in the element of the new creation, and alive from the dead.

"Thirdly.—The blood-witness answers to the holy Spirit, and carries his testimony of acceptance of us, and our life in him, not less luculently.

"This again appears, because blood is represented as containing life; it is said that in the blood is the life, or the life resides in the blood; the blood, therefore, connotes, as the emblem of life, an immortality administered to us by the Spirit of Christ, the one principle of genuine life, derived to us from the blood of Christ, pregnant with his Spirit, who is life.

"The holy Spirit, (who is, with the Son of God, coeval with the Father,) and the Logos, although two personalities, are one JEVE; and the blood of the Logos being ours, his Spirit is also with it, our spirit, as says the Apostle, 1 Cor. vi. 17, he who is joined unto the Lord is one Spirit John xvii. 22, 23.

"So then the Spirit given, presumes our favour with the holy Father: the water in which we are immersed, presumes our renovation in the element of grace, and of the new creation which is in the Logos: and the blood whereby we are sanctified, presumes our immortality, licited in us, by the Spirit of Life. And thus the whole of Christianity becomes in these three witnesses, comonstrated.

"The man Jesus was the begotten of the holy Spirit of God, an event full of mysterious propriety: But it is the Word or Logos who is the begotten of the holy Father; who was from the beginning with God, who was made flesh, who had a glory with the Father before the world was, who created all things, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers; for without him was not anything made that was made: and it is singly by the Logos's sufferings in the flesh, that we are the redeemed of God. reconciled to God, and accepted of the holy Father. He, the Logos, suffered for our sins, that he might bring us unto God, who has laid upon him the iniquity of us all; and by whose stripes we are healed.

"Vain, therefore, are the reasonings of Crellius (whom, or whose followers, it seems the baron may have read,) that God of God cannot be made subject to humiliation or sufferings. * * *

Thus much upon Swedenborg, as a theologian.—The writer recently inquired of a well-informed gentleman, a professed Swedenborgian, what were the practical merits or characteristics of the baron's divinity. Whether its tendency as a scientific Christianity, was to make its disciples and students profoundly sensible of the radical universal corruption of their nature, (through the dearth which Adam died, the day of his transgression,) and at the same time acquainted with their capacity of restoration, (through the Divine Word of promise,) and thereupon to strenuously recommend to them (as the one only object deserving of their consideration,) the commands and counsels of the Redeemer, in order to obtain that renovation, (first in the heart or root of man, secondly in the intellect, and ultimately in body as well as soul.) Whether the baron teaches his followers, that the possibility of that renovation was procured for them by the triumphant process of Jesus Christ, the eternal Word made flesh, or Divine man, and second head of the human race, through all the states of the fallen human life, conquering all its evils and restoring to it all that it had lost, and that none could partake of redemption but through the Divine nature or Spirit brought to life in them, so as to enable them to follow Jesus Christ victoriously over every evil of life and death, and to overcome even as he overcame. Whether this regeneration and sanctification was the foundation doctrine of the baron's divinity: and that by consequence, he presses upon his disciples the earnest practice of the gospel, that is, all kinds of self-denial to the old rational animal nature, the living by strict religious rules, early rising to devotion, and continuing instant in prayer (many hours of each day de genibus), recollection or introversion of the mind, fasting, and other acts of mental and corporal mortification, with activity in all goodness to the souls and bodies of their neighbour; and all in faith, all in order to raise up or cultivate the Divine principle, or living Word of promise engrafted in their souls, to perfection:—Whether such was the groundwork and main drift of the baron's divinity, apart from his visions; for, that he, the inquirer, considered all professed scientific theology, whatever it may declare touching the mysteries of eternity, to be mere transcendental humbug, unless its manifest prime object was to render man awake to his sin and misery, and to the salvation offered to him in Christ, and thereupon to induce him earnestly to adopt all those self-annihilating practices or exercises of the gospel just referred to, as the means of obtaining that salvation; which, being the restoration of man to the blessings of his original birthright, included in it all possible blessings, yea, even the highest intellectual illumination, and divine knowledge. To which, the individual candidly replied, that 'such was not the main object of the New Jerusalem doctrine; but the baron had, he considered, given a key whereby to understand the Revelations and other mysterious parts of Scripture, which he considered a proof of his having been inspired.'

How lucidly the baron has explained some of the leading mysteries and doctrines of the gospel, has been sufficiently adverted to in the above two letters. But in regard to his mystical interpretation of the Scriptures, can it, for edification and unction, be at all comparable to that of Madame Guyon, woman as she was, or of other deeply spiritual writers who, according to their individual form of apprehension, have opened a solid and uniform mystical sense of Scripture? For after the baron's declarations, that the last judgment (spoken of in the Revelations,) happened in the year 1757: that he had conversed with the inhabitants of the planets, that they of the moon are small, being no larger than children of six or seven years old, yet have the strength of men, and roaring voices like thunder, which proceed from their abdomen: (!) that the angels sleep, and have entrails, and the bestial configurations of the fallen divided humanity, etc. (!) with an infinity of other corresponding productions of his analogical and comparative faculty; after this, no one will contend that the baron offers a purely natural ground of interpretation. The following is the baron's own verbatim account of the pentecostal opening of his Divine commission:—"I dined very late at my inn, in London, and was eating very heartily, when, towards the end of my repast, I perceived a kind of mist diffuse itself before my eyes, and that the floor of the apartment was covered with hideous reptiles. They disappeared: the darkness was dissipated, and I saw, clearly, in the midst of a bright light, a man seated in the corner of the room, who said to me, with a terrible voice, Eat not so much. At these words my sight failed me; it afterwards gradually returned, and I found myself alone. On the following night, the same man, surrounded by a radiance of light, again appeared to me, and said, I am God the Lord, the Creator and Redeemer; I have chosen thee to unfold to mankind the interior and spiritual sense of the sacred writings; I will dictate to thee what thou art to write."—Law's identification of Swedenborg's and Mahomet's 'revelations,' has more of meaning in it, than appears at first sight.—Would the reader see what has been said in Swedenborg's favour as an inspired seer and theologian, by one of his talented, and most enthusiastic admirers, he may consult the apologetic dissertation prefixed to a publication, entitled "The Beauties of Emanuel Swedenborg, comprising his opinions and visions, collected from upwards of forty large volumes of his works, closely printed in Latin; with a Preliminary Dissertation upon his Life and Writings, and their relation to the present times. 8vo. SURIN, Joan Joseph.—excellētissimus, solid, pract. illuminatus, doctus, humilis, afficiens.

ANNOTATION.—Le Catechisme Spirituelle de la Perfection Chretienne est le meilleur ouvrage du P. SURIN, le plus moëlleux, le plus instructif, le plus méthodique, et le plus utile, par rapport à la fin qu'il se propose. Il commence par donner une idée grande et nette de la perfection chrétienne; il entre ensuite dans le détail des moyens qui y conduisent, et des obstacles qu'il faut vaincre pour y arriver. Rien de plus précis, de plus clair, et de plus sensible, que ce qu'il dit de l'Oraison et de la Mortification en général, de la pratique des vertus, du combat contre les vices, et contre les passions en particulier.

Comme il veut épuiser sa matière, après avoir parlé de la conduite ordinaire de la grace, il décrit les voies extraordinaires, où Dieu fait entrer les âmes qu'il veut s'unir particulièrement. Mais il ne s'exprime point en termes mystiques et obscurs. Tout ce qu'il dit de l'état passif, de la contemplation, de l'union divine et des grandes faveurs qui l'accompagnent, est à la portée de tout le monde. Il touche presque tous les points de la Théologie Mystique les plus difficiles à accorder avec la Théologie Scolastique; mais il le fait de telle sorte que personne ne peut s'y méprendre, et qu'on distingue toujours aisément le sens réprouvé des faux Mystiques d'avec le sens catholique qui donne tout à la vertu de la grace, sans rien ôter à la coopération du libre arbitre.

Il parle en plusieurs endroits de l'union divine, et des délices dont elle est la source, afin d'inspirer aux âmes un désir ardent de la plus haute perfection. Mais en même tems qu'il travaille à enfler le cœur de ceux qu'il instruit, et à nourrir leur esprit au grand, par les idées magnifiques qu'il leur donne de la perfection; il prend un soin particulier de retenir leur courage dans de justes bornes, en leur mettant devant les yeux leur propre foiblesse, et en leur découvrant les illusions où il est aisé de tomber, quand on prend l'essor avant le tems, et qu'on s'écarte des routes battues pour donner dans une fausse élévation. C'est à quoi il attribue tous les désordres des Illuminés et des autres faux Mystiques. Conformément à ce principe, il ne fait point de grâce à cette espèce d'orgueil qui engendre l'amour des voies extraordinaires, et il saisit toutes les occasions qui se présentent de recommander la fidélité à s'acquitter des devoirs d'état, à se borner aux pratiques reçues, à préférer les vertus obscures à celles qui sont éclatantes, et à suivre tellement l'attrait de la grace, qu'on le soumette toujours à la loi extérieure de la foi et de l'obéissance. De sorte que si on voulait faire le précis de tout l'ouvrage, et réduire à certains chefs la doctrine de l'Auteur en tout ce qui regarde la pratique et la correspondance de l'homme aux desseins de Dieu; on n'en tirerait guère que l'attachement inviolable pour les devoirs et les obligations communes, le soin de se recueillir, de se vaincre, de s'humilier, de se renoncer en tout, de ne rien refuser à Dieu, et de se défier de ses lumières, pour dépendre de celles d'autrui.

Au reste, en portant les âmes à la perfection la plus sublime, il prend soin de faire entendre qu'il s'agit de la perfection Chrétienne, qui ne regarde pas seulement les personnes religieuses, mais encore les gens du siècle. Et afin que ceux-ci ne puissent pas s'y méprendre, il entre dans le détail de leurs obligations, et parcourant les conditions différentes, il fait trouver à chacun dans son état, les moyens nécessaires pour arriver à la perfection du Christianisme, et au plus pur amour de Dieu.

Quelques-uns seront peut-être surpris de voir revenir souvent les mêmes sujets, et trouveront mauvais que l'Auteur ne les ait pas traités à fond dès la première fois qu'il en a parlé. Mais ils

Speaking of Dr. HENRY MORE in one of his passing conversational letters, Law thus remarks: "Many good things may be said of Dr. More, as a pious christian, and of great abilities. But he was a Babylonian philosopher and divine, a bigot to the Cartesian system, knew nothing deeper than an hypothesis, nor truer of the nature of the soul than that which he has said of its pre-existence, which is little better than that foolish brat descended from it, the transmigration of souls. I know no other name for his 'Divine Dialogues,' than a jumble of learned rant, heathenish babble, and gibberish, dashed or heated here and there with flashes of piety. His after sentiments of J. B. are in his 'Philosophiæ Teutonicæ Censura,' both in the preface and the tract. I never read it in his works, but only as recited in a German Editor of J. B. [see Penny Cyclopædia, art. ВОННЕ.] What you have seen of his severity against the light within, (which is, in other words, God within,) is sufficient to determine his character with you."

doivent faire réflexion, que les matières spirituelles sont quelquefois si délicates et si subtiles, qu'elles échappent à la pénétration d'un bon esprit, lors qu'il croit les bien comprendre. L'habileté du Maître consiste à proportionner ses instructions à la portée de ceux qu'il instruit, et à présenter les mêmes objets sous diverses faces, pour en faciliter l'intelligence aux esprits de différent caractère.

C'est la méthode qu'a suivi le Père Surin, en parlant de l'oraison, de la contemplation, de l'union divine, de la conduite et des effets extraordinaires de la grace. Après en avoir donné une connoissance générale, il a passé à d'autres plus aisés, afin de donner du relâche à l'esprit de ses lecteurs, peu accoutumés, pour la plupart, à considérer les objets spirituels. Il est revenu ensuite à plusieurs reprises, aux matières qu'il avait entamées; et allant de clarté en clarté, il en a donné des idées toujours plus nettes, plus précises, plus profondes, et plus étendues, qui auraient rebuté plusieurs de ses lecteurs, s'il les avait proposées tout de suite au commencement.

Il serait à souhaiter que tous ceux qui liront cet ouvrage, eussent le goût des vertus et des mystères de la grace, dont on y traite. Le Père Surin confirme ordinairement ce qu'il en dit par des exemples tirés des vies des plus grands saints. Ces exemples pourraient bien révolter la délicatesse de plusieurs des gens du siècle. C'est à eux à faire justice: ces sortes de livres ne sont pas faits pour les esprits profanes, qui ne veulent point cesser de l'être. Mais on ose assurer, que tous ceux qui feront la lecture de ce catéchisme avec un désir sincère d'en profiter, et de réformer leur prudence sur l'esprit de l'Evangile et sur le sentiment des saints, en tireront l'avantage que l'Auteur a prétendu leur en procurer, qui est de s'instruire à fond de leur religion, de se connoître eux-mêmes, de connoître Dieu, et de s'enflammer du désir de lui plaire, par la pratique des vertus des conseils évangéliques.

TAULERUS, Joannes.—illuminatissimus et internus.

ANNOTATION.—Cet Auteur, qui était un saint et savant Dominiquain, qui a enseigné à Cologne et à Strasbourg, où il mourut l'an 1379, passe pour un des plus autorisés et des plus considérables entre les Mystiques, tous ayant une extrême déférence pour ses sentimens: et de vrai, nuls gens de bien ne sauraient le connoître sans le goûter et sans lui donner leur approbation. Aussi voit-on que les Protestans les plus sages, les Docteurs Arndt, Müller, et plusieurs autres, sans même excepter Luther ni Melancton, en ont fait des éloges qui ne cèdent en rien à ceux des Catholiques Romains, comme il se peut voir à la tête de l'édition Allemande de ses Sermons que le pieux Arndt a procurée, et dans celle de toutes les œuvres de cet auteur par le célèbre D. Spener, réimprimées à Francfort plusieurs fois.

Le caractère de cet Auteur illuminé est à mon avis celui-ci: Que l'âme par la mortification de ses passions et de ses vices, par la pratique des vertus, par le détachement, et l'abnégation de soi-même, de ses desirs, de sa volonté, de son amour-propre, et de toute son activité, et de toute chose créée, revienne à son fond intérieur, y cherchant Dieu et l'y trouvant enfin qui s'y manifeste par la naissance de son Divin Verbe, et par la spiration de son S. Esprit; et qu'ensuite par une introversion durable et continuelle elle se conserve dans cet état d'intériorité, dans lequel Dieu pût produire en elle sa volonté, ses merveilles, et ses conduites spéciales, desquelles néanmoins cet auteur ne parle que généralement.

Taulère a écrit en vieux langage Alleman, qui ne se trouve que très-rarement. Surius en a fait une traduction Latine, imprimée plusieurs fois à Paris et à Cologne jusqu'en 1615, laquelle tient très-peu lieu d'original. On en a plusieurs éditions Allemandes procurées tant par les Catholiques Romains, que par les Protestans: Les Flamens en ont fait de même; mais la vieille édition Flamende de Francfort de 1565, est altérée; de même aussi que celle que M. Serrarius publia à Hoorn il y a environ 40 ans, quoique d'ailleurs celle-ci contienne plus d'ouvrages de l'auteur qu'aucune des autres. La meilleure est celle d'Anvers 1685: il y manque pourtant ses Institutions, ses Lettres et ses Exercices sur la Passion, mais on les trouve à part, les deux premiers sous le titre de Medulla animæ, dont on a une vieille édition Française, mais effacée par une nouvelle et très-belle traduction tant de ses Institutions, imprimées à Paris en 1668, que de ses Exercices sur la Passion, imprimés au même lieu l'année suivante, avec les Exercices du pieux Eschius sur la vie purgative, illuminative, et unitive, qui y sont joints. Le Père Mabillon dans le Catalogue qui est à la fin de son traité des Etudes Monastiques, met entre les livres spirituels traduits en Français les Œuvres de Taulère: je n'y ai jamais vu ses Sermons, qui en sont la plus considérable* pièce; et je suis assuré que son traité De la vie pauvre de J. Christ s'y trouve encore moins, vu même qu'il manque dans le Latin de Surius, et qu'il ne se trouve qu'en Alleman, en Anglais, et en Flamen.

RUSACROCIUS, contemporain de Taulère et en quelque sorte son Maître, est à peu près de même caractère que lui, et va même quelquefois plus haut et plus méthodiquement. C'était un saint Prieur d'un monastère de chanoines proche de Bruxelles qui n'avait presque point d'études, et qui était d'une grande simplicité, mais avec cela d'une grande sainteté, et d'une très haute contemplation, d'où lui venait par voie d'expérience et d'infusion une très profonde et originale connoissance de toute la Théologie Mystique, en quoi il a servi de guide à plusieurs. A la réserve de son excellente traité de l'Ornement des Noces Spirituelles, qu'on trouve encore quelquefois en vieux Flamen, et qui est des principaux de ses ouvrages, on n'a ses œuvres qu'en Latin de la traduction de Surius. Elles ont été imprimées à Cologne trois fois, dont la dernière est de l'an 1692. Ceux qui recherchent les interprétations allégoriques des choses typiques, trouveront de quoi se satisfaire dans son Commentaire sur le Tabernacle de l'alliance, ou sur le Lévitique.*

Le P. JEAN EVANGELISTE, Capucin à Louvain, est, ou approche beaucoup, du caractère de Taulère dans son excellent Livre du Royaume de Dieu dans l'âme, qui est écrit si familièrement, si nettement, et avec une méthode si naturelle et si suivie, qu'il peut bien servir aux esprits les moins pénétrants d'introduction à l'intelligence des choses mystiques. Son livre est Flamen, et imprimé plusieurs fois à Anvers dès l'an 1639, (lui vivant alors encore) jusqu'en 1639. On l'a aussi en Allemand dès l'an 1665 † mais les dernières éditions de Francfort des années 1690 et 1692 sont augmentées d'un second traité de la Séparation de l'Âme et l'Esprit, qu'un Professeur de Louvain (Libertus Fromondus) avait auparavant fait imprimer en Latin, et joint à son Explication sur le Cantique de Salomon. Ce traité semble plutôt une récapitulation et une déduction de quelques points principaux de son premier livre, nommément de l'Elevation de l'Âme par-dessus soi-même, qu'une suite du même livre, quoiqu'on en dise sur le titre. Il n'y a encore rien de tout cela en Français. Cet auteur a cela de remarquable, que dans tout son livre il n'y a pas un seul mot qui touche directement ou indirectement les matières controversées entre les Chrétiens, de sorte qu'il est à l'édification de tous : aussi dit-on que des Protestants ont contribué à sa réimpression, tant on en fait de cas, et avec raison. On a encore du même auteur un Tratté posthume de l'Eucharistie qui se trouve traduit du Flamen en Français, et imprimé à Bruxelles en 1662.

ANNOTATION.—Ce que Jean de la Croix a proposé d'un manière théoretique, accommodée à la voie de l'intellect, et même, en quelque sorte, de la scholastique ; cela même est répandu d'une manière pratique, par des narrés et des productions de propre expérience, et d'une manière tout affective propre à la voie du cœur, dans les écrits de Ste. TERESIA, dont le caractère est que, sans affecter aucune méthode, quoique pourtant elle ne manque pas d'ordre, elle parle et écrit par purs sentiments et purs mouvements de cœur, d'amour, d'humilité, et selon les vives expériences qu'elle a faites des choses spirituelles et surnaturelles. Elle insiste particulièrement sur la voie de l'Oraison, tant de l'active, que de celle de quiétude ou de passivité surnaturelle et unitive ; sur ses degrés, et sur les grâces infinies et ineffables que Dieu communique par là, aux âmes qui s'y rendent. Les manières humbles, touchantes, et animées de l'Esprit de Dieu, attendrissent les cœurs qui ont encore quelque pente vers Dieu, y reveillent l'amour divin, et gravent dans les âmes une profonde vénération envers la Majesté Divine et la sacrée humanité du Sauveur, avec une admiration singulière des grâces et des opérations inexprimables du Très-Haut dans les cœurs qui se donnent à lui sincèrement.

Alleman la même 1686, etc., la font suffisamment connoître. De plusieurs traductions, qu'il y en a en Français, la plus récente et la meilleure est celle de M. Arnauld d'Andilly, imprimée plusieurs fois à Paris, et nouvellement (en 1688) à Anvers en 3 petits volumes, où sont jointes les Lettres anciennes de cette Ste. qui manquaient aux éditions de Paris, mais qui sont un peu trop chargées de remarques par l'Evêque d'Osme : j'appelle ces lettres là anciennes par comparaison à deux tomes d'autres, qu'on vient de publier tout fraîchement (à Anvers 1698,) et qui n'avaient point encore paru. De ses ouvrages, son livre du Chateau de l'ame, est le plus sublime ; son traité du Chemin de la perfection, le plus familier et le plus d'usage ; sa Vie par elle-même et ses Exclamations, le plus touchant ; ses lettres et ses Fondations, le plus agréable.

Entre les Auteurs qui sont du caractère de Ste. Thérèse, ou qui en approchent beaucoup, Ste. GERTRUDE est la principale ; non celle de Brabant, mais celle d'Allemagne, Comtesse d'extraction, et qui fut il y a environ cinq cents ans Abbessé d'un Monastère de Religieuses de l'ordre de Ste. Benoît dans le Diocèse d'Halberstat. Elle a écrit elle-même en Latin. J'estime que par le titre qu'on a donné à sa vie et à ses révélations, Insinuationes divinæ pietatis (imprimées souvent à Cologne, comme aussi à Paris et à Salsbourg en 1662,) on a voulu marquer, qu'en effet elle insinuait dans les cœurs une piété toute divine et un amour très-affectif envers la Majesté de Dieu, comme il paraît particulièrement par le second livre de ses mêmes insinuations, où elle décrit sa conversion et une partie de sa vie, d'une manière, qui imite et qui semble même surpasser celle de St. Augustin dans ses Confessions. Ses Exercices de l'Amour divin qui sont des prières à son usage pour tous les jours de la semaine, sont aussi très-affectifs et très-touchans. On les a traduits de son Latin et publiés en Français à Paris 1672 ; et un an auparavant, aussi bien qu'en 1687, ses Insinuations, mais sous le titre de la Vie et les Revelations de Ste. Gertrude.* Le Traducteur quoique éloquent, n'est pas pourtant toujours bien entré dans le sens de cette âme sainte, qu'on tient avoir été des plus pures qui fussent alors sur la terre.

Cette sainte me fait penser à une autre sainte fille de même nom, qui a écrit des Confessions de l'ame amante, dans le même caractère, très-touchantes et très-capables d'amollir et d'embraser les cœurs dans l'amour de Dieu. C'est GERTRUDE MORE, des descendans du fameux chancelier du même surnom, jadis Religieuse à Cambrai, dont le livre a été imprimé en Anglais à Paris plusieurs fois.†

Sainte CATHERINE surnommée DE SIENNE, parce qu'elle y naquit environ le milieu du quatorzième siècle, est aussi entièrement dans le caractère de Ste. Thérèse. Ses Méditations sur la Passion, imprimées avec sa vie par son Confesseur, ses six Dialogues qu'elle a dictés (imprimés en Latin à Ingolstadt 1583,) et qui traitent principalement de la Doctrine Chrétienne, sur le Rétablissement de l'homme, de l'amour de Dieu, des larmes de la pénitence, de l'église et de la corruption de ses ministres, de la Providence de Dieu, et de l'obéissance ; ses prières, qui y sont annexées ; ses Lettres à toutes sortes de personnes, publiées en Français à Paris, 1644 : enfin, la déference, pour ne pas dire la soumission et l'obéissance que lui rendait toute la chrétienté sans exception de Papes ni de Rois, de Grands ni de petits, de savans et de non-savans, quoique ce ne fût qu'une simple et jeune fille dont la vie ne passa pas au-delà de trente ans, font bien voir que Dieu lui avait donné le don de toucher les cœurs et les affections par le feu affectif et sacré dont elle était elle-même toute embrasée.

On trouve dans les ouvrages de Louis de Blois, vulgairement nommé BLOSIUS, Benedictin Abbé de Liesi, qui vivait il y a plus d'un siècle, le même esprit et caractère d'attendrir les cœurs à la piété ; ce qui lui a fait donner le nom de pieux presque toutes les fois qu'on le nomme : On les a recueillis et publiés diverses fois en Latin à Anvers ; et l'on en a traduits divers traités en diverses langues.

Les Contemplations sur l'amour divin de RAIMOND JORDAIN (qui se nommait l'idiot) sont manifestement dans le même caractère, aussi bien que les traités auxquels on les joint ordinairement qui sont les Soliloques, les Méditations, et le Manuel qui portent le nom de Ste. Augustin, dont les Confessions, aussi bien que celles d'ARNOSE D'OROSCO, Prédicateur de Charles-quin, sont dans le même caractère d'amour humble et affectif.

* In the introduction to the abridged life of Gichtel, the editor remarks, "If it were ever necessary to attend to what may be said with respect to the imitation of highly regenerate and enlightened souls, it is certainly so with respect to the example of this singular individual, which rule is this :—Follow such spirits in the way to heaven, but do not walk precisely in their footsteps, and as their scrupulous imitator. Go with them to their aim and end, but go thine own pace, holding not theirs but the Lord's hand. Let their great example excite thee to place the rule of the divine life more vividly before thine eyes, but do not include in this rule all the exceptions which might take place in them, nay, which are permitted to take place, that the Divine glory might be the more abundantly displayed in them. In short, walk quite thine own way, imitating their devotedness and diligence, courage and fidelity, but not the peculiarities of their walk and spiritual process. * * There is but one who is our way, for He alone is our life. Having his example before our eyes, and resigning ourselves without any presumptuous self-choosing, entirely to his wise and gracious guidance, we shall not fail to be led by him in our own path, and which is most adapted for us, neither outrunning his will, nor remaining behind it; and thus shall his will be accomplished in us. * * But as little as we ought minutely to govern ourselves by such examples, so little ought we to judge of them, and measure them by ourselves. * *"

These very judicious observations may be applicable to the whole of the works recommended in this treatise for perusal, by such as desire to understand Christianity, in its universality of theory and experience—a science that few have explored, if they have had any notion of its vast extent and wondrous sublimities.

For the devout reader must not suppose that any of the numerous ways herein described of returning to God, are to be the precise rule and model of his spiritual process. This would, indeed, be a mistake, and yet one which an undirected study of mystic books, or of the lives and experiences of spiritual persons, might subject inexperienced readers to fall into, and thereby to cause themselves much disquietude.—The object of spiritual books (as implied in the above observations), is to open the understanding of the reader to the verity and necessity of God's action on the soul, in order to its renewal, and by consequence to induce him to wholly turn to GOD ALONE, in diligent research, in faith and prayer, rather than to lead and constrain him into a particular way to that same end. At least, such ought to be the aim of spiritual authors. And herein we see the peculiar characteristic of Law and Behmen's practical writings, which, being the interpretation of Scripture truth, through pure, sound, unidocratic, undistorted reason, have this advantage over all other instructive and hortatory evangelical books, if only taken by their right handle, and duly apprehended, (which, however, is, in general, very difficult, by reason of the preconceptions and imaginary divinity-knowledge already in the mind,) viz., that they lead their faithful student according to his particular signature, direct to Christ, to Christ, not under a notion, but as 'the Spirit' of holiness, life, and redemption; not drawing him out of his true and proper way, to make him go, as it were, unnaturally their way, as is the case in some degree or other, with almost all other devotional writers; but cultivating the divine nature in the soul, the life of grace, according to the individual subject's natural character, whereby the diversity of the harmony of the creation is preserved, and accomplished according to the Divine wisdom and will.

We cannot, perhaps, take a better opportunity than the present, of introducing some further admonitions, concerning the vanity and self-deception, to which the mere curious readers and students of spiritual books, are subject.—Previously observing, that though some of the disadvantages of isolation from outward church communion, were referred to in the note of p. 127, there was, however, a very common excuse urged in defence of that temptation, then overlooked; viz., 'that there is so much corruption in every communion, that pure-minded, spiritual persons cannot mix up with them.' Now, can this reasoning be anything but fallacious? for does not Christ's own description of the gospel net, embracing good and bad fish to the end of the world, when the separation is to be made, imply, that there will always be corruption, and the working of the mystery of iniquity, in the most spiritual Christian societies? and does not Christ's prayer for his true followers (besides numerous other passages of Scripture, 1 Cor. v. 10, etc.), suppose the same truth, viz.: 'I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil?' Surely it is only needful to direct the attention of the sincere and devoted of retired spiritual worshippers, to the truths contained in the above passages, and to assure them of the inconceivably great and surpassing benefits, in respect to growth in grace and high spiritual enjoyments, derivable from the action of diversified Christian experience, and of doing good in company with brethren animated by the same spirit of earnest devotion and holy endeavours to promote the glory of God, according to the divers operations of the spirit of Christ in them, to induce them at once to unite themselves heartily with an outward section of professing Christians. This as a brotherly, true-grounded, experienced counsel.—The points referred to, in respect to spiritual books, are contained in the following quotation, which is another beautiful illustration of the practical wisdom and sublime talent of the subject of our proposed biography :—

"Indeed, Academicus, your education has so accustomed you to the pleasure of reading a variety of books, that you hardly propose any other end in reading, than the entertainment of your mind: thus, the 'Spirit of Prayer' has only awakened in you a desire to see another book upon the same subject. This fault is very common to others, as well as scholars, and even to those who only delight in reading good books.

Philo has, for this twenty years, been collecting and reading all the spiritual books he can hear of. He reads them as the critics read commentators and lexicons; to be nice and exact in telling you the style, spirit, and intent of this or that spiritual writer; how one is more accurate in this, and the other in that. Philo will ride you forty miles in winter to have a conversation about spiritual books, or to see a collection larger than his own. Philo is amazed at the deadness and insensibility of the Christian world,—that they are such strangers to the inward life and spiritual nature of the christian salvation; he wonders how they can be so zealous for the outward letter and form of ordinances, and so averse to that spiritual life that they all point at, as the one thing needful. But Philo never thinks how wonderful it is, that a man who knows regeneration to be the whole, should yet content himself with the love of books upon the new birth, instead of being born again himself. For all that is changed in Philo, is his taste for books. He is no more dead to the world, no more delivered from himself, is as fearful of adversity, as fond of prosperity, as easily provoked and pleased with trifles, as much governed by his own will, tempers, and passions, as unwilling to deny his appetites, or enter into war with himself, as he was twenty years ago. Yet all is well with Philo; he has no suspicion of himself; he dates the newness of his life, and the fullness of his light, from the time that he discovered the pearl of eternity in spiritual authors.

All this, Academicus, is said on your account, that you may not lose the benefit of this spark of the divine life that is kindled in your soul, but may conform yourself suitably to so great a gift of God.

It demands, at present, an eagerness of another kind, than that of much reading, even upon the most spiritual matters.

Acad.—I thank you, Theophilus, for your good will towards me; but did not imagine my eagerness after such books to be so great and dangerous a mistake. And if I do not yet entirely give in to what you say, it is because a friend of yours has told us (and, as I thought, by way of direction,) that he has been a diligent reader of all the spiritual authors [See the Concluding Observations of this Section] from the apostolical Dionysius down to the illuminated Guyon, and celebrated Fenelon of Cambray: and, therefore it would never have come into my head to suspect it to be a fault, or dangerous to follow his example.

Theoph.—I have said nothing, my friend, with a design of hindering your acquaintance with all the truly spiritual writers. I would rather, in a right way, help you to a true intimacy with them: for they are friends of God, entrusted with his secrets, and partakers of the divine nature: and he that converses rightly with them, has an happiness that can hardly be overvalued.

My intention is only to abate, for a time, a spirit of eagerness after much reading, which, in your state has more of nature than grace in it: which seeks delight in a variety of new notions, and rather gratifies curiosity, than reforms the heart.

Suppose you had seen an angel from heaven, who had discovered to you a glimpse of its own internal brightness, and of that glorious union in which it lived with God, opening more of itself to the inward sight of your mind, than you could either forget or relate. Suppose it had told you, with a piercing word, and living impression, that all its own angelic and heavenly brightness was hid in yourself, concealed from you under a bestial covering of flesh and blood; that this flesh and blood was become the master of it, would not suffer it to breathe, or stir, or come to life in you. Suppose it had told you, that all your life had been spent in helping this flesh and blood to more and more power over you, to hinder you from knowing and feeling this divine life within you. Suppose it had told you, that, to this day, you had lived in the grossest self-idolatry, loving, serving, honouring, and adoring yourself, instead of loving, serving, and adoring God with all your heart, and soul, and spirit: that all your intentions, projects, cares, pleasures, and indulgences, had been only so much labour to bring you to the grave, in a total ignorance of that great work for which alone you was born into the world.

Suppose it had told you, that all this blindness and insensibility of your state, was obstinately and wilfully brought upon yourself, because you had boldly slighted and resisted all the daily inward and outward calls of God to your soul, all the teachings, doings, and sufferings of a Son of God to redeem you. Suppose it left you with this farewell, O man, awake; thy work is great, thy time is short, I am thy last trumpet; the grave calls for thy flesh and blood, thy soul must enter into a new lodging. To be born again, is to be an angel: not to be born again, is to become a devil.

Tell me now, Academicus, what would you expect from a man who had been thus awakened, and pierced by the voice of an angel? Could you think he had any sense left, if he was not cast into the deepest depth of humility, self-dejection, and self-abhorrence? Casting himself, with a broken heart, at the feet of the divine mercy, desiring nothing but that, from that time, every moment of his life might be given unto God, in the most perfect denial of every temper, will, and inclination, that nourished the corruption of his nature: wishing and praying, from the bottom of his heart, that God would lead him into and through everything inwardly and outwardly, that might destroy the evil workings of his nature, and awaken all that was holy and heavenly within him; that the seed of eternity, the spark of life, that he had so long quenched and smothered under earthly rubbish, might breathe, and come to life, in him.

Or would you think he was enough affected with this angelic visit, if all that it had awakened in him, was only a longing and eager desire to hear the same, or another angel talk again?

Acad.—O Theophilus, you have said enough: for all that is within me consents to the truth and justness of what you have said. I now feel, in the strongest manner, that I have been rather amused, than edified, by what I have read.

Theoph.—A spiritual book, Academicus, is a call to as real and total a death to the life of corrupt nature, as that which Adam died in paradise, was to the life of heaven. He, indeed, died at once totally to the divine life in which he was created : but as our body of earth is to last to the end of our lives ; so to the end of our earthly life, every step we take, every inch of our road, is to be made up of denial, and dying to ourselves ; because all our redemption consists in our regaining that first life of heaven in the soul, to which Adam died in paradise. And therefore the one single work of redemption, is the one single work of regeneration, or the raising up of a life, and spirit, and tempers, and inclinations, contrary to that life and spirit which we derive from our earthly fallen parents. To think, therefore, of anything but the continual, total denial of our earthly nature, is to overlook the very thing on which all depends. And to hope for any thing, to trust or pray for any thing but the life of God, or a birth of heaven, in our souls, is as useless to us, as placing our hope and trust in a graven image. Thus saith the Christ of God, the one pattern, and author of our salvation : " If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, hate his own life, take up his daily cross, and follow me." And again : " Unless a man be born again from above, of water, and the Spirit, he cannot see, or enter into, the kingdom of God."

Now is your time, Academicus, to enter deeply into this great truth. You are just come out of the slumber of life, and begin to see with new eyes, the nature of your salvation. You are charmed with the discovery of a kingdom of heaven hidden within you, and long to be entertained more and more with the nature, progress, and perfection of the new birth, or the opening of the kingdom of God in your soul.

But, my friend, stop a little. It is indeed great joy that the " pearl of great price" is found ; but take notice, that it is not yours, you can have no possession of it, till, as the merchant did, "you sell all that you have," and buy it. Now, self is all that you have, it is your sole possession, you have no goods of your own, nothing is yours but this self. The riches of self are your own riches ; but all this self is to be parted with, before the pearl is yours. Think of a lower price, or be unwilling to give thus much for it ; plead in your excuse that you keep the commandments, and then you are that very rich young man in the gospel, who went away sorrowful from our Lord, when he had said, " if thou wilt be perfect," that is, if thou wilt obtain the pearl, " sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor ;" that is, die to all thy possession of self, and then thou hast given all that thou hast to the poor, all that thou hast is devoted and used for the love of God and thy neighbour. This selling all, Academicus, is the measure of your dying to self ; all of it is to be given up ; it is an apostate nature, a stolen life, brought forth in rebellion against God ; it is a continual departure from him. It corrupts every thing it touches ; it defiles every thing it receives ; it turns all the gifts and blessings of God into covetousness, partiality, pride, hatred, and envy. All these tempers are born, and bred, and nourished in self ; they have no other place to live in, no possibility of existence, but in that creature which is fallen from a life in God, into a life in self.

Acad.—Pray, sir, tell me more plainly, what this self is, since so much depends upon it.

Theoph.—It is hell, it is the devil, it is darkness, pain, and disquiet. It is the one only enemy of Christ, the great antichrist. It is the scarlet whore, the fiery dragon, the old serpent, the devouring beast, that is mentioned in the revelation of St. John.

Acad.—You rather terrify than instruct me, by this description.

Theoph.—It is, indeed, a very frightful matter ; it contains everything that man has to dread and hate, to resist and avoid. Yet be assured, my friend, that careless and merry as the world is, every man that is born into it, has all these enemies to overcome within himself. And every man, till he is in the way of regeneration, is more or less governed by them. No hell in any remote place, no devil that is separate from you, no darkness or pain that is not within you, no antichrist either at Rome or England, no furious beast, no fiery dragon, without, or apart from you, can do you any hurt. It is your own hell, your own devil, your own beast, your own antichrist, your own dragon, that lives in your own heart's blood, that alone can hurt you.

Die to this self, to this inward nature, and then all outward enemies are overcome. Live to this self, and then, when this life is out, all that is within you, and all that is without you, will be nothing else but a mere seeing and feeling this hell, serpent, beast, and fiery dragon.

See here, Academicus, the twofold nature of every man. He has within him a redeeming power, the meekness of the heavenly life, called the Lamb of God. This seed is surrounded, or encompassed, with the beast of fleshly lusts, the serpent of guile and subtlety, and the dragon of fiery wrath. This is the great trial, or strife of human life, whether a man will live to the lusts of the beast, the guile of the serpent, the pride and wrath of the fiery dragon, or give himself up to the meekness, the patience, the sweetness, the simplicity, the humility, of the Lamb of God.

This is the whole of the matter between God and the creature. On one side, fire and wrath, awakened first by the rebellious angels ; and on the other side, the meekness of the Lamb of God, the patience of divine love coming down from heaven, to stop and overcome the fire and wrath that is broken out in nature and creature. Your father Adam has introduced you into the fire and wrath of the fallen angels, into a world from whence paradise is departed. Your flesh and blood is kindled in that sin, which first brought forth a murdering Cain. But, dear soul, be of good comfort ; for the meekness, the love, the heart, the Lamb of God is become man, has set himself in the birth of thy own life, that in him, and with him, and by a birth from him, heaven and paradise may be again opened both within thee and without thee, not for a time, but to all eternity.

Once more, Academicus. Every man in this world stands essentially in heaven, and in hell, both as to that which is within him, and that which is without him : for man and the world are both in the same fallen state. The curse in the earth is that same thing in outward nature, that the loss of the divine life was to the soul of Adam. The whole world in all its nature is nothing else but a real mixture of heaven and hell. The sun and the water of this world, is that which keeps under, and overcomes the darkness, wrath, and fire of hell, and carries on the vegetable and animal life that is in it. The light of the sun blesses all the workings of the elements, and the cool, softening essence of the water, keeps under the fire and wrath of nature. In all animal creatures, the birth of light in their own life, and the water of their own blood, both produced by the light of the sun, and the water of outward nature, brings forth an order of earthly creatures, that can enjoy the good that is in this world, in spite of the wrath of hell, and the malice of devils.

But man has more than all this; for being at first created an angel, and intended by the mercy of God to be an angel again, has the light of heaven, and the water of eternal life, both given to Adam in that seed of the woman, which was to bruise the head of the serpent; that is, to overcome the curse, the fire, and wrath, or hell, that was awakened in the fallen soul. So that man has not only, in common with the other animals, the light and water of outward nature, to quench the wrath of his own life in this mixed world, but he has the meekness, the light, the love, the humility of the holy Jesus, as a seed of life born in his soul, to bring forth that first image of God, in which Adam was created.

This, my friend, is the true ground of all true religion: it means nothing, it intends nothing, but to overcome that earthly life, which overcame Adam in the fall, that made him a prisoner of hell, and a slave to the corrupt workings of earthly flesh and blood. And therefore you may see, and know with a mathematical certainty, that the one thing necessary for every fallen soul, is to die to all the life that we have from this world, that the life of heaven may be born again in him. The life of this world is the life of the beast, the scarlet whore, the old serpent, and the fiery dragon.

Hence it is that sin rides in triumph over church and state, and from the court to the cottage all is overrun with sensuality, guile, falseness, pride, wrath, envy, selfishness, and every form of corruption. Every one swims away in this torrent, but he who hears and attends to the voice of the Son of God within him, calling him to die to this life, to take up his cross, and follow him. Much learned pains has been often taken to prove Rome, or Constantinople, to be the seat of the beast, the antichrist, the scarlet whore, etc. But, alas! they are not at such a distance from us, they are the properties of fallen human nature, and are all of them alive in our own selves, till we are dead or dying to all the spirit and tempers of this world. They are everywhere, in every soul, where the heavenly nature, and spirit of the holy Jesus is not. But when the human soul turns from itself, and turns to God, dies to itself, and lives to God in the spirit, tempers, and inclinations of the holy Jesus; loving, pitying, suffering, and praying for all its enemies, and overcoming all evil with good, as this Christ of God did; then, but not till then, are these monsters separate from it. For covetousness and sensuality of all kinds, are the very devouring beast; religion, governed by a worldly trading spirit, and gratifying the partial interests of flesh and blood, is nothing else but the scarlet whore; guile, and craft, and cunning, are the very essence of the old serpent; self-interest and self-exaltation are the whole nature of antichrist. Pride, persecution, wrath, hatred, and envy, are the very essence of the fiery dragon.

This, Academicus, is the fallen human nature, and this is the old man, which is alive in every one, though in various manners, till he is born again from above. To think, therefore, of anything in religion, or to pretend to real holiness, without totally dying to this old man, is building castles in the air; and can bring forth nothing, but Satan, in the form of an angel of light. Would you know, Academicus, whence it is, that so many false spirits have appeared in the world, who have deceived themselves and others with false fire, and false light, laying claim to inspirations, illuminations, and openings of the divine life, pretending to do wonders under extraordinary calls from God? It is this; they have turned to God, without turning from themselves; would be alive in God, before they were dead to their own nature; a thing as impossible in itself, as for a grain of wheat to be alive before it dies.

Now, religion in the hands of self, or corrupt nature, serves only to discover vices of a worse kind, than in nature left to itself. Hence are all the disorderly passions of religious men, which burn in a worse flame, than passions only employed about worldly matters: pride, self-exaltation, hatred, and persecution, under a cloak of religious zeal, will sanctify actions which nature, left to itself, would be ashamed to own.

You may now see, Academicus, with what great reason I have called you, at your first setting out, to this great point, the total dying to self, as the only foundation of a solid piety. All the fine things you hear or read of an inward and spiritual life in God, all your expectations of the light and Holy Spirit of God, will become a false food to your soul, till you only seek for them through death to self.

Observe, sir, the difference which clothes make in those who have it in their power to dress as they please: some are all for show, colours, and glitter; others are quite fantastical and affected in their dress: some have a grave and solemn habit; others are quite simple and plain in the whole manner. Now all this difference of dress is only an outward difference, that covers the same poor carcase, and leaves it full of all its own infirmities. Now, all the truths of the gospel, when only embraced and possessed by the old man, make only such superficial difference, as is made by clothes. Some put on a solemn, formal, prudent, outside carriage; others appear in all the glitter and show of religious colouring, and spiritual attainments; but under all this outside difference, there lies the poor fallen soul, imprisoned, unhelped, in its own fallen state. And thus it must be, it is not possible to be otherwise, till the spiritual life begins at the true root, grows out of death, and is born in a broken heart, an heart broken off from all its own natural life. Then self-hatred, self-contempt, and self-denial, is as suitable to this new-born spirit, as self-love, self-esteem, and self-seeking is to the unregenerate man. Let me, therefore, my friend, conjure you, not to look forward, or cast about for spiritual advancement, till you have rightly taken this first step in the spiritual life. All your future progress depends upon it: for this depth of religion goes no deeper than the depth of your malady: for sin has its root in the bottom of your soul, it comes to life with your flesh and blood, and breathes in the breath of your natural life; and therefore, till you die to nature, you live to sin; and whilst this root of sin is alive in you, all the virtues you put on, are only like fine painted fruit hung upon a bad tree.

Acad.—Indeed, Theophilus, you have made the difference between true and false religion as plain to me, as the difference between light and darkness. But all that you have said, at the same time, is as new to me, as if I had lived in a land where religion had never been named! But pray, sir, tell me how I am to take this first step, which you so much insist upon.

Theoph.—You are to turn wholly from yourself, and to give up yourself wholly unto God, in this or the like two-fold form of words or thoughts:

‘O my God, with all the strength of my soul, assisted by thy grace, I desire and resolve to resist and deny all my own will, earthly tempers, selfish views, and inclinations; everything that the spirit of this world, and the vanity of fallen nature, prompts me to. I give myself up wholly and solely unto thee, to be all thine, to have, and do, and be, inwardly and outwardly, according to thy good pleasure. I desire to live for no other ends, with no other designs, but to accomplish the work which thou requir’st of me, an humble, obedient, faithful, thankful instrument in thy hands, to be used as thou pleasest.’

You are not to content yourself, my friend, with now and then, or even many times, making this oblation of yourself to God. It must be the daily, the hourly exercise of your mind, till it is wrought into your very nature, and becomes an essential state and habit of your mind, till you feel yourself as habitually turned from all your own will, selfish ends, and earthly desires, as you are from stealing and murder; till the whole turn and bent of your spirit points as constantly to God as the needle touched with the loadstone does to the north. This, sir, is your first and necessary step in the spiritual life; this is the key to all the treasures of heaven; this unlocks the sealed book of your soul, and makes room for the light and Spirit of God to arise up in it. Without this, the spiritual life is but spiritual talk, and only assists nature to be pleased with an holiness that it has not.

The necessity of this first step, and the folly of pretending to succeed without it, is thus represented by our blessed Lord: ‘What man intending to build an house:—’

All our ability and preparation to succeed in this great affair, lies in this first step. You may perhaps think this an hard saying. But do not go away sorrowful, like the young man in the gospel, because he had great possessions. For, my friend, you little think what a deliverance you will have from all hardships, and what a flow of happiness is found, even in this life, as soon as the soul is thus dead to self, freed from its own passions, and wholly given up to God; of which I shall speak to you by and by. I have told you the PRICE of the NEW BIRTH. I shall now leave you to consider, whether you will be so wise a merchant, as to give up all the wealth of the old man for this heavenly PEARL. I do not expect your answer now, but will stay for it till to-morrow. * * *

* We would embrace the present opportunity to caution all pure truth-loving christians of this nation, against the vile writings and plausible insinuations of an impious wretch, a popular living French writer and second Jean-Jacques for licentiousness and plebeian character of mind, of the name of Michelet, who, having attained to a professorship in one of the French colleges, has been publishing book after book of flippant blasphemous stuff, (all in the inuendo demi-mot character of self-taught vulgar souls,) against the received honest truths of history and religion. So offensively irreligious is this individual, that his wife and daughter (he admits) actually ‘shrink from him, refusing to sit at the same side of the table’: which he attributes to the ‘influence of priests over women and families,’ but the reason of which any one who has the Spirit of God, and who therefore knows the horror of the atmosphere of an infidel spirit, oftentimes visible in the very look of the eye and form of the visage, can easily understand. This audacious college professor, this director of la jeune France, and overturner of all the old beaten paths of religion and virtue, among other indirect attacks upon Christianity, has been distorting into a kind of love romance, in order to please the prevailing Eugene-Sue-Dumas taste for polished filthiness, the holy life and spirit of DE CHANTAL, with that of her director, the heavenly-minded FRANCIS DE SALES. And what is more, this work has been translated into our own language, and paraded before the British public, by means of a flattering review in the leading journal of the day [Dec. 26, 1845,]; assuredly one of the most offensive articles to truth, justice, and our holy christianity, that was ever permitted to appear in its columns. The day of judgment, as Molinos said to his triumphant persecutors, when all God’s children and saints (among them De Sales and De Chantal) shall be seated around ‘the great white throne to judge the world,’ will render to every one according to his works; but there is oftentimes a temporal justice attendant on blasphemy. A few years at furthest, and we shall see the end of this impious author,—whether he die a broken-hearted penitent, or his body be cast into the fosses, if at all honoured with a human burial!

ANNOTATION.—The following extract from a letter of Dr. F. Lee, found among Law's papers, touching some of the objections made against the Contemplative Way, and representing the true nature of that way, may be acceptable to many readers of this treatise:—"Without apologizing for myself, I am immediately carried to consider the great point of PASSIVE CONTEMPLATION, wherein I find that you have been much shocked by some considerable objections from a great and active genius. You shall hear, then, my free sentiments upon the matter; and after such a long term of silence, it may be concluded that they are my fixed thoughts, and not the hasty eruptions of any natural or preternatural fire in my spirit.

It must needs be confessed, that several of the admirers and followers of the Passive State do seem to show too little a respect for the sacred Scriptures, and that some of them do even very slightly pass over the mystery of salvation by the death of Christ, and do seek to find God without and above the blessed humanity of our dear Mediator; which is the ladder of Jacob, whereby the angels of God and all the Divine influences do descend from heaven to earth, and re-ascend from earth to heaven. But after I had discoursed with Mr. Coester, and had heard him fully, I found that it was the unbounded activity of his genius that had transported him too far; and that it was hardly possible for any one (how acute soever) to reach the punctum of the question, without having first learnt to moderate the active faculties or powers of the soul, or without having had (at least) some lesser experiences concerning this subject matter.

The way of Contemplation ought in the first place to be understood; and this is to be learned either from the Philosophers, or else from the holy Scriptures and the Christian Mystics. The Philosophical Contemplation is then evidently misunderstood, when the exercise of it is condemned in those who were never acquainted with the history of the Gospel, or convinced of its truth: for certainly it can be no fault in any one who never heard of Jesus Christ, (or, which is all one, could never be satisfied, after his best and sincerest endeavours made for that purpose,) to go as directly as he can to God, in the deepest self-abasement, and the most perfect surrender of his will into the hands of the omnipotent Creator and Father. And no less evidently is it so, when the exercise of holy Contemplation is censured in such who are both acquainted with and convinced of the truth of the history of the Gospel: for as much as every christian contemplatist, that is truly such, doth not ascend in his spirit above Christ, or put himself anywise without Christ; but in the very exercise of Contemplation, doth most truly and properly sink himself down into the heart of Christ, and even more truly and properly than he could possibly have done it by all the meditations and reflections imaginable upon the life and sufferings of Christ. This, every one that hath had any experience thereof must needs declare. These meditations indeed, and reflections of the soul, are not to be neglected, for they are most useful and beneficial in their order : and by these when rightly pursued we may arrive to Contemplation ; and thereby lodge ourselves as in the bosom of this our Beloved, in contemplating whose beauty we can never be weary, of the beauty of Him in whom all the treasures and beautiful forms of the Deity are laid up, which are never to be manifested but to the single and contemplative eye. The devout and active contemplation of what Christ both did and suffered for us, will naturally lead us into that divine and Passive Contemplation which transcends all meditation and self-action whatever, and which he by the merits of his precious death and sufferings hath purchased for us. It will bring us successively into that divine peace, which passeth all understanding and ratiocination : it will not cease to carry us on, beyond all that the activity of our intellectual abilities is able to arrive to, or apprehend : and then it will suffer us gently to fall asleep in his dear arms, and to cease from every motion of our own spirit, that so we may be perfectly passive to all the motions and inactions of that blessed Spirit which through his merits is given unto us ; and which, in the highest degree, is given to us when we are denudated of all acts of our own. And being so under the conduct of this Spirit, we do not then lie exposed to the subtlety of malicious spirits transforming themselves, but are quite delivered from them. None of the powers of darkness are able to hurt or supplant a soul that continues in this passive and silent state : for it is therein actually surrendered up into the hands of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ ; and, under that consideration too, it is truly animated by the Holy Ghost, (no less than the body by it.) and is made indeed a partaker of the Divine nature in Christ. And Christ, indeed, is the true and proper way of Contemplation, (I say to us Christians,) and I come not to the Father but by him ; for it is the Son that cometh to the Father, and they that follow the Son must come to God in like manner as he cometh ; that they may even, in a degree, behold his face, and, beholding it, be irradiated by the light of his countenance, lifted up and reflected upon them. But he that teacheth me to come to the Father, hath taught me not only to see the Father in him, (as if that alone were permitted,) but also to see and contemplate him in the Father.

The six last chapters of Cardinal Cusanus in his manual Of the Vision of God, by the means of simple abstraction, (which I have only seen in the English translation of it,) lay this down ex professo. The book of the Idiot doth the same : and many others of the best and wisest of the Mystics will be found perfectly to agree in this point, when they are thoroughly examined into. Yea, I believe I am able to shew even from Dr. Molinos himself, that there is no other way to the quiet of the soul in God, but through Christ ; and that in the very laying aside of all sensible images, he is not laid aside, but may then most truly be beheld in the Father. Nor can I think anything more absurd, or self-contradicting, than that he should write a Book purposely for Daily Communion, and yet not exalt highly the merits of the death of Christ ; or that he should undertake to prescribe this as a proper mean for the preservation of this internal quiet, unless that he did believe that this quiet of the recollected soul in God, was both to be acquired and preserved by an union to the humanity of the blessed Jesus, as well as by a communion thence arising of the Divine Word. This must have been the ground of his writing that little treatise : which is not otherwise considerable in itself, and will sufficiently vindicate him from the charge of Deism. And I am certain that the French lady, Madame Guyon, is not so great an heretic in this matter, as the cabal in France would make her. Her Moyen Court, which was burnt at Paris, has many express passages, some of them very excellent, that do set forth Christ as the way : and in the article which speaks of the mysteries of redemption, she briefly and fully shews, how her method of simple prayer, or of passive Contemplation, doth more effectually honour them than any other method which is more compounded and active ; and how it imprinteth on us the very stigma of our Lord Jesus, so that we are truly said hereby to bear his marks. The method of the Jesuits has been always against this, [as also the Methodists,] for which they press the very same argument as our friend doth ; preferring therefore meditation in their Spiritual Exercises, that they may not put themselves out of the protection of Christ by too much abstractedness and silent recollection : and upon this score they made in the last age such a violent opposition against Father Austin Baker, and against Dame Gertrude More : whose reasons, which they bring in vindication of their simple and plain way, are not perhaps unworthy of consideration. The articles of Issy, which are drawn up by the present Bishop of Meaux against the little book of that (give me leave to call her so) great woman just mentioned, do run in their beaten track, and fall into the same mistake with them. I have written some reflections upon them, and have in some measure laid open the fallacy of that manner of proceeding, by taking them into pieces, and reducing them into mere propositions. These I have some thoughts of printing with the discourse itself to which they belong, and which I have had by me a pretty long while translated, but is now providentially called for after I had laid it aside. This hath given me a surprising satisfaction as to the universality of that method, which is so subtly attacked ; and no less therefore as to the security and facility of it, the whole interior process being made hereby direct and linear : and it hath laid open a field, which others may prosecute with good success.

Many notwithstanding must be alarmed at it : but in the end you will see that truth shall be justified of her children. And after all the janglings that are in the world, there will be found no other way to arrive to the truth but this. It is Contemplation and Abstraction that must lead us through the veil into the Sanctum Sanctorum, where the originals of truth are preserved, even in that ark of the Divine presence, which is Christ, the Alpha and the Omega of every creature. And it is through him that we can come with boldness, (being first purified by the blood of sprinkling, which cleanseth us from every pollution of the flesh through faith,) to the throne of Grace, which is the everlasting mercy-seat in the third heavens, and inmost sanctuary, where this great High Priest ministrereth continually, and presenteth such pure Contemplative souls as do ascend hither upon the wings of the Divine eagle, to his God and their God. He is the way, and he is the truth of contemplation : [N.B.] though we may not be always reflecting upon the way, while we are in it ; nor reasoning about the truth, while we possess it, if we are so happy. And Christ being the truth of Contemplation, or that Truth which the contemplator beholds, and beholding possesses,—every one in such a state, or frame, is necessarily under the protection of the truth, and so by consequent, can be in no danger of falling into errors, or of being blinded by delusions ; because the truth itself dwelleth in him, and he dwelleth in the truth, being possessed by it in silence and passiveness of spirit, and walketh in the truth, then when he putteth forth what he hath learnt in this internal silence as under this divine possession by the word of truth, by passing from rest into action, and so bringing forth all the fruits and powers of the Holy Ghost, in the life of the blessed Jesus, both active and passive; and the truth shall be with him for ever, as an inward principle of life, and of the resurrection from the dead. He is now in the truth, and the truth is in him; he is vitally united with the truth, and of this union (as it is made truly out of time,) there can never be a dissolution: so that all the subtle and intriguing spirits of darkness are hereby effectually shut out. and they have no power to deceive, because when they come they find nothing of their own to mix with; for as much as the creature being silenced, God alone in Christ speaketh, moveth, and doeth. And I think that this is a state both warrantable, and christian, and what every one would do well to press after; there being few incapable of it, and none but may be made capable of it. [See B's Tract of DIVINE VISION, chap. ii., p. 26; also, of SUPERSENSUAL LIFE, p. 43, 44., etc.] Before we arrive to it, we are not yet in the Truth, but are only advancing toward it; neither is the truth (properly speaking) in us, but instead thereof, there is a shadow only, or image of the truth, which being followed, will lead us into that of which it is a shadow and an image, as we shall silently introvert our souls into the fountain of the Divine Being. And then may we be said to worship God in truth. The more spiritual, and the more perfect our worship of God in Christ is, it must of necessity be so much the more near to this state of internal silence and rest: that so Christ our Lord in like manner as in the Heavens, may in us also come to enter into his rest, and to sit down in the soul as * * *

The original author of the above CATALOGUE prefaced it with a brief epitome of the substance of Mystic Theology, wherein he explains the reasons of the difference in the modes of speaking and teaching of the various experimental writers upon that science, who, as such, must needs have the

* It might not have been out of place, to have here presented a Catalogue of the enlightened practical divines of the English church, accompanied with annotations elucidatory of their respective styles, and of their character as true evangelical writers, in contradistinction to the light in which they are represented in the "Christian Student," and books of a similar ground of understanding; where, in the former work, the author, assuming his own crude apprehensions of the Christian theory and doctrines to be according to the true 'evangelical' standard, measures all the writers that come under his review in that work by it, and as they agree or disagree with his peculiar, partial, calvinistic, "first Reformer's" notions of the Christian œconomy, or rather of parts of it, he pronounces them 'evangelical,' or non-evangelical and having low views of Christ;—as, same one faith, one Lord, one Spirit, as the animating principle of their renewed souls; and so at the conclusion of his discourse he sums up with a description of the evangelical characteristics of those writers as classified in the catalogue, in the following terms:

Mais il est temps de finir ces observations, nous contentant de ce que nous avons remarqué touchant les caractères de plusieurs auteurs mystiques et spirituels à l'occasion des dix ou douze principaux que l'on s'était prescrits; d'où il doit maintenant paraître à tous, ce me semble, que cette espèce de diversité qu'il y a entre eux, et qui faisait de la difficulté, n'est pas une opposition qui soit dans le fond de l'esprit et du cœur de ces auteurs-là, non plus que dans les matières et les sujets qu'ils traitent; mais que c'est, comme nous l'avons dit au commencement de cet écrit, une multiplicité diversifiée des grâces et des lumières du même Dieu, et des différentes manières d'opérer du même agent souverain, qui a marqué fort clairement toutes ces diversités dans ses Saintes Ecritures, soit par les instructions qu'il y a mises, ou par les exemples qu'il en a suscitées, ou par les promesses qu'il en a faites, par exemple:—

Le caractère de TAULERE, et de ceux de sa classe, qui est de revenir par les choses extérieures aux facultés intérieures, et de celles-ci dans le fond de l'âme à Dieu, est la même chose dont Dieu commande cent fois l'exercice dans sa parole, lorsqu'il rappelle les âmes du dehors au dedans; comme quand il dit par Isaïe (xlv. 8.), Transgresseurs, revenez à votre cœur. Il y a évidemment dans cette exhortation, la parole extérieure, qui étant ouïe, exige qu'on y applique la faculté de l'intelligence pour en comprendre le sens, qui veut qu'on rentre dans le fonds de son cœur. Et quand Jésus Christ dit, Je me tiens à la porte, et je frappe, cela marque l'impression de Dieu sur les facultés sensibles de l'homme: si quelqu'un écoute ma voix et m'ouvre, voilà la vraie usage de l'intellect, qui est attentif, et des affections, qui cessent de s'opposer à Dieu: j'entrerai chez lui, et souperai avec lui, et lui avec moi, c'est la manifestation de Dieu dans le fonds de l'âme, laquelle ne le cherche plus alors hors de la porte, mais qui le trouve, et qui se communique avec lui, comme lui avec elle, dans le centre de son être le plus intime. [Apoc. iii. 20.]

for instance, in his felicitous descriptions of Law, exhibited in the Note of page 105, which, as there observed, may be taken as an ensample of the Writer's capacity and justness of judgment respecting other fundamental mystic divines and scriptural Theologians, such as prefer solid truth as implied in the teachings of Jesus, to a few fond imaginations upon particular doctrines of Christianity.— And a dissertation of that kind would perhaps be the more appropriate, as, by reason of the self-styled evangelical divinity which has had so great a run of late, the reader may but seldom have had an opportunity of being rightly instructed in the merits of the English true divinity writers, in regard to the whole Christian doctrine.

But such a discourse is hardly necessary for the candidate, who, from his natural taste, his theological education, and the references of the present treatise, may be supposed to be well-informed upon the points in question. Apart from which, such a description would require more space and time than can now be afforded, and must therefore be left to be handled in the proposed Biography; where, in the exhibition of the Christian scheme in its full scope, and combination of particulars, in connection with the subject of Law as the Newton of metaphysics, the popular false arbitrary-religion notions will in the nature of things be exhibited in their contra-position to the full truth, and so, like morning mists before a tropical sun, will dissolve of themselves, and hence require no formal confutation.

And surely it is high time to put an end to the Babylonish theology, which under the self-appropriated title of 'evangelical doctrine,' seems, for want of an enlightened exposure of its fallacies, to be insidiously making its way even among the more sober orthodox divines of the English church; though, paradoxical as it may appear, with the more universally instructed of the branch evangelical churches, a reaction towards solid practical divinity seems happily to have commenced.

As truth is more attractive and powerful than error however exciting, when shewn in its true aspect and real character, in its fulness of beauty and harmony: so in the scripture doctrine of justification for instance, the ground of it needs only to be laid bare, and the doctrine displayed in its connection with all other parts of essential truth, to afford a much greater satisfaction to the mind, than the ordinary popular erroneous representation of it is calculated to impart. And thus, were the mystification of Christian faith removed, the world would fall back from the practical antinomianism doctrine, of 'salvation by faith alone,' and similar conceits, to the unity and simplicity of real evangelical christianity as contained in the plain teachings of Jesus Christ, understood according to their natural meaning, and the true theory of the gospel.

For under the modern divinity teaching and preaching, (whatever may be intended by it,) the universality of professed Christians seem to act as if strict evangelical virtue, (as taught by Christ,) was a poor insignificant thing, of little consequence, and which may be safely dispensed with; as if every word or act, shall not have to pass through the fire, and with its source or root be proved and judged; as if it were a trifling matter how people live, so that before they die, they 'repent, and believe that Jesus died for them' (which they may do at any time,) and so 'be pardoned, and get to heaven,' notwithstanding their hearts are full of self-love, and their coffers with unrestored plunder. For this is the substance of the modern skip-jack divinity as popularly understood: Ye are simply to believe in Christ: ye are saved by faith alone, not by works, (as to the real essence of the salvation-act): only believe and yours is heaven.

Is it not then high time we say to return to the first truths of the gospel, to unreservedly declare, and earnestly enforce the strict, self-denying, ascetic injunctions of Him, who was opposed to every thing that pleased fallen human nature, whose whole life as the leader of men, as the way to heaven, was entirely contrary to the way and spirit of the world, and who lays it down as an inflexible maxim, that everything that is popular in the world, yea and in religion too, is enmity with God! And where shall we find this truth, the truth as it is in Jesus, embracing the whole dispensation of Christianity, of the Law and the Gospel, (or as St. Paul calls it, the flesh and the Spirit.) set forth, but in such writers, as the author of the "Christian Student" and all of his idiosyncrasy, perversely denominate non-evangelical writers.—To expect, indeed, such teaching as is offered in the Christian-Student character of divinity, to raise men to the true perfection of the Christian life, is qui est imparfait, pour résusciter dans une vie nouvelle, et s'avancer dans ce renouvellement de vie en vie, ou de degrés en degrés,—est entièrement conforme avec ce que disent les Ecritures, "que le grain de froment doit mourir pour revivre et porter fruit : que qui veut trouver la vie la doit perdre : que quiconque est mort résuscite en une vie nouvelle, laquelle vie est cachée avec Jésus Christ dans Dieu : et qu'encore que par la conformité de sa mort on soit déjà participant à la vertu de sa résurrection en un sens, on n'est pas néanmoins parvenu encore pour cela jusqu'à la plénitude de l'état de cette résurrection, en sorte qu'on soit déjà parfait ; mais il faut s'avancer, et tâcher d'atteindre où Jésus Christ nous veut avoir, oubliant ce qui est passé, et nous avançant vers ce qui est devant nous, tendant vers le but où nous sommes appelés d'en haut : et tous les parfaits, ou ceux qui tendent à la perfection, doivent entrer dans ces sentiments-là." like expecting the ploughboy who is taught reading, writing, and the elements of arithmetic, to be thereby raised into a highly scientific and Christian philosopher.

It must not, however, be supposed by these remarks, that any sanction is given to another class of writers who are generally considered the antitheses of the modern evangelicals, and designated PUSEYITES : for these are more removed from the true orthodox standard than the former, though in another direction. The origin of them may be conceived to be in this wise : Law's series of writings have been hitherto justly represented as manifestative of the whole Biblical revelation, that is of the growth of the tree of Christianity, in its patriarchal, legal, prophetic, personal, and perfective developments of the Spirit, in the redemption of human nature. Now the 'Puseyites' were, so to speak, a precocious abortion, or unnatural self-generation from Law's writings ; for which, be it observed, Law is not responsible any more than the Bible is responsible for the misuse of it, by self-willed ignorant interpreters. The 'Puseyites' began as it were in the middle instead of at the beginning of Christianity ; with the prophets, or faith, instead of with Moses or the Law ; that is, they were led by imagination rather than divine instinct in their rise and progress as christian professors. They began to be teachers of Christianity according to particular opinions, before they had known it by experience, had felt in their own souls the dark centre, upon the fact and absolutely necessary transmutation of which, it is altogether grounded ; and without such experience how could they truly teach others ? For Christianity is a life, as animality and diabolism is a life, and can only be understood by feeling ; and no man is a true philosophical teacher of it, but he who has been the subject of it in its various births or evolutions, who teaches only what he has experienced and not one iota further. For beyond that, it is all mere notion or phantasy to him, just as is a history of what is doing in the moon.—Now this party of unfledged apostles in the seat of learning and divinity, having read the fifth or sixth and it may be others of the progressive writings of Law, for instance his 'Animadversions' and other Tracts, his 'Letters to Hoadley', etc., and having been thereby captivated with the truth and justness of his elevated views and sentiments, and especially of what he says concerning the holiness and dignity of the priesthood, and other points favouring their own professional position,—they began to urge those views according to their own blind concepts, till at last they finished by such puerilities as the 'Ideal of a Christian Church,' and some by running over to Rome, in search of a local Christ, an imaginary salvation, a notional church, in short a religion instead of a God ; all which of course served but to demonstrate afresh, that scholastic reason in regard to the 'things of the Spirit' was still the same pitiable foolishness with God, as it was in the days of St. Paul, and that no man can call Jesus, Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.—To speak plainly, these undoubted 'apostolic successors,' 'consecrated priests' and young scholastics, upon reading the aforementioned treatises of Law, would needs become holy somebodies, and, having well furnished their minds with the ideas of profound humility, perfect meekness, and the whole array of passive graces, as well as of priestly authority and passive obedience doctrines, (all which are very true as set forth according to the spirit of holiness in the writings of the saints,) they began to consider themselves learned in the kingdom of heaven, doctors of the law, and endowed with divine authority. In a word, self under the disguise of an angel of light, would seem to have been at the top and bottom, the beginning and end of the whole scheme ; and not the being truly converted to God, and made actual partakers of scriptural holiness, with the like conversion of all around them, their sole aim and end.

Now here was the difference between them and WESLEY, and the first Methodists. Wesley began at the beginning of Law. He took the "Christian Perfection" and the "Serious Call," as the true classic interpreters of the spirit and practice of the Gospel, and he made the orderly specific doctrines of those books the exact rule of his life. He lived them, to the letter. (Here is the secret of a holy and apostolic life !) And so having experimentally passed into Christianity, into its first state, (which those books as the law are so admirably calculated to induce,) he became prepared for the next development of the Spirit, that is regeneration or the new birth, a being born-again out of the weakness and bondage of sin, into life, liberty, and power divine : and thus, upon the foundation of the holy Scriptures as seen through the medium of those treatises, and according to the full discoveries of moral wisdom so orderly and practically displayed in them, he pursued onwards, and change en pleurs, et votre joie en tristesse ; et humiliez vous en la présence du Seigneur, et il vous elevera.—Jac. v. Et celui de la PERLE EVANGELIQUE, qui est la présence continuelle de Dieu dans l'âme, n'est il pas confirmé par ces paroles de St. Paul, Dieu n'est pas loin de chacun de nous ; car en lui nous avons la vie, le mouvement, et l'être.—Act. xvii. Comme aussi par ces autres, Vous êtes le temple de Dieu,—1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. Et toutes les industries et les efforts que recommandent tous ceux qui ont expliqué ou pratiqué tant la vie active et pénitente que la contemplative, ne sont-ils pas autorisés par Jésus Christ quand il dit, Faites effort pour entrer par la porte étroite ; et qu'il faut prier et ne jamais cesser : et si vous ne faites pénitence, vous périrez tous.—Luc. xiii. et xviii. : comme aussi par David, Cherchez le Seigneur et sa force : cherchez continuellement sa face et sa présence. J'ai toujours le Seigneur devant moi. Mes yeux sont continuellement sur lui, etc.—Ps. xvi., xxv., et cv.

Enfin, quand on considérera que Jésus Christ a promis à ses disciples et à ses envoyés l'Esprit qui doit les conduire en toute vérité ; et une sagesse à laquelle nul ne pourra résister.—St. Jean, xvi. Luc. xxi., et qu'il a prédit qu'il en sera du Royaume des cieux, comme du levain, qu'une femme prend et met dans trois mesures de farine, ce qui fait lever toute la pâte,—Matth. xiii. ; et que d'ailleurs on aura fait réflexion sur ce que Madlle. BOURIGNON, vers la fin de son livre de la Lumière du Monde, explique cette parabole d'une manière qui par sa supposition met fin à toute autre recherche et à tout autre moyen, à toutes lectures, à toutes pratiques, et à toutes méthodes ; et qu'on aura compris ses autres écrits avec des dispositions convenables,—je laisse à penser, si ce que nous avons remarqué de son caractère ne sera pas tenu pour une ratification de ces promesses et de ces paroles de notre Seigneur.

Il ne serait pas fort difficile de montrer que non seulement les caractères, mais aussi les dogmes et les manières de parler des Ecrivains Mystiques, sont conformes aux vérités des Saintes Ecritures, et souvent ne sont que les mêmes termes ; et par conséquent que les erreurs ou les contradictions imaginaires qu'on leur reproche, ne viennent que de ce que leurs adversaires ne les entendent pas ; de la même manière que les différentes sectes du Christianisme tirent de la même finished by raising up the high superstructure of his own admitted holy and evangelical life, and of the METHODIST SOCIETY :—which latter he originally intended as a kind of appendage to the national church, for the benefit of those of its members who should desire to live its principles, and to work out their salvation, in contradistinction to mere nominal church-attendants and formalist-christians ;—whereafterwards, events so occurred as to induce Wesley to consider that God had endued the spirit of 'methodism' to spread scriptural religion throughout the land, among people of every denomination, leaving every one to hold his own opinions, and to follow his own mode of worship. Which could only be done effectually (he writes) by leaving things as they were, and endeavouring to leaven the whole nation with that 'faith that worketh by love.'

[And such an appendage to the church is now both wanted, and might easily be annexed to it, by adopting some of the most soul-affecting hymns, and hymn-tunes, and modes of meetings for spiritual edification, for mutual prayer, and spurring on each member both actively and passively to diligence in the cultivation of holiness, made use of in that society ; and by the ministers or leaders throwing off all slavish deference to what the world thinks and says, all fears of being particular, all love of self-satisfaction as gentlemen and scholars, and the stiffness of an unexercised piety and an unpractised apostolic aggressiveness, which is to be accomplished by entering heartily into the great work of converting sinners, and, Ouranious-Fletcher-Bramwell-like, looking upon each member of their flock, purely as so many souls committed to their charge by Christ, to watch over, to direct, and to train up for eternal glory ; and whose blood he would therefore require at their hands : hic labor ! hoc opus ! Were the English church (with its pure Christian doctrine) blessed with such ministerial agencies, and such discovered improved methods of exercising the powers of the divine nature in the quickening and cultivation of the life of grace, it would speedily swallow up all sectarianism in this country. Under this head, Finney "On Revivals," (the author of which, by the way, is not inferior in originality of genius to Voltaire, ~~and one of the names of the Gospel in France to that of Methodism~~) would be a profitable book for perusal, by clergymen.]

For the original principles of Methodism are nothing more than the methodical and evangelical principles of Law's "Call" and "Christian Perfection" carried into practical operation, by a number of united Christian brethren, collected together, here, and there, and over the land. And though admitting the ignorance, erroneous views, and disorder that have occasionally characterised their doctrines and practices, which however was hardly avoidable ; yet the principles, the practise and discipline of Methodism may be justly considered as embracing the machinery for the entire christian and political regeneration of a country, yea, and with the supervention of the lights indicated in this treatise, of the intellectual as well as the illiterate world.—Thus Wesley practised, and led others to practise the science which Law in so masterly a manner has taught : thus he proceeded ; and upon such a foundation, (N.B.) ever retaining the original practice of Law's books, he went on from weakness to strength, from one degree of experience and evangelical ministration to another ; always having before his eye the high perfection of Christ, which, through the development of the spirit of Christ in him by regeneration, he knew to belong to him and to be the privilege of all, as believers, to attain unto : wherefore, he so publicly enforced the doctrine of Christian Perfection or 'entire Sanctification ;' as knowing, moreover, that the soul must ever be pressing forward in grace, by prayer and self-denial, or it will inevitably retrograde into the rational animal nature of the world.

But this was not the way of the 'Puseyites.' Had they entered religion at the right door, in such simple, earnest, orderly devotion, self abnegation, heavenly aspirativeness, and fruitfulness in all kinds of evangelical good works, as are taught in the "Christian Perfection" and "Serious Call," as the true spirit and practice of the doctrines of Christ, and so proceeded step by step to the high and sublime experiences of the advanced stages of the Christian life ; had they laid such a foundation, and so raised the superstructure, their lives and labours would have exhibited,—instead of a vain research after an idol religion, and a local partial whimsical Deity, with the effusion of such scholastic theological imperfections as the 'Tracts for the Times,' and similar publications,—a nineteenth century revival of the life and power of Gospel Christianity, and zeal Écriture, par un esprit de mes-intelligence, des doctrines et des conclusions toutes opposées et contradictoires les uns aux autres : mais cela serait un nouveau dessein qui nous mènerait trop loin, au lieu qu'il est temp de nous réposer, ayant, comme je crois, suffisamment exécuté le nôtre.

Je n'ajouterai plus qu'un mot sur ce qu'on pourrait dire, ou que j'ai omis beaucoup d'auteurs de cette classe, dont je n'ai fait nulle mention : ou que j'en ai trop produit, et que cette multitude ne pourra que donner de la confusion à ceux qui voulant acquérir par lecture quelque connaissance des choses mystiques, ne sauront quel choix en faire, et croiront peut-être que pour en venir là on est obligé à la lecture de tous. J'avoue sur le premier de ces articles qu'on aura raison, n'ignorant pas combien j'en ai laissé en arrière : mais il me semble pourtant que plus d'une centaine dont je viens de faire mention, doit avoir suffi à mon dessein, qui n'en exigeait pas davantage, et même qui n'en exigeait pas tant. Pour le second, bien loin qu'on prétende d'insinuer qu'il soit nécessaire à ceux qui veulent être aidés solidement dans la connaissance des choses spirituelles, de lire tous ces auteurs ; on leur dit au contraire que très-peu d'entre eux et très-peu de lecture doivent leur suffire, moyennant qu'on en prenne occasion de rentrer dans soi-même, et qu'au lieu de s'amuser sur la spéculation des idées mortes qu'on s'en forme, on implore la Lumière et la Vertu de Dieu pour venir vivifier et réaliser dans nous la substance et l'esprit des choses que la lecture nous a représentées. Mais parce qu'il y a peu, ou peut-être point, de lieux où ces sortes de livres se trouvent tous, dispersés qu'ils sont les uns ici les autres là, et que même ils sont rares et inconnus en bien des endroits, il était bon d'en indiquer plusieurs, et de les marquer même par le lieu et le temps de l'impression, afin de faciliter à chacun autant qu'il est possible la recherche et la rencontre pour le moins de quelques uns. Que si des personnes poussées d'une bonne curiosité pour un peu plus de lecture que celle de nécessité, avaient désir de se faire une espèce de petite Bibliothèque choisie de quelques livres spirituels et Français, voici les principaux que j'estime pouvoir y avoir place : *Thomas a Kempis ; le Combat Spirituel ; Monsieur de Bernières ; les quatre Theologies, du Cœur, de l'Amour, de la Croix, et la Reelle ; Ste Therese, Jean de la Croix, Madame Guyon, et Frere Laurent, Constantine de Barbanson, Canfeld, Gelenius, les Vies des S. for the divine glory in the conversion of sinners, which so eminently distinguished the last century in the instrumentalities of Wesley and others, and again a previous century in the sublime apostolic lives and labours of Ignatius Loyola, Francis Xavier, and that band of devoted seraphic spirits, which, before the mystery-of-iniquity corruption of their order by their self-seeking 'apostolic successors,' diffused the lovely savour of the knowledge of God and the blessings of true christianity, wherever they appeared ; proving to all the world the truth of their apostleship, by the incontestable miracles which attended it, and which will ever attend the accomplished missionary of Jesus Christ.—Where are the Xaviers, and Loyolas, and Wesleys, and Fletchers, and Bramwells, and Pauls of our days ? Does not the present state of the christian and gentile world demand the revisitation of the same divine spirit ? Are the modern evangelicals the personifications of that burning and shining holiness, self crucifixion, continual prayer, and sitting in the heavenly places with Christ, being dead to self, to the world, to its riches, its joys, its comforts, and its sorrows, which we have an example of in the individuals above mentioned ? May this treatise, or that which is sought to be obtained hereby, be the providential instrument of rekindling it afresh, even in such a glory as shall answer to the radical necessities of all nations.

We have alluded to the benefits of a right display of the doctrines of salvation,—how that there needs not any erroneous transporting representations of them, to magnify the grace of God, or to promote the salvation of souls ; but that if shown in their true light and proper point of view, they contain everything to render the Divine character adorable, and the state of man certain and comfortable. In illustration whereof, and by way of concluding this Note, we propose to take, for instance, the doctrine of Justification (already referred to), and to represent it in that classic clearness and exactness in which it stands in the holy Scriptures, and in which therefore it ought to be exhibited by all true theologists ; remitting the reader for a theosophical demonstration of it to those treatises wherein that is set forth. This will be found to be accomplished in the following rough draft found amongst Mr. Law's old papers : which was probably sketched out as the substance of a more exact and finished essay, to meet the request of one of his correspondents, (Francis Okely,) who had desired Mr. Law to favour him with a brief scriptural view, according to his apprehension, of the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION :—

“The whole world, or all the race of fallen Adam, were, by the free grace of God, called and chosen, and enabled to rise from their fallen state.

This free grace of God, on which the salvation of mankind is solely founded, is antecedent to all good works ; it saves us without any regard to works, of any kind, and that for this plain reason : because this free grace began before any of us were born, or the first man created. As appears from these plain passages of scripture, * * * . And again, in hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, hath promised before the world began. Titus i. 2.

This is the first free and general grace of God to the whole fallen race of mankind, and has no dependence upon our works, because antecedent to them all.

The second exercise or manifestation of this same free grace of God, was at the fall of our first parents. When God, in consequence of that mercy he had for man when his fall was foreseen, now bestowed this free grace upon him, by a declaration of, and giving into his soul a Saviour, or engrafted Word, in this declaration, the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent.

Now, this is a second act, or manifestation, of God's free grace to all mankind. For this grace is as general as that before the creation, and is only that same free grace actually given and bestowed upon us, which was then only in the decree or promise of God, to be given us.

This second free grace, manifested by the giving of a Saviour, an engrafted Word, a bruiser of the serpent into the essences of Adam's life, and in him to all that were to descend from him, is a free grace also, that is, without our works, because it also is antecedent to them all.

Thus stands our salvation on the part of God, as it is not only the offer, but a real and free gift of a Saviour, or saving power into the ground of every man's heart, that is born of Adam.

And this is the only true free and general grace of God, that concerns the salvation of mankind, and is given us solely from the pure love and mercy of God.

This general free grace is so independent of our good works, that we have not the smallest la Vie de M. Renty, avec quelques-unes des Œuvres de Madlle. Bourignon. En voilà assez pour un tel dessein, ce me semble : [this written A.D. 1708:] ceux qui néanmoins en voudraient avoir davantage, n'auront pas de peine à savoir comment se satisfaire après la lecture de cette section que je ne saurais mieux conclure que par la recommandation sérieuse de ce mot de la Théologie Germanique :

'Bien qu'il soit bon de s'informer, et même de savoir ce que les personnes vertueuses et saintes ont fait (ont écrit,) et ont souffert; comment elles ont vécu; et ce que Dieu a voulu dans elles et opère (ou produit) par elles; il vaudrait néanmoins cent fois mieux que chacun éprouvât et connût bien ce qui est de sa propre vie, en quel état il se trouve; ce que Dieu est, ou veut, ou opère dans lui, ou à quoi Dieu voudrait l'employer et à quoi non. Et c'est pourquoi cette autre parole n'est pas moins véritable, que, Quelque bien qu'il y ait à sortir au dehors, il y en a encore beaucoup davantage à demeurer au dedans.' VOILA A QUOI NOUS RAPELLENT TOUS LES LIVRES VÉRITABLEMENT SPIRITUELS, DE LA SUBSTANCE DESQUELS NOUS SOMMES ENNEMIS DÉCLARÉS SI NOUS AGISSONS AUTREMENT.

We cannot perhaps more appropriately conclude the present Section, than by the following Extracts from Mr. Law's strictures on Trap's Reply; which also finely illustrate that spirit of heavenly impartial love with which his soul was filled, [the result, in part, of his study of the ascetic and Mystic Writers,] and which displayed itself in an uniform course of boundless diffusive charity spark of virtuous desire, or the least striving or tendency towards anything that is good, but what proceeds from this free grace of an engrafted Word, or a bruiser of the serpent that was inspoken into our first parents.

Now, if this be an undeniable truth, that God's free grace hath chosen us to salvation in Christ Jesus, before the foundation of the world; and, secondly, that this same free grace hath at the fall performed this promise, and did, antecedently to all our works, put into our life's essences a bruiser of the serpent, an incorruptible seed of the Word, which seed of life became the beginning of a divine life, or salvation that was to be wrought out in us. If this bruiser of the serpent is that alone from which we have the possibility of a good desire, then it will be as plain as the sun at noon, how we are to understand those scriptures which ascribe all our righteousness and justification, to a free grace of God in Christ, with an entire exclusion of all our own works.

Now, as this goodness of God, whilst it stood only in the divine purpose, antecedent to our creation and works, must necessarily be considered as the sole free gift of God, and as a salvation given unto us without any motive or reason, or cause of it, but the pure love and free mercy of God:

So must it be called and looked upon after the creation, and through all the ages of the world, to be still, and in the same degree, a sole gift and free grace, as it was before the foundation of the world.

So that it is as absurd to ascribe a man's salvation to any works that he has done after he was created, as to any works of his before the foundation of the world.

Our justification considered on the part of God, relates to all mankind.

It implies an offer of a new righteousness in Christ Jesus, which comes as solely from God in Christ Jesus, and is as truly a gift of God, as our creation was.

It implies an universal ability given to all mankind, to be thus righteous and holy in Christ Jesus.

And thus considered on the side of God, it is the same free grace, and mere gift of God, and has no more to do with our works, than when it was only in the divine purpose before the foundation of the world.

According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world (Eph. i. 4), that we should be holy and without blame before him in love. This is as if he had said, Before the foundation of the world so great was the mercy and love of God towards us, that we were even then in the divine decree, created again in Christ Jesus unto good works; so that we who were fallen in Adam, should again in Christ Jesus be made holy, and without blame before him in love.

But now, as all this mercy and redemption began in the divine goodness towards us, before the foundation of the world; and as this mercy was freely bestowed in the giving of an engrafted Word, or bruiser of the serpent to all mankind, in our first parents; and as all the possibility of our thinking, deriving any good, proceeds solely from this free gift of an engrafted Word, antecedent to all our works, there is an absolute necessity to say of our salvation, as St. Paul does, By grace ye are saved, not of works, not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.

When St. Paul says, by faith ye are saved, he means neither more nor less than that we are saved by Jesus, as Jesus Christ is opposed to works; that is, is a salvation that is not our own work, so faith is opposed to our own works or righteousness.

Thus is it that St. Paul, in his Epistles, declares against all the works of man, as having no share in the justification of sinners, because he all along considers, or looks upon this justification on the part of God; and therefore, in that view in which he considers it, it is as true that our justification is wholly the gift of God, without regard to our works, as it is true that God was moved only by his own pure mercy before the foundation of the world, to receive man in a righteousness of Jesus Christ, or by making Christ as much the revival of a righteousness in us, as Adam was the cause of sin being born in us.

And therefore, as it was not our works that brought Adam's sin upon us; so neither was it our works that derived the righteousness into us: this is plain and clear to a demonstration.

Thus much concerning our justification as it is on the part of God, a righteousness offered to us through Jesus Christ.

[What Jesus Christ was in himself, how he was related to man, what man was in his creation, and what he came to be in his fall, and how Jesus Christ is the Saviour of men, in brief, throughout his whole life; but pre-eminently in his latter days, as his matured spirit approached the return to its native element, to be wholly absorbed in the Divine Nature, the deity of Love and Wisdom:—

“Selfishness and partiality (he observes) are very inhuman and base qualities, even in the things of this world, but in the doctrines of religion they are of a baser nature. Now this is the greatest evil that the division of the church has brought forth; it raises in every communion a selfish, partial orthodoxy, which consists in courageously defending all that it has, and condemning all that it has not. And thus every champion is trained up in defence of their own truth, their own learning, and their own church; and he has the most merit, the most honour, who likes everything, defends everything amongst themselves, and leaves nothing uncensured in those that are of a different communion. Now how can truth, and goodness, and union, and religion be more struck at, than by such defenders of it?—If you ask why the great Bishop of Meaux wrote so many learned books against all parts of the Reformation, it is because he was born in France, and bred up in the bosom of mother church.

what are the true principles and what the nature of things, are all and each fundamentally and philosophically declared in one or other of the works of Behmen and Law.]

II.—Let us now consider Justification on the part of man.

That there is a justification on the part of man, and that we are to have a share in our justification, or in the acceptance of the justification that is offered to us by God, is certain, from these passages of Scripture: Turn unto me saith the Lord, and I will turn unto you: Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest: Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out: Knock and it shall be opened unto you: Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life: He that believeth in me hath everlasting Life.

Here turning, coming, knocking, believing, etc., are things to be done on the part of man for his justification, that the righteousness of Christ may not be denied unto him.

And here, what the Bishop of London hath said, that good works are a necessary condition of our being justified in the sight of God, is an eternal and immutable truth; and he who denies it, denies the gospel; and he who preaches another justification on the part of man, is entitled to the anathema threatened to the preaching another gospel than that already preached by the apostles.

That there is a justification on the part of man, I have already proved from the foregoing texts. I shall now show that the terms in which that justification is expressed, necessarily imply, and expressly call not only for good works, as an ingredient into it, but for all such good works, as are taught by the gospel.

I shall show that all those works which are called and demanded as the fruits of faith, are all necessarily demanded to be in faith, to constitute its existence, and that faith is not justifying, till itself is the fruit of works, till it hath all those good works in a certain degree, which appear afterwards in more visible fruits and effects:

And that faith is dead and rotten, and mere dead fiction of the brain, if it does not itself arise from a converted soul, or from some degrees of goodness in the soul that raises it.

First, Turn unto me, saith the Lord, and I will turn unto you.—Zach. 1. 3. Now the whole nature of sin, consists in our turning, or being turned from the Lord. There is no sin in the world but is comprehended under this general notion. Therefore a turning unto the Lord necessarily implies a turning from all sin. Can it be thought God here calls upon us to turn to him hypocritically, or without turning sincerely from our sins? If not, then we are to turn from everything that turns us from him; but sin, and all sin, is that alone which turns from him: therefore we cannot turn to him, but by turning from all sin. That faith is dead and rotten that does not spring from this turning unto God. Therefore faith supposes, and is itself the fruit of some goodness in the soul.

Again, Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you. Christ does not say, come unto me with a naked faith, that proceeds from no goodness in you, but come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, i.e., all ye that are labouring against your sins, and are afflicted with the weight and burden of them, and would be glad to be delivered from the sad slavery, and I will give you that peace and rest that you want. Now, as Christ promises only rest to those who were in this degree of goodness, who stood in this state of struggling with their sins, and abhorrence of them, it is undeniable that a faith in him, or a coming to him, that did not proceed from this degree of goodness, would not gain him to be their Saviour, or procure rest to their souls. Therefore, a faith that is not the fruit of some good works or workings in the soul, is dead, and not the faith that justifies us through Christ.

Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. I take it for granted that, by the kingdom of heaven is at hand, is meant, that the salvation offered to us of God by Jesus Christ is at hand. What is meant by repentance, I suppose I need not explain; therefore I say, that all that is required to make the beginning of a repentance acceptable to God, is required to make us fit for the salvation which is offered us by Jesus Christ; and as Christ can only be received by faith in him, or desire of him, so this faith in or desire of Christ must be founded on repentance, and have so much goodness in it, as can make the beginning of a repentance sincere. Therefore, that faith which brings us to Christ, or Christ to us, must be a faith that proceeds from repentance, and is the fruit of it.

Knock and it shall be opened unto you; I am the door, saith our blessed Lord: therefore when we are to knock, it is that this door may be opened unto us. This knocking is a work, and I sup-

Had he been born in England, had Oxford, or Cambridge been his alma mater, he might have rivalled our great Bishop Stillingfleet, and would have wrote as many learned folios against the church of Rome as he has done. And yet I will venture to say, that if each church could produce but one man a-piece that had the piety of an apostle, and the impartial love of the first christians, in the first church at Jerusalem, that a Protestant and a Papist of this stamp, would not want half a sheet of paper to hold their articles of union, nor be half an hour before they were of one religion.—If therefore it should be said, that churches are divided, estranged, and made unfriendly to one another, by a learning, a logic, a history, a criticism in the hands of partiality, it would be saying that which every particular church too much proves to be true. Ask why even the best amongst the Catholics are very shy of owning the validity of the orders of our church, it is because they are afraid of removing any odium from the Reformation? Ask why no Protestants any where touch upon the expediency and benefit of celibacy in those who are separated from all worldly concerns to preach the gospel, tis because that would be seem-pose a good work, because our Lord directs us to it. Therefore, our faith which is to enter into Christ as the door, must arise from, and be accompanied with this knocking; and, therefore, to a naked faith, not founded on this knocking, the door of Christ will not be opened.

By it is meant prayer, and therefore such dispositions as prayer requires: viz. earnestness and continuance.

He that believeth on me hath everlasting life: If any man come unto me and forsake not all that he hath, if he hate not his father and mother, yea, and his own life, he cannot be my disciple. But if he cannot be his disciple, surely he cannot be justified by him, or receive justification from him. Therefore some degree of dying to our own selfish nature, which is implied by hating our own life; some degree of that renunciation of the world and worldly tempers, which is implied by forsaking all that we have; some degree of detachment from natural love, must be implied by our hating father and mother, as preparatory to our being capable of being justified by Christ.

Our Lord declares that a man is unfit to go to the altar, if his brother hath aught against him. Now, does the altar call for this degree of holiness, and can it be supposed that Christ does not require it in those that come to him by faith? Is the gift unfit to be offered, unless the brotherly love be first in some degree in the heart; and can we think that faith which is destitute of this love, is the faith that fits us to receive Christ? That such a faith cannot be accepted by Christ so as to obtain justification from him, is plain from our Saviour's own words, if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive you.

A faith, therefore, that has not some degree of this charity in it, cannot receive justification through Jesus Christ; and therefore A TRUE FAITH IS AS WELL TO BE THE FRUIT OF, AS TO PRODUCE THE FRUITS OF GOOD WORKS." [See also note of pp. 106–9.]

Thus, summarily, on the gospel doctrine of Justification, called by some justification by faith, by others justification by works; as to Law, he considered it no otherwise than our Saviour considered it, as implied, according to the analogy of faith, in all his counsels and exhortations. But according to the popular fallacious representations and distortions of this doctrine, (whatever wonderful effects may have thence ensued through the excitement of the imagination of the recipients thereof,) the sayings of Jesus Christ appear to sober thinkers quite a mystification, having no manifest relation to what they have been taught to be the essential to their individual salvation: indeed, in such respect, the terms offered by St. Paul for the kingdom of heaven, are much easier than those of the Lord of life and glory himself! Whereas, when the doctrine of justification is shewn in its true natural aspect, as in the above dissertation, free from all Babylonish mystifications, then the whole of Scripture appears in perfect harmony, the words of Christ retain their plain stringent import, and the reader sees that he must himself co-operate body and soul with God in his salvation, (and not jump into all the privileges of Christ's kingdom 'simply on believing,') in the suppression of the old man with his deeds, that the new man, (which is a pure birth of Christ, or a seed of Christ,) be raised up in its stead; in order to which however, besides all kinds of self-denial exercises, there needs the hunger and desire of the soul to be fixed upon God alone, accompanied by all kinds of devotion and good works that may tend to invigorate that new principle of a divine life: in short, to obtain a qualification for Christ's kingdom, he sees to be just that self-same difficult laborious work, which it is represented by our Lord, despite the plausibilities and taking representations of the short cut to it, of the modern evangelical justification doctrines. This is the sum and substance of the gospel,—the way of the Cross, or death to the old Adam in all his motions of life, and the way of faith, or exercise of all the graciously implanted principles and powers of the new life, until it be raised up to the fulness of the stature of a man in Christ Jesus. Such is the sole drift of the practical instructions of holy writ; and if we had more of this plain, christian common sense, and less of the 'justification by faith' babble, sounded forth from our pulpits, we should have a great deal more genuine faith, and devotion, and justifying good works, among evangelical professors, than we have at present.

We have before alluded (on p. 148,) to the accomplished poetic illustrations by Francis Lee, of the spiritualities of the life of faith according to the true evangelical theory; and in a note on p. 88, we intimated an intention of affording an example or two of his talents and piety in that respect. In accordance with which, we now insert the following Dialogue representing the spirit of faith and love, wrestling and prevailing with God for the blessing of the morning, or commencement of the Sabbath kingdom; according to the prayer of the Lord, "Thy kingdom come." The colloquy ing to lessen the Romish error of not suffering marriage at all in her clergy? Ask why even the most worthy and pious amongst the clergy of the established church are afraid to assert the all-sufficiency of the Divine Light, and the necessity of seeking wholly and solely to the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit within us, it is because the Quakers, who have broken off from the church, have made this doctrine their corner-stone.

If we loved truth as such; if we sought it for its own sake; if we loved our neighbour as ourselves; if we desired nothing by our religion but to be acceptable to God; if we equally desired the salvation of all men; if we were afraid of error only because of its hurtful nature to us, and our fellow-churches, then nothing of this spirit could have any place in us.

There is therefore a catholic spirit, a communion of saints in the love of God and all goodness, which no one can learn from that which is called orthodoxy in particular churches, but is only to be had by a total dying to all worldly views, by a pure love of God, and by such an unction from above as delivers the mind from all selfishness, and makes it love truth and goodness with an

may be taken either in the sense of the church, (when the gospel shall be preached in all nations,) unitedly pleading for the speedy "coming of the Lord," to glorify his bride the church, and take possession of his kingdom; or as figurative of a courageous faithful theosophist, and child of God, praying and wrestling with indomitable (Jacob-like) perseverance, for the top-stone of salvation to be put on the Lord's temple; or as representing a rightly instructed penitent who has long been dying to creatures, and self, and sin, resolving to shoot forth into the fulness of the new birth, into the element of God, and so experience the direct attestation to his divine heirship; which, of course, will only be apprehended by such as have passed through the a, b, c, tracts described pp. 41—44, of this treatise:—

CHURCH.

How long, dear Lord and Bridegroom, dost thou stay,— Torment thy eager Lover with delay?
And still put off, so oft so solemn vow'd,
Our blessed nuptial consummation day?
Inthron'd in thy triumphant rest and bliss,
The glories and the joys of paradise;
Can those high regions blest ingross thee so,
Thou should'st forgetful or unmindful grow,
Of thy poor suffering bleeding spouse below?
Thyself, dear Lord, so happy and so great,
How can'st thou love, and not communicate?

CHRIST.

I had my suffering time, and so must you:
Hold out, my faithful spouse, and blessing shall ensue.

CHURCH.

Long have I suffer'd, Lord, with tedious moan;
Thus, like a mourning widow, left alone;
Thou so far off, imbosom'd in thy Father's throne.
True, I must thankfully acknowledge here
Thy Holy Spirit's consolations dear:
But that in th' wilderness with me too driven;
In its triumphant powers too flown to heaven:
Whilst Antichrist usurps thy hallow'd seat,
And his impostures vile thy oracles defeat.
'Tis not so much my suffering makes me moan,
As on the ground to see thy altars thrown,
And thy own Spirit hear within me groan.
Tho' yet my sufferings in their zenith be,
The hottest fires and rage o'th' enemy.
Nor is't my pain makes me so eager move,
I know my cross at last my crown must prove:
But 'tis my longing after Him I love.

CHRIST.

Heroic love's not hasty for reward;
But wins the prize by long achievements hard.
And happier thou 'midst bloody war's alarms
While 'tis my will, than circled in my arms.

As for th' usurper vile, the day is nigh,
When at thy footstool he in chains shall lie.

CHURCH.

Gladly I bear my suffering part with thee;
But long my Lord triumphant here to see.
My suffering here is thine; how can thy bride
Endure to see thee daily crucified?
Thy little lambs from thy own life out-sprung, Slaughter'd or torn the bears and wolves among?
Ah! gentle Shepherd, this how canst thou see?
Pity thyself; redress our misery.

CHRIST.

If thou'rt content to bear, much more am I;
'Tis for my flock I daily in them die.
And if in thee I'm made a sacrifice,
What is it but in thee, with thee to rise?

CHURCH.

O, that's the time for which we long and pray,
Christ in his Church's resurrection-day:
This elder saints their distant joys have own'd;
For this thy spouse in ev'ry age has groan'd;
For this triumphant saints in heav'n combine;
For this thy constant intercessions join.
All this by thy own Spirit we plead, we bring;
Ev'n the united hopes, the faith, and prayers,
Thy universal Church's offering:
Thy promises of old, and later known,
Of Sion's restoration, joy, and crown;
The pledge of faith, thy earnest penny lent,
Obliging thee to full accomplishment:
These too we bring, and plead before the throne
Of the eternal, true, and faithful One.
Accept it, condescend; make haste, appear,
O Sion's life, and joy, and blessing dear.

CHRIST.

I hear, accept and bless: tho' yet I know,
Thou my full coming wants, and thinkst me slow;
A thousand times more willing yet than thou.
I stay but for thy total conquest, dear;
Get thou full ready, and I straight appear.

To come with our

equality of affection in every man, whether he be Christian, Jew, or Gentile: He that would obtain this divine and catholic spirit in this disordered, divided state of things, and live in a divided part of the church without partaking of its division, must have these three truths deeply fixed in his mind:—First, that universal Love, which gives the whole strength of the heart to God, and makes us love every man as we love ourselves, is the noblest, the most divine and God-like state of the soul, and is the utmost perfection to which the most perfect religion can raise us; and that no religion does any man any good, but so far as it brings this perfection of love into him. This truth will show us, that true orthodoxy can no where be found, but in a pure disinterested love of God and our neighbour.—Secondly, that in the present divided state of the church, truth itself is divided and torn asunder; and that therefore he can be the only true catholic, who has more of truth, and less of error, than is hedged in by any divided part. This truth will enable us to live in a divided part, unhurt by its division, and keep us in a true liberty and fitness to be edified and assisted by all the good that we hear or see in any other part of the church.

CHURCH.

What readiness can more effectual move?
What is the wedding garment, Lord, but love?

Or what can stronger and more conquerant prove?

See, at thy feet a heart inflam'd I lay;
O haste my bridegroom dear, and come away.
As for my bondage and captivity,
'Tis thou, my ~~saviour~~, thou must set me free.
Now in thy strength, great conqueror, advance;
O save thy love, seize thy inheritance.

CHRIST.

Thy love I own, and ready am to save;
Yet to thy suit still some exception have.
Some weaknesses remaining yet I see,
Defective of the perfect purity.

CHURCH.

But such defects I've learned to lay on thee,
Who bears the weight of my infirmity.
And surely nature's lapse to countermand,
Must be the work of thy Almighty hand.
And thou hast taught me to believe and pray,
Thou would'st thyself at last the top-stone lay;
And crown the work with thy own act of grace,
And take thyself the glory and the praise.
What imperfections then in me remain,
From thy own merits supply, and add the golden grain.

Come then, my love, what yet retards thy way?

Love grown mature, requires the nuptial day:
Love's grown inflam'd, and can no longer stay,

It dies without thee now, thou must, my spouse,

Yea, haste thou must away.

CHRIST.

Well art thou taught heav'n's kingdom to assail;
Well dost thou plead, and shalt at last prevail.

CHURCH.

Ah! Lord, and dost thou still my suit defer?
No, no; love now resolves to persevere.

Here at thy feet I lie, and will not part,

Till thou, who wounded hast so deep my heart,

Fulfil my wishes dear, and ease my smart.

*Sion's remembrancers no rest shall give,

Nor let thee now in glories quiet live;

Till thou make her on earth thy glorious re- presentative.

* Isaiah lxii. 6, 7.

CHRIST.

Well, let me go, my love, I'll all redress.

CHURCH.

I will not let thee go until thou bless,
And in thy very throne of love caress.

CHRIST.

Why art thou so impatient grown? Be still;
The creature it becomes to wait my will.
Wilt thou by violence force heav'n's sacred gate?
Cease this thy suit, so bold, and so importunate.

CHURCH.

Ah! kill me not with a rebuke, my Lord;
I die with one unkind or angry word:
With humblest awe I give my God his due;
But as his lover I am bold to sue.
The holy violence of faith and love;
Thou canst not disallow, heaven must approve.
Then pardon me, my Lord, if thy rebuke,
But as a love repulse, I overlook;
And tell thee now, my love grown strong as death,
Can no repulses, no denials brook:
Love cannot be too zealous or too great,
That's but faint love that's not importunate.

CHRIST.

Go then, and in thy heart prepare me room,
I'm at the door, behold I quickly come.

CHURCH.

'Tis long thou'st promis'd, Lord, and I believe thee.

Now, now, perform: Ah! now, now, now, receive me.

CHRIST.

Methinks thou shouldst delight to suffer on,
And fight for me, my noble Amazon,
While still my greatest foes are in the field;
Thou, taught so well my flaming sword to wield,
And arm'd, so sure, with faith's victorious shield.

Where all thou conquers, still becomes thy own:

I, more oblig'd thy suffering labours own,
And late endow thee with a larger crown.

CHURCH.

Lord, by thy strength, my wars are made my play;
But war is not the end, 'tis but the way;

And thus uniting in heart and spirit with all that is holy and good in all churches, we enter into the true communion of saints, and become real members of the holy catholic church, though we are confined to the outward worship of only one particular part of it. It is thus, that the angels, as ministering spirits, assist, join, unite, and co-operate with every thing that is holy and good, in every division of mankind.—Thirdly, he must always have in mind this great truth, that it is the glory of the Divine Justice to have no respect of parties or persons, but to stand equally disposed to that which is right and wrong, as well in the Jew as in the Gentile. He therefore that would like as God likes, and condemn as God condemns, must have neither the eyes of the papist nor the protestant; he must like no truth the less because Ignatius Loyola, or John Bunyan, were very zealous for it; nor have the less aversion to any error, because a Doctor Trap, or George Fox, had brought it forth. Now if this universal love, and impartial justice, is the spirit which will judge the world at the last day, how can this spirit be too soon or too much in us; or what can do us more hurt than that which is an hindrance of it?—When

And must, like David's, find its rest and crown

In Schelom's peaceful love-triumphant day.

I would, conjoin'd with my great Solomon,

Thy conquests more successful carry on;

At once, like thee, possess heav'n's peaceful charms,

And smite the foe through thy triumphant arms.

Short of the fairest lot, how can I fall,

Thus aiming at the prize-original?

When once I've thee obtain'd, atonce I've all,
Come then, my loving spouse, no longer grieve me.

Now, now, perform; ah, now, now, now, receive me.

CHRIST.

But know'st thou not there is a stated hour

For thy investment with thy nuptial dower,

And that the seasons all are in the Father's power?

How think'st thou, my ambitious love, to climb
Into my throne before th' appointed time?

CHURCH.

Thou always ready art, my Lord, I know,

God's time is ever, an eternal now:

In nature's sphere only determinate

Nature's and our subservient act to take.

For this his now he into time unfolds,

And gradually his reluctant creature moulds.

His will unbounded still this not restrains;

But tho' he give the nature-course her range,

'Tis his prerogative the times to change.

While we still watch, prepare, depend, expect,

Till he but give the word; then no defect

Can stop; nor shall in me be found neglect.

Thy day of power shall make our wheels run glib,

Born in the willing chariots of Aminadib.

And thou thyself hast taught us, Lord, to pray

For th' hast'ning of thy powerful kingdom's day.

Here too, thy act of grace we hope to see;

And that th' afflictive time shall shorten'd be

Our time here crown'd with thy eternity.

What hinders, then, but that thou straight relieve me?

Come, come, my loving spouse, no longer grieve me:

Now, now, perform; ah, now, now, now, receive me.

CHRIST.

I have a part, a spark of God in thee;

Know then, thou canst not wholly be set free,

Till, disentangled from all creature-act,
Self-moving, that regains its native power

In thee, grown up to full maturity.

When that can take, I ready am to give.

'Tis I must grant, and I in thee receive.

Thus the free gift and grace is mine alone;

The holy violence and act requir'd

In thee, but as with me in union.

Come then, my spouse, I here thee offer make:

Behold thy heavenly crown, and try if thou canst take.

CHURCH.

Oh massy weight of glory! Who can bear it?

Flesh trembles, Lord, and frail mortality

Dares not come near it.

CHRIST.

Nay, shrink not now, when I am free to give

What thou hast press'd so eager to receive.

CHURCH.

Frail nature sinks, too feeble here and cold,

But see thy own magnanimous Spirit bold

In me advances; offers to take hold

Of the bright, flaming, terrible, christaline gold.

Ah! What defect? Can that too feeble be?

CHRIST.

Only as stopt and manacled by thee,

From his full act in thy full liberty:

His liberty restrain'd thou bind'st thy own;

For thy free act is found in His alone.

Nice is the point, thou see'st, thy mean to find;

Not run before him to preclude or bind,

Not stand as equal, nor yet lag behind;

But under, after him to follow free,

Hold fast to th' movement of the Deity,

In nature's full conform and correspondent harmony.

CHURCH.

Pity, dear Lord, help my infirmity.

Hold thou thy own, and keep me in my place:

My weakness own'd, I still rely on grace.

CHRIST.

The glorious crown and sceptre you desire

Lie strong inclos'd in th' principle of fire;

The orb of the eternal Father's might:

Which, when broke thro', conveys dominion-right.

To this belongs the two-leav'd folding door,

The adamantine gate of the Almighty Power.

Whichway then wilt thou take? How enter that?

CHURCH.

Thou, Lord, thou'rt the way, the door, the gate.

I was a young scholar of the University, I heard a great religionist say in my father's house, that if he could believe the late King of France to be in heaven, he could not tell how to wish to go thither himself. This was exceedingly shocking to all that heard it : Yet something of this kind of temper must be supposed to be more or less in those, who have, as a point of orthodoxy, worked themselves up into a hearty contempt and hatred of those that are divided from them. He that has been all his life long used to look with great abhorrence upon those whom he has called superstitious bigots, dreaming visionaries, false saints, canting enthusiasts, etc., must naturally expect they will be treated by God as they have been by him; and if he had the keys of the kingdom of heaven, such people would find it hard to get a place in it. But it stands us greatly in hand to get rid of this temper before we die; for if nothing but impartial universal perfect Love can enter into the kingdom of God, what can be more necessary for us, than to be full of this love before we die?

* * *

The more we believe, or know of the corruptions and hindrances of true piety

CHRIST.

True, thou thro' me must enter; but which part?

CHURCH.

If love's the crown, its gate's thy flaming heart.

CHRIST.

What key must open it?

CHURCH.

Love's flaming dart.

CHRIST.

Love, in its intermediate degrees,
May enter here; but not the crown to seize;
That love that hopes to win its virgin dower,
Must have its full proportion too of power.
Love answering love in equal measure gives,
To its belov'd imparts as it receives.
Imperfect love then, enters but in part;
But perfect love possesses my whole heart.
There too the central fiery power you see;
This touch'd by equal power will open free,
In equal movement of true sympathy,
Like mutual echoing concordant strings
In nature's harmony.

Know then that the victorious virgin love,
With its male-power, must here consorted
move:

The will on God's re-engrafted, must dispense

Faith's pow'rful, divine, magic influence,

That turns the engine of omnipotence.

This only can unlock the seven-sealed door,

And suffering love vest with triumphant power.

Come, then, my spouse, take up faith's conquering bow,

Thy preparation-strength for full dominion show.

Aim at the central glory in my heart,

And now shoot home faith's love-tipp'd seven-fold dart.

Six must in single shaft be shot alone,

The seventh at last must all comprise in one.

Watch well the gulph between, the region dark,

Be quick, and strong, and with an eagle eye

Pursue the golden mark.

To animate thee, view, review thy crown.

Believe, my royal spouse, believe it down,

And then for ever wear it as thy own.

CHURCH.

I essay, Lord; heav'nly wisdom guide my eye;

And power almighty my defect supply.

See my first arrow, Lord, inscrib'd by thee,
Believe through love in deep humility.

This to the flaming white is swiftly gone.

The second too, successful shot, inscrib'd

Believe through love in resignation.

My third's the act of trust in God alone.

CHRIST.

Thy third comes near, but yet falls short, I see;

Thou'st clogg'd it with too much activity:

By grace, with my own hand, I reach it on.

Proceed,—now thy fourth: With what inscription?

CHURCH.

Thanks, my dear Lord; the fourth's the hungry fire,

Believe in love, and draw with strong desire;

Short of thy heart sure this can never stay;

See, it has forc'd its unimpeded way.

The fifth bears motto, triumph on the cross,

And in the kingdom's travail-pangs rejoice.

The sixth the great rendition-act of praise;

And these, I fear, want much peculiar grace.

CHRIST.

Something defective, dearest, these too come:

But condescending love shall take them home.

Now for the last all-conquering shaft prepare:

Now summon all thy pow'rs, and all thy graces rear.

Here to a full circle thou must draw thy bow;

It must not one contracting angle know.

Here thou at once, in adoration deep,

Must bow; in total resignation keep;

Depend on God, from ev'ry creature free;

Rend, and rejoice, with shout of victory:

From whence thou all receiv'st, must give all back,

In thy divine reflex rendition-act;

Must draw with irresistible desire,

And then Believe, and flame godlike through each,

In perfect Love's all-comprehensive fire.

Come now, my spouse, these acts in one combin'd,

Will make thy sun in my full glory shine,

And seat thee with me on my throne divine.

CHURCH.

No; thanks to God, my work is done;

The last consummate shaft is Thine alone;

Be thine the conquest, Lord, and thine the

in the church of Rome, the more we should rejoice to hear, that in every age so many eminent spirits, great saints, have appeared in it, whom we should thankfully behold as so many great lights hung out by God, to show the true way to heaven; as so many joyful proofs that Christ is still present in that church, as well as in other churches, and that the gates of hell have not prevailed, or quite overcome it. Who that has the least spark of heaven in his soul, can help thinking and rejoicing in this manner at the appearance of a St. Bernard, a Teresa, a Francis de Sales, etc., in that church? Who can help praising God, that her invented devotions, superstitious use of images, invocation of saints, etc., have not so suppressed any of the graces and virtues of an evangelical perfection of life, but that amongst Cardinals, Jesuits, Priests, Friars, Monks, and Nuns, numbers have been found, who seemed to live for no other end, but to give glory to God and edification to men, and whose writings have everything in them, that can guide the soul out of the corruption of this life into the highest union with God. And he who through a partial orthodoxy is diverted from feeding in these green pastures of life, whose just abhorrence of Jesuitical craft and worldly policy, keeps him from knowing and reading the works of an Alvares du Pas, a Rodrigues, a Du Pont, a Guil-

Here void of act I stand, and still to see Thy great salvation.

What thou'st prepar'd for coronation-act,
In me do thou for due subservience take,
And on my passive powers and will resign'd
Thy own impression make.
CHRIST.

Come then, my conquering Love, my arm in thee
Shall stretch the mighty bow to full degree,
And thy great arrow too successful be.
Come join with me: 'O may my Father give,
And all my suffering spouse's ills retrieve.
Father, I thank thee: thou always hear'st me.
The kingdom of thy power on earth be known:
Thy will on earth as 'tis in heaven be done:
Thine is the power, the glory, and the crown.'

CHURCH.

O wonder! blessing! O amazing act!
'Tis done: I see the fiery portal back
Unfold, and inward roll its mighty valves.
The white, the central gold, the flame of love,
Dilates serene, triumphant, infinite;
Touch'd and transpierc'd by thy all-powerful shaft,
And answers in love-light'ning glances quick,
Darting ten thousand thousand arrows back;
That play as in thy well-pleas'd Father's smile.
From the love-boiling furnace, ocean, gulph,
Unmeasurable, flow the Godhead streams;
Sparkling with sapphirs, diamonds, rubies bright,
Varying the one insufferable light.
I see God's virgin-Wisdom fair descend;
Angels, archangels, saints, with shouts of joy,
Her progress back again to earth attend:
Her right-hand sceptre, immortality;
Her left, dominion, riches, honours, peace,
And earth-triumphant glory.
The eternal Father gives his blessing free,
While the echoing spheres resound in harmony.

For a special actual example of the spirit of faith, (that is, of earnest, persevering, believing prayer, founded upon a due preliminary course of self-denial,) represented in the above colloquy, though not expressed in scientific terms, but according to the conventional views of the evangelical theory; and which is at the same time a remarkable illustration of the purity and power of the simple Bible Christianity of these last days, according to the true Methodist spirit, alluded to at the head of p. 126, and of p. 127,—we would direct the reader to the "Life and Experience of Hester Ann Rogers," 2 vols. 12mo., Mason. And we say further, that it will be difficult for the Church of Christ, among her array of saints, canonized or otherwise, to point out a finer specimen of a holy practical useful Christian woman than was this individual, who exchanged mortality for glory, at the early age of thirty-nine years.

Go forth, my Son, seize thy inheritance;
And thou his Bride, and mine, thy joys commence;

This token given—henceforth let heaven and earth,
Triumphant, and church militant be one,
In my bless'd kingdom's power, and love's communion.

Ah see, my gracious Lord, what I have here:
'Tis heaven's broad seal, th' anointing Spirit dear;
Witness o' th' time, and voucher of my plea;
My charter, jointure, dower, commission,
To take thee now for ever as my own,
Inheretrix of thy eternal throne,
In sacred nuptial tie, and heavenly love's
Full and eternal consummation.

Come now, my Royal Love, thou must relieve me, Long promis'd now, thou canst no more be-reave me;
Ah now perform; now, now, now, now, receive me.

CHRIST.

Well hast thou wrestled, and at last prevail'd,
My love, my glorious Queen, henceforth be free;
Begin the song, proclaim the Jubilee:
Enter, possess, triumph, and reign with me.
Enjoy, my suffering Spouse and Sister blest,
Thy glorious love-consummate grand-Sabbatick rest.

CHURCH.

Amen, hosanna; let it be;
Be mine the joy; be Thine the glory.

CHRIST.

Amen. So let it be.

lore, a Pere Surin, and such like Jesuits, has a greater loss than he can easily imagine. And if any clergyman can read the life of Bartholomeus a Martyribis, a Spanish archbishop, who sat with great influence at the very Council of Trent, without being edified by it, and desiring to read it again and again, I know not why he should like the lives of the best of the apostolical fathers: And if any Protestant bishop should read the Stimulus Pastorum wrote by this popish prelate, he must be forced to confess it to be a book that would have done honour to the best archbishop, that the Reformation has to boast of. O my God! how shall I unlock this mystery of things: in the land of darkness, overrun with superstition, where Divine Worship seems to be all show and ceremony,—there both amongst priests and people, thou hast those who are fired with the pure love of Thee, who renounce everything for Thee, who are devoted wholly and solely to Thee, who think of nothing, write of nothing, desire nothing, but the honour, and praise, and adoration that is due to Thee, and who call all the world to the maxims of the gospel, the holiness and perfection of the life of Christ: But in the regions where light is sprung up, whence superstition is fled, where all that is outward in religion seems to be pruned, dressed, and put in its true order,—there a cleansed shell, a whited sepulchre, seems too generally to cover a dead Christianity!

The error of all errors, and that which makes the blackest charge against the Romish church, is persecution, a religious sword drawn against the liberty and freedom of serving God according to our best light, that is, against our worshipping the Father in spirit and in truth: this is the great whore, the beast, the dragon, the antichrist. Now, though this is the frightful monster of that church, yet, even here, who, except it be the church of England, can throw the first stone at her? Where must we look for a church that has so renounced this persecuting beast, as they have renounced the use of incense, the sprinklings of holy water, or the extreme unction of dying persons? What part of the Reformation abroad has not practised and defended persecution? What sect of Dissenters at home have not, in their day of power, dreadfully condemned toleration?

When it shall please God to dispose the hearts of all princes in the Christian world entirely to destroy this antichristian beast, and leave all their subjects in that religious freedom which they have from God; then the light of the Gospel, the benefit of its faith, the power of its ministers, the usefulness of its rites, the benediction of its sacraments will have a proper time and place to show themselves; and that religion which has the most of a divine power in it, whose offices and services do most good to the heart, whose ministers are most of all devoted to God, and have the most proof of the power and presence of Christ with them, [See ‘Sigston’s Memoir of Bramwell.’] will become, as it ought to be, the most universal; and by this destruction of the beast, nothing but the errors, delusions, corruptions and fictions of every religion, will be left in a helpless state. [A prophetic intimation of the effects that should ensue from the action and reaction of the spirit of Methodism.] * * *

Had the Doctor been more conversant in the writings of a set of men called Mystical Divines, than he appears to have been, he had been better able to have charged me with humble plagiarism than he is at present, and might have done more service to what he calls the noble science of Theology, than by all that light which he has got from his poets, which he acknowledges to have ‘somewhat of wantonness in them.’ Of these Mystical Divines, ANNOUNCEMENT.—Since the publication of the Essay, “The Present, Past, and Future,—1847,” referred to in the Note of p. 28, at the end of which Essay was appended a Prospectus relative to a new edition of Behmen’s works, containing a Note to the purport of the note on p. 45 of the present Treatise; and also since the Note on the latter mentioned page was written, it has been discovered that the incomplete 4 vol. edition of Behmen, therein referred to, was printed at the sole expense of Mrs. Hutcheson, and that Miss Gibbon had not any pecuniary interference in it.—A.D. 1848.

I thank God, I have been a diligent reader, through all ages of the church, from the apostolical Dionysius, the Areopagite, down to the great Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray, the illuminated Guyon, and M. Bertot. Had the Doctor read St. Cassian, a recorder of the lives, spirit, and doctrine of the holy Fathers of the deserts, as often as he had read the story of Æneas and Dido, he had been less astonished at many things in my writings. But I apprehend the Doctor to be as great a stranger to the writers of this kind, with which every age of the church has been blessed, and to know no more of the divine Rusbrochius, Thaulerus, Suso, Harphius, Johannes a Cruce, etc., than he does of J. B. For had he known anything of them, he had known that I am as chargeable with the sentiments of all of them, as with those of J. B. For though I never wrote upon any subject till I could call it my own, till I was so fully possessed of the truth of it, that I could sufficiently prove it in my own way, without borrowed arguments; yet doctrines of religion I have none, but what the scriptures and the first-rate saints of the church are my vouchers for.

Writers, like those I have mentioned, there ~~having~~ been in all ages of the church, but as they served not the ends of popular learning, as they helped no people to figure and preferment in the world, and were useless to scholastic controversial writers, so they dropt out of public use, and were only known, or rather unknown, under the name of Mystical Writers, till at last some people have hardly heard of that very name. Though if a man were to be told what is meant by a Mystical Divine, he must be told of something as heavenly as great, as desirable, as if he were told what is meant by a living member of the mystical body of Christ. For they were thus called, for no other reason, than as Moses, and the prophets, and the saints of the Old Testament may be called the spiritual Israel, or the true mystical Jews.—These writers began their office of teaching, as John the Baptist did, [N.B.] after they had passed through every kind of mortification and self-denial, every kind of trial and purification, both inward and outward. They were deeply learned in all the mysteries of the kingdom of God, not through the use of commentaries, or lexicons, or meditating upon hearsay-divinity critics, but because they had passed from death unto life. They highly reverence and excellently direct the true use of everything that is outward in religion, but like the Psalmist's king's daughter, they are all glorious within: They are truly sons of thunder, and sons of consolation; they break open the whited sepulchres; they awaken the heart, and show it its filth and rottenness of death, but they leave it not, till the kingdom of heaven is raised up within it. If a man have no desire but to be of the spirit of the gospel, to obtain all that renovation of life and spirit which alone can make him to be in Christ a new creature, it is a great unhappiness to him to be unacquainted with these writers, or to pass a day without reading something of what they have written. For though the Scriptures are an inexhaustible source of spiritual instruction, leading the heart to the deepest knowledge of all the mysteries of the inward new life in God, with the greatest plainness and openness of expression, yet a worldly spirit, the schools, criticism, sectarian interpretation, and controversy, have so dried up and distorted everything into an outward letter, and a peculiar sense, that much of their spirit is lost, till these holy Writers, who interpret them by the same spirit which wrote them, guide us to the true understanding of them: for in these writers, the Spirit of God speaks a second time, and everything that can awaken, convert, instruct, and inflame the heart with the love of God, and all holiness and purity of life, is to be found in the most irresistible degree of conviction. You will, perhaps say, do I then call all the world to these spiritual books? No, by no means. But I call all those, whom our Saviour called to himself in these words: COME UNTO UNTO ME ALL YE THAT LABOUR, AND ARE HEAVY LADEN, AND I WILL REFRESH YOU."

[POSTSCRIPT.

POSTSCRIPT.

We have already, in the previous pages, alluded to the 'Philadelphia Society, and to the correspondence which took place between the celebrated 'Mr. Henry Dodwell,' and Francis Lee, (Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford,) by reason of the latter's connection with that society, and his reputed secession from the communion of the established church. As Lee was not only an enlightened practical Christian, but profoundly versed in the Jewish, Philosophic, and Christian Mystic science of all ages, which he brought to bear in that controversy, in defence of Mrs. Lead's pretensions and writings, and of his own conduct in relation to the Philadelphia Society,——a society, by the way, which might in a sense be considered a prelude to, or budding of that universal evangelical spirit which broke forth in the next generation, as referred to in the Note of p. 176; and as the subjects of that controversy belong to the considerations of the present treatise, particularly as exhibiting the character of the spiritual theology and transcendental science of this country at the close of the seventeenth century; it may not be inappropriate to insert the most interesting portions of that correspondence, as a sequel or Appendix to the present Section; which we now propose to do.

The controversy was begun by Dodwell, (who, as the world knows, was not himself orthodox in certain points of Christian doctrine,) in a long and learned discourse, (addressed to Lee in the most respectful and affectionate remonstrant terms,) in support of ecclesiastical rights, proving the necessity of adhering to the visible communion of the Church, and to a strict dependence on the lawfully constituted governors of it. It began as follows:—

"Shottisbrook, near Maidenhead, in Berkshire. Oct. 12th, 1697.—Worthy Sir,—I was at once both troubled and surprised to hear, that so good and so accomplished a person as you are, should be engaged in a new division from that church, for whose principles you had so generously suffered. And I hope you will excuse me, if the love of our late common excellent cause, as well as of a common brother and a common assertor of it, encourage me to hope, that so new a change has not altogether alienated you from hearing an affectionate expostulation concerning it. The rather so, because I understand that it is a pretence of loving us and all divided from us, better than we can by principles love one another, that has induced you to a mean opinion of the terms on which we are divided.

You, who know what it is to reason accurately, I hope, will not venture your soul on luscious fancies or warm unaccountable affections, which would be more excusable in a person of meaner education. You know, the same Scriptures which require that we should not despise prophecies, do also warn us of false prophets, and of trying the spirits, whether they be from God. You may also be pleased to remember, that one χρησις for trying them is, their keeping to one, and that the true communion, and observing their duties to their superiors, in the station wherein God had placed them as judges of the spirits. You see the disorders of pretenders to the Spirit, and that truly too, even in the Apostolic times, when gifted women presumed to exercise their gifts in assemblies of men; you see how the Apostle restrains them from it. When even gifts designed for the public assemblies were used either unedifyingly or disorderly, you may be pleased to remember how the Apostle curbs them even there. * * * [and so forth, at great length, to the conclusion, thus,] * * * Enthusiasm may be very pleasing and endearing for a time; but though we have many instances of it in history, I never remember it to have lasted above a generation. Fancy doth as naturally decay when it comes to the utmost height, as it improves till it reach the height: especially such as yours is, which wants the signs of the prophets, the external credentials of miracles. It is only the rational obligation of all to depend on the governors of one communion, that has hitherto preserved a Christian church, and may still perpetuate it, if men would be true to the principles of that rational obligation. For God's sake rob not the Church of this security in your trial of new experiments. For your own soul's sake, venture it not in such ways, as take you off from reasoning. Return to your deserted brethren, and contribute not to the further divisions and ruin of that small number, to which we are reduced, that I may again be able to justify by principles, the subscribing myself—Your most affectionate brother, Henry Dodwell.

To the above letter Lee wrote a very explicit reply, thus:—

Dec. 4th, 1697.—Most dear and worthy Sir,—I esteem myself exceedingly obliged to you both for the kindness and severity of your letter: and do heartily pray that in the day of recompense, this your most generous and Christian intention towards me in special, and towards the church of Christ in general, may be had in remembrance before God, angels, and men. For I am not able to thank you sufficiently myself, but am confident this labour of love in you shall not lose its reward.

Perhaps also it may not miss of its effect, if not the same which you or I understand; yet that which the good Spirit of God has designed thereby: which I am the more inclined to believe, because I have had a most pressing desire ever since my return into England, to discourse with you freely about these very matters, which gave occasion to your expostulatory Letter. I had intended to have opened to you in all naked simplicity, the process wherein I have been led, and to lay before you at the same time the ground upon which both I, and several others, some in secret, others more publicly, have been carried out beyond the present ordinary line. Wherefore I greatly rejoice, that the good Providence of God has at last opened a way for such a mutual communication betwixt us, as may I hope, be for the glory of God, the edification of his church, the fixing of truth, the detection of the sundry mazes of vain enthusiasm, and the vindication of the true spirit of prophecy. For whatever you may think, I have not yet made one adventure in such ways, as to take me off from reasoning, but am as ready to hear what is reason, in its due subordination, as ever I was in my life. So I beseech you for God's sake, and for the truth's sake, not to prejudge the cause from popular reports, common surmisings, or certain historical applications, which last may in part agree, and in part disagree, sometimes in the circumstances, and oft-times in the very ground itself.

Sir, I am not so far from you as you do think. For I will readily grant to you what you desire in the following particulars. First, I own that the danger is great to be ensnared by false prophets, and that therefore the spirits are to be tried, whether they be from God. (2.) Next I own your difference betwixt the spirit of prophecy, and the spirit of enthusiasm as commonly so called. (3.) I confess that in the former there is no violence put upon the human soul, but that it is left to act freely, and correspondently to its natural powers. However I conceive there may be in some (besides the afflatus common to all the prophets in one degree or other,) even a sort of Divine impetus or inebriation with the Spirit, wherein the soul, having before freely and voluntarily surrendered itself to God, is sweetly ravished, and brought into a full and perfect submission to the πνευμα γρηγορικον, which I suppose to have been a superior governing principle in this Royal Prophet, that did gently subdue all inferior motions arising from the rational or sensitive part. Yet this may not only be resisted, but even quenched in the soul, upon which it falls, and consequently the soul, as you assert, is here left free to the disposal of its own will. (4.) I also own, that as there is a manifold subordination of spirits, and great diversity of gifts, and likewise of degrees in the same gifts; so in order to a due regulation hereof, there was originally instituted certain judges of the spirits, who should be themselves more eminently endowed with one of the two superior orders of gifts, to be appropriated to the several classes of governors in the church mentioned by St. Paul, Eph. iv. 11, or at least with these of the third order there specified. And to these as to their proper judges, all inferior prophets and spiritual persons were obliged to submit themselves to be tried. To this seems to agree the institution of the colleges of the prophets, under the presidency of the father or head prophets; and for no other end but this, was afterwards dispensed in the Christian church, the gift of Discretio Spirituum, so very needful to all those that should have the power of laying on of hands. (5.) Further I grant, that there was an obligation upon every baptised believer, in order to a communication of influences from Christ, of what nature soever they be, strictly to adhere to a visible union and communion with the catholic body of the church; and to subordinate dependence on the head governors, and fathers of it, who had received the Holy Ghost, and power therewith to convey the same to others. And in pursuance of this obligation, I never have been, neither am I, against the use of visible mediums, for the regular participation of the gifts and graces of God, and for the keeping up of the fellowship of the saints: which God forbid that I should ever violate. (6.) Lastly I will grant to you all that you have written, if the case were truly such as you have apprehended it to be: and will lay my hand upon my mouth, and acknowledge that I have opened a way for all heresies and schisms and enthusiasms in taking away the power of the church, which Christ and his apostles have left for restraining them.

Now in return of these concessions, which I most readily grant, I shall only desire this one of you, (viz.) that there is a great difference betwixt the visible state of the Church at this day, and the visible state of it in its best and purest ages. Which if it be allowed, then will not inferences drawn from the discipline of the church then (though in itself truly excellent), any more affect us (who live in a state of the church that is on so many accounts inferior to it), than inferences drawn from the constitution of the English government, and from the laws and customs thereof under King Alfred, would affect us,* (after so many and great revolutions,) under the present state of our political affairs. For though indeed the discipline of the primitive Church be generally acknowledged for the standard of ecclesiastical government even at this day, and the constitution of the Saxon monarchy be not acknowledged, as to the civil state of this land, yet it must be confessed, that there has been such a declension both from the one and the other, as would (according to common usage), sufficiently prescribe against several original or primitive customs in that, as well as in this, and against several laws in both not of perpetual obligation. And I dare Sir, appeal even to your own self, whether there be not some allowances to be made according to the exigencies of time and place. Whether there be not some exceptions to general and ordinary rules? Whether the law of Moses in more than one particular, was not sometimes dispensable to the whole body of the people; and at all times to the prophets? Whether the discipline of the Christian church can be proved to be more indispensable? That it is ordinarily binding I shall not dispute, yea that it may be indispensable, so long as it retains its integrity, and is practicable, I can readily grant, without hurting in the least that cause in which I have been engaged not on a sudden, but after long deliberation: which every one that shall take the pains to consider, must be convinced, that it is not an ordinary cause. And if the foundation of it should happen to be true, as to the pretensions which are made, as it is both true and extraordinary, it may not improbably legitimate some extraordinary methods, and free those that shall act in pursuance of this extraordinary call, from the guilt of Schism: your Treatise upon which I have now read, which has occasioned the deferring my answer to your letter so long, with some other emergent occasions. For I could not be contented to read some parcels of it, to which you might seem more immediately to refer me; but must take your own advice given in your preface to read the whole, that so from the strict connection of all the parts one with another, I might the better understand the full extent of your hypothesis; which I do not all repent of, having found it well worthy of pains, and do therefore thank you, for the very many considerable things, which I have there met with. But withal, Sir, I leave you to judge, whether one of an overheated imagination (as I am supposed to be), could have the patience to read over a book both of that bulk, and of that close argumentation.

And after all, I cannot but remain still of my former judgment, that there have been, and are to be, some extraordinary steps of Divine Providence, which may supersede ordinary rules and general customs: which is all that I do pretend. For I must freely own that rules and customs of general obligation, ought not to be superseded, but for great and wise ends, and neither that but by an authority which is sufficient to dispense with the same in particular cases; which particular emergencies of Providence, if very great and extraordinary, no rule or custom can be supposed antecedently to bind. There are very few laws, I believe, of any country, and even of those that are counted fundamental, which are not capable of some restrictions and limitations for the sake of some extraordinary good to that country, especially if they do not tend to the subversion of the constitution itself, but do rather serve to establish it, and promote all the ends designed by it, and evidently serve all the interests of it, better than could have been done without such a restriction or limitation.

In all human establishments this is generally maintained. But, supposing that the government of the Church should be Theocratical, as it was with the Jews, and also with the Christians of the most early and undoubtedly purest ages, it seems to me at present not very unreasonable, that there should be, beside certain universal laws and constitutions, some particular mandates likewise, or private instructions given to some, that may have either a public or secret commission, in order to a special work. Whether it be so now, and whether my own private case may come under this, I am willing even to submit to so strict an assessor of the ecclesiastical rights as yourself, when you shall be more exactly informed in the circumstances whereupon it depends. I am very sensible that neither ordinary nor extraordinary illumination can be of any use or authority to others, but so far as they who enjoy it, are able to give either ordinary or extraordinary proof of the same. But yet the extraordinary, even without it, may be of use and authority to themselves, and the ordinary both to themselves and others. And also the extraordinary may possibly be useful and of authority to others, without any extraordinary credentials externally promulgated, or exhibited, if it shall please the Holy Ghost to ratify the same after a more internal and secret manner upon their minds: without which, you know, even the greatest outward miracles, will not be sufficient. Wherefore though I cannot expect to be believed by few at present, or so long as nothing extraordinary shall outwardly appear, yet even now I do not despair of meeting with belief in several persons eminent for their wisdom and sobriety, through this inward operation of the Spirit; when it shall please God that many (yet) secret circumstances shall be brought to light, and so come by themselves to be nicely canvassed, and impartially looked into: after which, all that you fear concerning me, may vanish to admiration, and very formidable arguments dwindle away as ice before the sun, as they have already in some done. Thus much I shall say at present, that as the sincerity of my heart in this matter, can be only known to God; so no endeavours have been wanting in me, to satisfy myself, how I might truly and faithfully follow his conduct, and neither suffer myself to be imposed on by any, or to impose on others. And even in that which is the most liable to objection, if all manner of declarations both public and private do signify anything, I hope, I may be found not to have contributed to any division in the church of Christ, or to have transgressed the intent of its primitive discipline by you urged. Yea possibly I may be found to have taken that way which only can restore peace, and with it the better part of the discipline of the primitive church. For let me know, I entreat you, Sir, (1.) Whether there be grounds to expect by any other method whatever, the restoration of this very discipline, or of catholic peace? (2.) What was the foundation of government and order in the Apostolical church, especially in that of Jerusalem, and that of Antioch? (3.) If the principles of our Society in England, of the Restists in Germany, and of the Quietists in Italy and France, should be found true fundamentally (though not circumstantially), whether it be another, or the same foundation with what the Apostles did lay? (4.) Whether the Apostles themselves did not write, and act, as if (such as we call) extraordinary powers of the Holy Spirit, were still to abide with the Church to the end? (5.) Whether there be any footsteps to be found throughout the writings of the whole New Testament, whence it can be concluded that Christ did design, or any of his Apostles so much as know of a cessation in the church, either of immediate Divine revelation, or of miracles? (6.) How long was it before revelation and miracles came to cease in the church? (7.) What was the true cause of their cessation? For the vulgar answer to this question is on many accounts unsatisfactory. (8.) Whether this cause may be again removed, and if it can, whether there may not be a return of the same ministration* of the blessed Spirit? (9.) Whether there must not be yet an universal publication of the Gospel before the end of the world? (10.) Whether this publication (if any such there is to be) shall not be attended with the same signs that the first was? [See Bramwell's "Memoir" for the enduring signs of the Spirit.] And (11.) Whether before so great a publication, it will not be fit to suppose certain previous manifestations and intimations for that purpose, chosen of God, which shall not presently be sealed with open miracles [of the Spirit]? If you please to answer me these Queries at your leisure, you will very much oblige one, who esteems it the greatest victory and honour to be overcome by truth, however contrary to his inclination, or disadvantageous to his interest, and hopes even by principles to justify his subscribing himself,—Dear Sir, your most affectionate brother and humble servant, Francis Lee.

The next letter, from Dodwell, is dated Jan. 15th, 1698, and begins thus:—

Dear Sir,—Your kind acceptance of my sincerely meant endeavours for the Church's good and yours, and your resolution to be determined by reason, and the pains you have taken, more than I could have presumed to have requested, however otherwise necessary to your giving a right judgment concerning the matters debated between us, are great encouragements for me to proceed, hoping, that the good God who has given you so commendable a zeal in an age of so general apostacy, will give you also the knowledge by which your zeal must be directed.

* See Law's letter on 'Church Communion,' towards the close of it.

† The providential time for it was not yet. It was reserved for the succeeding age of Law, through the spirit of Methodism; of which the above Spirit is manifestly the budgings, as observed.

To return therefore to my former argument, (which is all that can be managed in the little room allowed in a letter,) methinks you have already granted me so much, that if you had practiced in the Apostles' times, as you do now, your practice would have been censured as injurious to the unity of the Spirit, and therefore schismatical. Your forsaking the assemblies of our lawful Bishops, and your joining in communion with those divided from them upon your Philadelphian principles, must needs have been so interpreted. And no pretensions to the Spirit could then have excused you. For the spirit that led you into separation, would for that very reason have been judged not to have been the Spirit of Christ, as not holding to the head, because different from the spirit of the governors. * * [and so forth, at extreme length, to the conclusion, thus,] * * * This case of Tertullian was afterwards so like yours, that methinks that also would deserve your serious consideration. So very learned, so zealous, so pious a man was notwithstanding, afterwards seduced out of the communion of the Church, and became the head of a schism, or the like account as you are, by his too forward zeal for the prophecies of Montanus and his women prophetesses. Vicentius Serinensis bemoans his fall with great and very fair acknowledgments of his personal accomplishments. I hope, dear Sir, you will rather give your old deserted brethren an occasion of joy and hearty congratulations for your return, than add to our sufferings the melancholy aggravation of losing you. Add to your former self-denials for the testimony of a good conscience, the mortification of submitting to the truth, when it appears against you. Be a glorious example of candour and ingenuity in this age. Gifts and revelations make a great show, but the way of Charity is by the Apostle himself preferred before them. God Almighty qualify you for the rewards of your good meaning and good works, by reducing you to that true communion of his peculiar people, who are alone entitled to his promises of future and eternal rewards. So prays your old brother and fellow labourer, Henry Dodwell.

P.S.—I shall be glad to see your Apology, though I foresee nothing that can hinder you from being concerned in the consequences of these reasonings, if you give yourself the liberty of promiscuous communions, whatever your pretences may be for doing so. * * * I wish you would also be pleased to see, what Bishop Stillingfleet hath written against Mr. Cressy's Sancta Sophia. You will there find, that the Mystical Divinity, which is the foundation of Quietism, was rather derived from the Philosophical religion invented by the later Platonists, and among them admired by the great enemy of the Christian religion, Porphyry, than from any tradition derived from the Apostles. The pretended Areopagite has given it great authority with those, who did not know that he was an impostor; and it seems to be the language of those Platonists, that was imitated by that impostor. They seem to understand the mystical unity of a coalescence with God and Christ, which certainly is against the doctrine of Christ. Those expressions of Theologia Germanica, a book of that kind, seem to look that way, where the author speaks of renouncing not only meity, but also egoity, and ipseity. You will understand what I say, if you have seen the elegant translation of that author by Castellio."

The reply to the above letter having been deferred, Dodwell addressed to Lee a further communication, which, as it may be supposed to represent the natural sentiments of scholastic theology and sober scripture piety of all times upon the subjects in question, we give at length, with the categorical reply of Dr. Lee, and some subsequent letters. Dodwell's additional communication proceeds thus:—

Dear Sir,—I never received any answer to my second Letter, relating to your new unhappy schism from your old brethren. Since my writing that I have been at Oxford, and seen many books of your mother-in-law, [Mrs. Lead,] who is the only person of your sect that has her prophecies published, that I know of. And her being so, I look on as the best security you have against schisms among yourselves, whilst you do so manifestly favour enthusiastical pretences for withdrawing your dependence on your lawful ecclesiastical superiors. So long this security may hold, and no longer, than whilst the rest of you are more modest, and dare not rival your own pretended revelations with hers. But since I have looked into what has been published in her name, I have a worse opinion of your cause than formerly. I find her plainly to decry the trial of her cause by reasoning. This alone would make a wise man suspicious, that her cause was not thought defensible by that way of decision, and that they who manage her cause were conscious that it is not that way defensible. Yea, even you yourself interpose such cautions in admitting reason, as if you were distrustful of that way of determination. You might have some pretence for this, if your credentials were stronger reasons than any that could be drawn from the nature of the things themselves. But I find no credentials so much as pretended by you yet; no Schechinas, no signs of the prophets, no miracles, no fulfillings of predictions by answering events. Yet she pretends to equal her own prophecies with the confessedly inspired Scriptures, which had all these testimonials of the Divine authority of those that wrote them. She presumes to warn us not to admit them in the trial of her own pretences to inspiration, contrary to St. Paul, who pronounces an anathema even against an angel from heaven, that should presume to teach us any doctrine besides that which we have received. Yet pretending to no external credentials, the enthusiasm itself is far from being an evidence of its own Divine original. Imagination alone is sufficient to represent golden groves, and golden cities. Complexion, and fevers, and many other diseases affecting the brain, make such things appear as plainly as if they were really present. Much more the influence of evil spirits, permitted by Providence in such who break the unity of the good Spirit, which is the bond of the political society of the Church. So far is your discourse (if that discourse be yours) from proving yourself as certain of heaven, in your way of enthusiastical sensation, as you are of London. It is certain, that the representing of sensible ideas to the imagination is in the power of the devil, where God is pleased to permit him to exercise that which the Apostle calls ἐνέργειαν τῆς πλάνης in his Enurgementi. And I find nothing in your mother-in-law's case that doth immediately relate to the purely spiritual faculties, which are the proper subject of the true spirit of prophecy.

Thus every way her case is suspicious, in her distrust of much stronger topics than any she can insist on in favour of her own pretences, both of reason and authority; in her being destitute of any external evidences of the Divine original of her pretended familiar conversation with God; in the suspiciousness of the faculty here employed, where there is no security against the interposition of evil spirits, the faculty being the very same wherein they are permitted to act by the ordinary rules of Providence. And so far is her case from giving you any security against the interposition of evil spirits, as that indeed evil spirits are the most likely to be expected in the ways made use of by you for attaining the Spirit you pretend to. God's Spirit cannot warrantably be expected, but by those means which God has instituted for conveying it. And those are all of them, such as are externals, in the power of those persons whom he has authorized for governing the spiritual society. His way of giving it was by imposition of the hands of the Apostles, and of their lawful successors in deriving that authority, to the age we live in. Your pretence for reconciling the present differences of Christendom is to draw men from all these externals, even of Christ's own institution, under pretence of a greater perfection than can be consistent with your needing them. Christ's design was even to oblige the spiritual gifted persons to a due subordination to their governors. This is the principal design of St. Paul and St. Clement in their epistles to the Corinthians, to prove this obligation. Your design is quite contrary, to break off such persons from their dependence on their superiors in the spiritual society, on this very pretence of their being spiritual. The apostolical age distinguished the Gospel state from the Legal, even as to the externals of both of them: that the legal dispensation was to be succeeded by the evangelical, as a more perfect state in this world; but that the gospel state was everlasting, at least as to this world, to cut off all pretences of enthusiasts for breaking the positive institutions of the Gospel. You, on the contrary, pretend to abrogate all obligations, even to the true communion, on pretence of a more perfect dispensation even in this world. The Scripture, therefore, supposes all other spirits that move oppositely to that subordination, for that very reason, to be other spirits from that which is the bond of the Church's unity; and that all divided spirits are also, for that very reason, to be taken for spirits of error and delusion. It highly concerns you to secure yourselves against the consequence. I hope, dear Sir, you will prefer your soul before your affinity, and excuse my freedom in the case of a person so nearly allied to you; the rather, because it is so necessary on account of considerations much more important than that of your alliance. I desire to exercise my freedom no further than the cause shall require, and with all the candour which I value as the best ingredient in your sect.

I know not how your mother-in-law is qualified to write the style in which her books are penned. But this I have observed, that there are many things ingredient in that style, which are quite out of the way of the education, or conversation, or even reading of women. It consists of many Latin terms, of terms of art, of the old Platonic mystical divinity, of all the modern enthusiasts, of JACOB BEHME, of the judicial astrologers, of the magic oracles, of the alchemists, of which too many are in English, but not ordinarily to be met with. I very much doubt whether she would be able to give an account of the terms used in the writings which go under her name, if she were critically examined concerning them. But I think I have discovered footsteps of another, and a more likely author of them. I mean Dr. Pordage. I find she has been very intimate with him ever since the time that she has set up for prophetic visions. She calls him her fellow-traveller; she generally pretends to have her revelations when he was praying by her. She pretends a divine revelation that he was to recover out of a very dangerous ailment, and shows a very great concern for him. And at the end of her first vol. of the "Fountain of Gardens," either she or the editor [LEE, himself,] has subjoined an attestation of the Doctor's, penned in the same enthusiastic style with the revelations themselves, only more accurately and correctly, but full as ludicrous. And that ludicrousness is a particular, [N.B.] that I find none of you besides able to imitate in that perfection as he doth, as far as I can judge by the prefaces and postscripts, and the tracts in the "Theosophical Transactions." I observed, withal, that it is given as a reason why several revelations are wanting, that they were wanting in the Doctor's copy, and that they were received in the Doctor's absence. Why so, if she herself had been able, and used to pen her own visions? These things make it very suspicious to me, that the words and style of all her books are that Doctor's, and none of hers. How the matter of fact is, you can have better information than I can, and I earnestly recommend it to you for your own satisfaction.

There was really a Dr. John Pordage ejected out of the living of Bradfield in Berkshire, by the Commissioners in Cromwell's time, in the year 1654, for doctrines and practices of the same nature with those, of which I suspect your mother-in-law's friend; whether this be the same, you can better know than I, and you are greatly concerned to inform yourself as accurately as you are able: but so many circumstances are alike, and yet so singular, as will make it very difficult to have been otherwise. That Dr. Pordage was then accused for unwarrantable conversation with spirits, some of them certainly ill ones. Nor did he deny his being for some considerable time molested with ill spirits. For such favours as your mother-in-law pretends to, in conversing with God and good spirits, he is so far from denying them, that he glories in them. He pretends to have tasted much of that tree of life, which groweth in the midst of the paradise of God, to have seen through the veil of the sensitive nature into the spiritual glory of eternity; to have had the rising of Christ's image in him; to have had the secret, hidden treasure of eternity, the outgoings of divine goodness; discoveries of celestial glory, instillations of the heavenly dew, and secret touches of the Holy Ghost, bright irradiations of eternal light, strong motions of divine life, pleasant streams of eternal love. I give you his sense in his own words, that you may thereby see a specimen of his style, and judge how like it is to that of your mother-in-law. He disowned not his being taken up into heaven, like your mother-in-law, but parallels it with that of St. Paul. He was then charged with pretending that the New Jerusalem had been seen in his house come down from heaven; and that in it was a globe, which globe was eternity, and in that eternity all the saints. He then mentioned a virgin essence, in all likelihood, the same whom you call now the virgin Wisdom, with whom your mother-in-law pretends chiefly to converse. He was then charged with proselyting women, and the women so proselyted were said to exercise themselves, as yours are said to do now, in singing hymns. [1] He then also pretended to a power of bestowing the gifts and graces of the Spirit on whom he pleased. Why then should it be wondered at, that your mother-in-law might from him derive these visions she pretended to? Mrs. Pendar, upon the like or less familiarity with him, is said to have had such sights, that made her think herself bewitched by them; they came on her so unaccountably, and with so manifest tendencies to wicked and unlawful practices. And the case was frequent with the old heretics, to make their women-disciples believe themselves prophetesses; so Simon Magus with his Helena, so Appelles with his Philumena, so Montanus with his Prisca and Maximilla. I could wish you would particularly look in Irenæus, lib. i. c. 9., where you will find what arts were made use of to this purpose by Marcus, the father of the Marcsonian heretics, with good judicious remarks of the father himself on the philosophy of it. The same Doctor then pretended that he had seen the world of devils, evil spirits innumerable, their order and government; that he had heard, felt, tasted, and smelt hell in salt and sulphur, and that by a magical tincturation. Magical and tincturation are, as I remember, terms also used by your mother-in-law. His salt and sulphur shows how he also affected terms of chemistry. He pretended also to have seen the world of angels, and of them without number, bright as the rays, sparkling like diamonds; that he had tasted and heard the dews of paradise and harmonious music, etc.; and speaks as favourably of magic as your mother-in-law, and with as much caution, to distinguish it from that of a notoriously bad signification. In a word, you will find the notions charged on him then, as exactly agreeing with those of your mother-in-law, and the style too, as could have been expected, after forty years refining and improving upon them. My authority for what was then charged against the Doctor is Mr. Fowler, of Reading's Damonium Meridianum, in the year 1655, where several things are transcribed from the Doctor's defence of himself in his own words. You may possibly get the Doctor's own book, intitled: Innocency appearing, etc., which I have not seen; and there you may find more instances of his own style and notions, which may make his agreement with your mother yet more clear and indubitable. If you shall upon examination find that I have guessed right, and that the Doctor is indeed the true author of your mother-in-law's revelations, and that he was indeed guilty of the wickednesses then deposed against him, I believe you will not easily believe them divine, nor really so pure as they pretend.

Yet though you could prove your mother-in-law's cause separate from his, I cannot see how you can avoid very just exceptions against her writings, though they were entirely her own. The primitive Christians never used to speak so honourably of magic as she doth, but condemn all sorts of it, the white as well as the black, to speak in your own language concerning it. The Chaldee or magic Oracles are the ancientest monuments, I think, of that kind, from whence any terms have been borrowed into the mystical theology. They are certainly elder than Porphyry, who grounded his philosophy ἐκ λογίων upon them. Yet even the name of magic was of so ill report among Christians, that Simon and his heretical followers, the Gnostics, were then upbraided with ascribing any authority to them. Indeed, how could they do otherwise, who universally condemned all the heathen demons of what sort soever—who condemned all such curious familiarities even with good angels themselves. Col. ii. 18. They were later ages, and very degenerate, that forged a book of magic under our Saviour's name, inscribed to St. Peter and St. Paul; that forged so many magical offices, under the names of great saints, still extant in MSS.; that are supposed to have admitted professed magicians into the prime sees of Rome and Constantinople; that leavened so many of the later writings of the later Rabbis, and occasioned so great a loss of them. In those first and purest times it was sufficient to brand the reputation of even any heretic, that pretended to it. Nor is there any reason to have any better opinion of even this white magic, because of its so great pretensions to purity. The devil has, even in these particulars, also transformed himself into an angel of light. Cornelius Agrippa pretends also to great purity and prayers; and so do the chemists, also, in their inquiries after the philosopher's stone, who are another original for forming your mother-in-law's style. But God doth not promise the rewards of piety to such worldly designs, however speciously pretended. And there are no books of the chemists extant, that I know of, even in MS., beyond the 4th century; so far are they from being agreeable to the best and purest ages of our Christian religion. Yet even these pretensions of piety in enthusiasts who cast off duty, do seldom answer expectation after the first heats of enthusiasm are evaporated. It were easy to show it in very many instances, but hardly in any more remarkably than in the case of Dr. Pordage. However, there is no reason to believe the style divine and sacred that is borrowed from the customs of such unjustifiable curiosities.

But this affected innovation in words might have been more tolerable, if it had gone no farther than words. And indeed I expected, when I first looked into your mother-in-law's writings, that it had gone no farther. But I was surprised to find her stumble on several antiquated heresies, condemned for such in the first and most infallible ages of our Christian religion. She calls her Virgin Wisdom a goddess, directly contrary to all that those purest ages have declared against the difference of sex in the Divinity. She agrees herein with no Christians of these times, but the gnostic heretics, who made their Æons' ἀρρενοθήλεις, and allowed of a Sophia of that sex in the πλήρωμα, no doubt by her meaning the Heavenly Wisdom; besides whom they invented a daughter of hers of an inferior rank, by them called, Achamoth, if the word were Hebrew, Chochmoth, an inferior terrestrial wisdom also, such as was admitted also in the philosophy of that age. But perhaps the word being of a singular signification, was rather Egyptian. This same Virgin Wisdom your mother makes the mother of the Son of God, as to his eternal generation, directly contrary to St. Paul (Heb. vii. 3.), who makes the Son of God as ἀπ' αὐτοῦ in relation to his humanity, so ἀμήτητο as to his Divinity. Yet your mother makes her Virgin Wisdom born under Sol and Venus; with what possible congruity? when her son is supposed to have created those planets. But thus it is likely that it should fall out, when an ungoverned fancy has the management of terms taken from arts not understood by the person who uses them. And I am apt to think that the Doctor, though he has made his jargon the study of his life, yet is not much more skilled in these things than she is. I have elsewhere observed her giving an account of the original of Good and Evil, by two co-eternal principles in the Deity, the one good the other evil, exactly agreeing with the condemned doctrine of Manes, and several other heretics of those first ages. But in this age of licentiousness, there is hardly any doctrine of hers of more pernicious consequence than that of her pretending Divine revelation for her doctrine concerning the finiteness of hell torments. I hope these heresies will oblige you to bethink yourself seriously, whether this favour to enthusiasm is like to lead you. For my part, I think what I insisted on formerly, both in my book of Schism, and my first letter, a just prejudice against your venturing your soul on so dangerous a course; that it cuts you off from your dependence on the governors of our church and our communion, from which even spiritual persons were not intended to be exempted; and that it overthrows the establishments of our Lord for settling and establishing the true communion, as well as the inventions of men for settling and establishing false communions in opposition to the true one. But I did not then so well know, as I do now, that this was avowedly your design, to restore peace by destroying obligations to all communions, allowing no prerogative to the true communion, but reckoning it on equal terms with all heretical and schismatical rivals of it. This being your case will oblige you to pitch upon the proposition, where you think the proof insisted on in my book will fail me. And I should be suspicious of it, if I had any private concernment in it any otherwise than as to the personal weakness of the management of it.

Our good God extricate you out of the snares of enthusiasm and seducing spirits, wherein you are engaged. May he not suffer so many good works, and so much good meaning, as you have shown on other occasions, to fail of their reward. May he reduce you to the true fold, from whence you have thus long strayed, that you may be saved in the true Israelites. So prays he who most heartily desires that you will be pleased to qualify yourself, that he may be able to subscribe himself as formerly,—Your most affectionate brother and fellow-sufferer,

Henry Dodwell.

We now come to Lee's long Apologetical Letter, in reply to all the unanswered points of the former correspondence of 'Mr. Henry Dodwell;' which was written about the latter end of the year 1698, but having then been laid aside, was afterwards revived upon fresh instigations, and the conclusion added, upon April 9th, 1699:—

Dear Sir,—You need not excuse yourself for any freedom taken by you in a case of so great importance: you have a right to command the same on several accounts. And though I did forbear to answer your second Letter, on consideration that you were not then so rightly informed in the state of the cause you undertook to opugn, as you might be now; yet did I it not with the least disrespect to a person, that has deserved so much from the christian world, as well as from the learned: from whom to dissent, would be very difficult, had I not other grounds than what seem yet to be apprehended by you. For I have considered your strictures upon my mother's books, and have some reason to doubt, whether you did not rather content yourself with a cursory view of them, than accurately to examine their whole scope and contents. Which if you had thought worth your while to have done, some of the more principal objections perhaps would have fallen off. And a plain representation of the matter of fact will best determine of what weight those general prejudices ought to be, which are brought to render her case suspicious.

II.—The design then of her writings [see Note p. 46, pp. 141, 148] is to lead up the soul, as by various degrees, and through several purgations, illustrations, baptisms, and deaths into the Divine life. This is most distinctly laid down in her first treatise, called the Heavenly Cloud, which is the foundation to the rest of her works. Now in order to the attainment of this, she shows how it is necessary in the first place, to be mortified to the sensitive and brutal life, wherein we are all born.

And for this end, reason is very useful, she distrusts it not here, but freely makes use of it herself. But then this is but as one end of the ladder, one step heaven-ward, or according to her own style, one death. And betwixt the sensitive and Divine life, there may yet remain a great chasm. And it is certain that many stick here, who pretend to be great masters of reasoning. And many who have first reasoned themselves out of a spiritual principle and life in religion, have afterwards reasoned themselves out of the very subsistence of the eternal Word or reason, which is God, and last of all out of the very being of a God, by confounding him with the world. It is very true, that right reason could never persuade either the one or the other of this; but it is sufficient that the ratiocinative faculty in man may be so depraved, as to give its assent to that which it ought not.

Whence there did appear to this inquisitive spirit, as absolute a necessity for the mortification and resignation of this faculty also, as to its corrupt and unbounded activity, as even of the sensitive and brutal part in men. Nor is there any injury done hereby to the light of reason, nor any just prejudice given against that cause which is here maintained, but rather a great advantage doth thereby accrue to reason, when regulated from a superior principle, and irradiated by a greater Light, as in this case is pretended, at least. And since there is professedly an intention to superinduce a principle superior to reason, as much as reason is superior to sense, and to make use of a Light more highly originated, as flowing more immediately from the Father of Lights into his reflected image, when made pure and clear; hitherto I do not see why this should be any just matter of prejudice against what is offered, unless it can be evidently made out: (1.) That there is no such superior principle, life, or light. Or (2.) that it is not now communicable longer, nor to be expected in the regenerated image of God. Or (3.) that the process here taken in order to its communication, is not right. Or lastly, that an error is committed in this process, or in the admission of the Divine principle into the soul, and in its application, specification, and determination to particular objects. Besides, I must premise this one thing once for all, that you must not expect all the accuracy of expression from a person of no letters, as from one that is skilled in the true definitions of terms.

You well know, Sir, that the Spirit of God doth accommodate himself to the capacity of the subject into which it flows. Neither the prophets nor the apostles have the same style, or indeed so much as the same turn of thought. And all the world knows how differently faith is taken by the brother of our Lord, and the doctor of the Gentiles.

Confident I am, that the word reason, as used by my mother, is taken in quite as different a sense, from that you and others may take it in; and that she has as good reasons to depreciate it in her sense, as you can have to magnify it in yours.

Of this I could give many clear evidences from her writings. And I doubt not but you yourself will find these upon a more narrow and strict examination of them, if you shall think it worth your while. I have never heard of any whom inspiration has made to be critics. It is enough if the scope and intent of an author be understood. If more than this were required, the Holy Ghost would never have spoken by fishermen, or would have made them orators and philosophers.

III.—Another prejudice brought by you against her writings is, that she pretends to equal her own prophecies with the confessedly inspired Scriptures.

But, dear Sir, what is her pretension, I pray? Is it any more than this, that she believes herself truly inspired by God? What grounds she has for believing so, are in their proper place to be considered. It is very true, that she does think herself to be conducted and taught by the Holy Spirit, as really as the prophets under the old, or the apostles under the New Testament did themselves. And consequently her own Divine inspirations must to her be of equal authority with theirs, i.e. according to the degree and nature of them. Yea possibly farther yet, hers may (and ought to be) of no less authority to herself, than theirs were to themselves, who were thus confessedly inspired.

For if I have a truly Divine inspiration, it is certain, that it is not in my power to give a less credit to it, than to the Divine inspiration of another; both being supposed an inspiration of the same degree. And there are some grounds I think, to allow, (if possible) a greater credit to that which is immediately communicated to myself, than to that which is only communicated immediately through others, how well soever attested.

Thus far, then, is certain, that it ought not to be any prejudice against the truth of her prophecies, that she herself doth firmly believe their truth, and wait for their completion; and that not without an equal assurance to that, which is by the universality of Christians given to the ancient prophecies, and confessedly inspired writings, which do testify of the glorious coming of our Lord and blessed Saviour.

But notwithstanding this firm and solid assurance in herself, I do not find, (either from her writings, or from her conversation) that she does pretend to oblige others to give an equal authority to her writings, as to the sacred Scriptures, or even any at all to them, which a sober inquirer after truth, will not be obliged to of his own accord, after the best scrutiny.

She hath, indeed, published them for the sake of others, upon a particular admonition given to that purpose, [?] and various concurring providences strongly inciting her, very contrary to her expectations, as from manifest signs can be made to appear. But hereby she doth not impose any new articles of faith, or bring any new gospel; she only declares the lights which she says, were communicated to her, and leaves every one free to receive or reject them, since the damage or advantage will be to themselves.

But she doubts not at the same time, but that many good souls will be stirred up by the Spirit of God to acknowledge and embrace them, even before the Divine wisdom shall see it expedient or necessary to consign them by some external and public mark which may in its time be given, though not presently.

IV.—A farther prejudice against her writings is this, that she arrogates an authority to them equal to the Scriptures, without any or all of those testimonials of Divine authority which they had who wrote those, such as shechinahs, signs of the prophets, miracles, and fulfilling of predictions.

As for the first of these, it is true, she pretends not to any visible Shechinah, such as was accommodated to the infant state of the Jews; but she pretends to that which is a higher and nobler, to a Shechinah that is substantial and permanent, even to the real inhabitation of the Holy Ghost as in his temple.

And if this her pretension be well founded, and the truth of it made manifest to her, as it cannot well be supposed otherwise, I cannot see why she may not depend safely upon the Divine authority of what is thus revealed from the inhabitation of the ever-blessed Spirit, as a vital principle of light and love, or why also others who are, or shall be, after the same manner convinced, may not securely trust themselves to this superior way of administration, as to a more certain word of prophecy.

V.—As for the signs of the prophets, they were generally required and given upon particular messages, whether of judgment or mercy, as by Moses, in that of the famous Exodus of Israel, by Samuel, in that of the kingdom conferred on Saul, by the man of God, in that of the birth of Josiah, by Isaiah in several cases, by Jeremiah also in several, but which were all particular.

But it doth not appear, that these were given by all the prophets, or even by the greatest, or most eminent of them, in prophecies in a more universal nature, or indeterminate as to persons and times.

Of these last, instances are frequent in Isaiah alone. Of the former there are two witnesses at once,—the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, of whom it doth not appear that either of them showed a sign, or wrought any miracle, though both standing together in the same commission. And the reason of this may be the difference of the commission of these prophets, from that of some others who went forth with a sign.

For the spirit of prophecy fell upon these, to promote the building of the second temple, which had no need of a new sign, this falling in so punctually with the expiration of the seventy years, according to the precise prophecy of Jeremiah, which had been already confirmed with a sign, and being corroborated with several extraordinary providences concurring.

Another instance may be that of Daniel, a man highly favoured with the revelation of hidden secrets, with a most singular gift of interpretation, and which great angelical communications, who yet brought no external sign but the verification of what was declared, or the event of the interpretation. And whether it might not be thus also with Amos and some others, for the first years of their public prophesying, may not unreasonably be doubted.

But moreover in the most particular and extraordinary messages, and of how public and universal a concern soever, it doth not appear that a sign was always required, or given by God through his prophets. Of this there are two signal instances, and more eminent than these there cannot be.

The one is Noah, who is believed to have prophesied to the old world concerning the approaching deluge, no less than one hundred and twenty years before it came to pass; and during all this while, there is not the least probability of a sign being given to that wicked generation, but that of his own strict righteousness, and of his building of a strange machine, or house, apparently very extravagant, for the saving of himself and family.

Here was an express command from God, to declare that his Spirit would not strive with man beyond such a limited season. The prophet that was to declare this, was to expect no better than scorn or pity at least from the whole world at that time. There was no faith then upon the earth, and to humour such with a sign from heaven would have been of little effect, if of any. God was not obliged to give it, and it might not have suited with the methods of his wisdom to do so. But this righteous man, though laughed at by all, being moved with fear, would not tempt God to demand a sign in his own vindication; but he believed and obeyed, and thereby condemned the incredulous world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith, and the father of a new world.

The second instance of this kind is Jonah, whose commission according to the modern hypothesis of prophecy, would be very unaccountable. Certainly if Ninevah had been as London, or Assyria as England, they would not have so easily repented, but would have called aloud for signs, before they would have hearkened to the word of the prophet. Therefore shall Ninevah rise up against London, and thou Assyria against England.

To this case when fully and clearly stated, I cannot see anything that can be opposed with any solidity, supposing that matter of fact to be just as it is related. And to suppose the matter to be otherwise, and that there was a sign given when none is mentioned, is altogether precarious, and a begging of the question.

I am not ignorant that in both these cases, there are good reasons producible, why a sign was withheld, but the very same reasons will hold as good in the present case, as would not be difficult to make out particularly.

One instance more I cannot omit, of a prophet without a sign, and that is the precursor of our blessed Lord, who though he was a second Elias, yet neither wrought miracles, nor showed a sign, whom all men nevertheless owned for a prophet.

Wherefore he is called only a voice, and a voice of one crying in the wilderness, to prepare the way of Messiah. And though he was afterwards publicly owned by the Messiah himself, yet this was but as a succedent ministration to ratify a former, not to give any authoritative sign or seal of its truth; he having in a manner already finished his office, being in all places wherever he went, and by some of all ranks of persons, taken for a true prophet.

And whether his case may not be peculiarly applicable to some in this day, or sometime before the end of the world, as the precursors of the second glorious coming of our Lord and Saviour, I leave you, Sir, to consider with as much accuracy as you please.

VI.—As for miracles more may be said perhaps for them, than for signs. A sign must be a miracle, but neither every miracle, nor every great miracle can properly be said to be a sign. And notwithstanding those great miracles which our blessed Saviour did, he refused to give a public and determinative sign, which could not have promoted, but rather would have served to frustrate the design which he came into the world for.

Wherefore he roundly told his unbelieving countrymen, that no other sign should be given them, but that of Jonah the prophet; which could not be without their first putting of him to death.

So that there was no proper and public sign during the whole course of his ministration, notwithstanding all his miracles, whereby he could be discriminated from Moses and Elias, or any other great prophet, who had wrought miracles, even abating from the signs which they gave, as more immediately declarative of their Divine mission.

Indeed at the beginning of his ministration there was a sign given, but it was not public, being determined, (for aught that appears) to one single person, who was to bear witness of it, by crying, Behold the Lamb of God.

The next sign that he also gave, was private, in the presence but of three witnesses: and it was not till he was finishing the last scene of his commission, and was only precursory to the great promised sign, the sign of Jonah.

A third sign may be what happened in the consummating point itself of his ministration, or the threefold sign of his crucifixion. (1.) The rending of the veil of the Jewish temple. (2.) The earthquake. (3.) The darkness. This also was not so properly a sign, as a wonder, being too indefinite for the former strictly taken. And all this together did but make up the beginning of that grand, adequate sign, which had been twice in the most solemn and public manner promised though not understood by any.

This was presently preached up as the true and proper sign of the Messiah, and everywhere throughout the New Testament joined with him, even so far as by some to have been taken for the Goddess of Jesus. That it had all the marks of a true and adequate sign is indubitable, except that it was not exhibited in the open view of his crucifiers, which (yet remains to be done); not but that this was sufficiently compensated by their sealing of his sepulchre, and by many other corroborating evidences.

Now if it shall please Him who is exalted above every name, to send forth his prophets and messengers in his name, to prepare a way for Him against his glorious return, I cannot indeed but conclude, that many miracles must be wrought through them, and many concurrent wonders also both in the heights and in the depths, equivalent to a sign, openly demonstrated. That these then may be expected, is not denied. Notwithstanding which I doubt very much whether any sign (that is properly so) ought to be expected, or called for, before the sign of the Son of Man shall appear.

And what that is can be understood from the foregoing grand sign.

But let this be what it will, or the miracles preceding never so many, or great, yet to the inquirers after a sign, what they seek after may be refused as heretofore, and that without any impeachment to the Divine glory or truth. And as the sign only of Jonah the prophet was given by the great Son of man to those of his own generation, so verily shall the sign only of the Son of man be given by his Holy Spirit to them of the last generations of the world. With which most aptly doth concur, according to my sentiments, the plain and literal meaning of Apoc. xi. 2. For the fulfilling of whose place I do not look either in this or the next age, clearly discerning that it must be the last great event immediately preceding the sound of the last trumpet. In which interval, as I do expect the apostolical spirit to revive, so with it the apostolical powers or miracles: whereto these very writings, though not attested themselves at first by miracles, will most mainly contribute, whensoever and by whomsoever they are rightly digested.

This is visibly throughout a principal design of them. And I think no deeper foundation can be laid for the resuscitation of the miraculous powers by the spirit of faith, than what in them is to be found.

If these do not break out immediately, or all at once, but seasonably and gradually, I do not see why this should be any disadvantage to these writings of my mother, or any just exception against her pretensions. It is what she herself hath declared again and again, and doth still declare. Her pretensions may be firm and valid, without external and public miracles to guard them, if infinite Wisdom shall see fit, to begin weakly and contemptibly for a greater manifestation of his glory. But besides, though she may not so much as pretend to miracles, possibly God may sometimes honour his handmaid beyond what she pretends to; and I have not, therefore, a worse opinion concerning her, but a better.

I love not to make a mountain of a mole-hill; but what I have seen and known within these few years has certainly been too much to confirm either an imposture, or a delusion.

VII.—As for fulfilling of predictions by answering events, which you make another credential of true prophecy, I do not find that this could be pretended to by several of the ancient undoubted prophets in their life times, their prophesies, you know, for the most part being for a considerable time after their decease: and by this, alone considered, Jonah might have passed for a false prophet; as possibly several of the true prophets did, when they were stoned, or otherwise put to death, by the public judicature, for their testimony; till after their deaths, their predictions coming to be fulfilled, they who had before rejected, did now come to receive their prophesies, and build their sepulchres. And yet, even upon this head, there may perhaps be more of reality, than what is pretended as to the present case. Some things of a private nature may be evidences, in this kind to particular persons, which cannot be made so to others. And some things also there may be of a more public nature, predicted or visionally represented, which have happened to be confirmed many years after, by corresponding events, even when the prediction, or vision, hath been utterly forgotten. An instance of this may be a visional dream in the beginning of 1678, concerning the public exercise of the Roman worship tolerated in several parts of this kingdom, wherein is mention made of the pope's vicars, which seems to have been fulfilled seven years after, though taken no notice of, and not found till this very year, upon the occasion of the importunity of some persons from abroad requiring what yet remains unpublished. [1] And one more instance there is, which I cannot but hint, being a vision in December, 1688, apparently relating to the peace last year at Reswick concluded. [2]

Nor would it be difficult to find some other parallel instances of predictions, that have either been answered by events, or at least have been very applicable to them. But on these I do not lay any very great stress; the conviction that I have from other grounds, is incomparably greater as to me.

VIII.—Another prejudice against her writings is, that she presumes to warn us not to admit even the Scriptures in trial of her own pretences to inspiration.

How far this is true, or is understood, may easily be decided. It is then true that she makes her pretension to an immediate revelation of God's mind, in some matters not before revealed in the Scriptures, and in which by consequence no Scripture ground may appear. But if this be any just prejudice against her, and if even an angel from heaven may be anathematized, who teacheth any other doctrine but what is clearly expressed in the Scripture; then will it be also, if I mistake not, against Catholic tradition for the same reason. And I am much afraid that the anathema will rebound upon the holy fathers themselves of the ancient church, and upon its most renowned councils in many cases that are well known. The doctrines of infant baptism, of the translation or defection of the Jewish sabbath, of unity of baptism in opposition to the rebaptization of heretics, of prayers for the dead, with some others, are certainly ancient doctrines, for which it will be very hard to find a satisfactory ground in Scripture; but it would be no less hard to condemn therefore all those who have believed and practised according to these.

For by the same parity of reason, I do not see at present why the whole Church may not fall under an anathema, as well as any single person, if they should receive any other doctrine, than what is evidently grounded in Scripture, however consonant it may otherwise be to universal tradition, or any other medium of the knowledge of the truth. This is, indeed, agreeable enough to the principles of some, but because it is not so to yours, I cannot, Sir, but promise myself a more generous treatment than if I had fallen amongst them who will narrow up the evidences of truth to public written inspiration, and that too taken according to their own glosses.

Besides, she doth not pretend to say, that there is not Scripture-ground for the doctrine which she brings, but only ingenuously confesseth that she has not found it. But it may be there, I suppose, notwithstanding she could not find it. If she could not find it there at all, or could not find it there so plain, as to satisfy herself, or convince others, this may be brought as an example of her ingenuity, not of her presumption. For it can be no presumption to declare what God has revealed and hath commanded to be declared, but a duty.

And if she doth really believe that God did by his Spirit reveal this doctrine to her, and command her to declare the same publicly, against all kind of disadvantages, whatever the doctrine may be in itself, and though she may be mistaken as to the revelation, her only crime will be to have acted according to the best of her light, after the most earnest search made into this matter, by praying and waiting upon God. However, this is not imposed on any as an article of faith, and they that cannot digest it, may pass it over. Though I think there may be as good grounds even from Scripture itself to make it so, as the supra-lapsarian doctrines which so many confessions have raised up to that rank, if not far better.

Again it is also true, that she doth declare, that we are not bound to stint ourselves to any foregoing dispensation or revelation, nor to be so taken up in the Scripture itself, or to rest on it, as if nothing more were to be revealed, for the benefit and instruction of mankind. And the inference which she thence draweth is, that whatever shall be thus revealed, so far as this shall be made to appear to the person receiving a revelation, or to any other, ought to be no less credited and esteemed, than a revelation from the same Spirit of a more ancient date; the truth of which is most evident from the very nature of the thing. And this can be thought no superseding of the authority of the Scripture, no derogation to any precedent Divine revelation, nor any arbitrary introduction of new pretended revelation, since what is asserted upon this infallible maxim,—that God cannot lie, and consequently that whatsoever was, is, or shall be communicated from Him, either for a more particular, or more public benefit, ought to be received with the same veneration.

This is the substance of what she says, so far as I understand her; and is no more than what every one doth believe, i.e. if the matter-of-fact were but supposed to be true. I do not find that she any where evades the confessedly Divine authority of former divine revelations, to set up her own, or refuteth but so much as in one particular, that is this way determinable, to bring what she hath had communicated, to the holy Scriptures as the standard of true inspiration. On the contrary, I find she is taught by that Spirit which guideth her, to put a most high esteem upon them, to appeal to them in all that they contain, to meditate in them almost continually, and to search into their most hidden depths, and concealed truths, by and with the assistances of the Holy Inspirer who dictated them. It is the general method of the Spirit by which she is acted, after a revelation or manifestation is given, to apply and confirm the same to and by some text of Scripture, then brought to her remembrance and most emphatically unfolded, for the proper occasion; which certainly can be no sign of an evil spirit. And I do not think this would excite her to call daily for the Scriptures to be read to her, as is her custom. But let it be even supposed, that she had in express terms warned us not to admit even the Scriptures themselves in the trial of her inspirations, how harsh soever this may sound, it is no worse than the greatest part of Christians, and even the learned and wise, as well as pious, do in effect, with regard to many of those doctrines and practices which they maintain. Not that they do hereby seek to put any difference upon the Sacred Writ, but only to avoid all contention about its interpretation, which is so manifold according to the different education and various habitual prejudices of the readers. This may be in them a prudent caution, upon good and weighty considerations: and if so, it may be the same here also.

But there is no need of it. And I know she is so far from distrusting the authority of the Scripture in her present case, as the greatest pretenders to it can be: who thinks she has a better claim from it, to the teachings of the Spirit, than any man can bring for his estate, or than all the world can produce to oppose it.

Now I will not (yet) say, that this is any more than a warm imagination. Let it pass for such, it will however sufficiently vindicate her from this main charge.

IX.—It is then a further prejudice against her writings, that imagination alone is able to represent and transact all that is here reported.

But to this I cannot yield myself, upon the following grounds: It is not enough that imagination can represent golden ladies and golden cities; doubtless it may do this, with all that is in the book of Revelations.

It can represent all that Daniel or Ezekiel saw, all that Zachary typified, or that Christ himself spake in parables. But notwithstanding that the sacred representation by them exhibited, were expressed to the imaginative faculty, St. John, Ezekiel, and Daniel are not less esteemed to be true prophets with Zachary and others. Nor is it any derogation from the authority of our blessed Master, that he made choice of a method so agreeing with human imagination.

Complexion and fevers may do very much, and the power of imagination I dispute not. But there is no greater sign of a strong imagination, than to implead realities, or to conclude what it can do it doth.

There are some things in my mother's writings that do undoubtedly relate to the purely spiritual faculties. Some indeed mediately and others immediately. A particular enumeration of which with respect to those superior faculties of the intellect and will, would be too tedious. There are some passages, I think, that visibly tend to illuminate the former; and others strongly to touch the latter. And it is impossible that I should think otherwise, or that you yourself should, if but the contents were allowed, or supposed to be true. For certainly the doctrine of the Spiritual kingdom of Christ, and the unity and sanctity of the church, of the order and discipline of the apostolical fraternity, of the communion of saints, of the ministration of angels, of the original of simple spirits, of the various mansions allotted to beatified souls, of the consubstantiality with the glorified humanity of the Lord, of the nature of a spiritual body, of the different steps of transfiguration, transformation, and transubstantiation, of the Divine Virgin principle through which the Deity is manifested in nature, of real and spiritual manducation of the spiritual internal senses imaged by the natural and external, of the first paradisaical state of man, of the gradual defection and lapse, of the scale of the regeneration, of elementary spirits and their receptacles, of the various states of purification in other regions, of the general restitution of the creation, and some other coincident with these, are doctrines that do as peculiarly according to their degree, tend to illustrate the understanding, as any other that in the Christian religion can be named. And supposing this at present to be both equally true, I cannot think that the least question would be made of it. Neither would it be any easy task to transcribe all those passages that do properly affect the superior will of man, and strongly impel the same, as soon as they are rightly understood. Of this nature are such as lead to a pure and naked dependence upon God, to the incomprehensible peace of God, to that perfect thing which is described by the Apostle, to an high and masculine faith, that can be called truly apostolical, and to the holy and undefiled magia which doth thence proceed, and is the greatest of all wonders in purified and resigned wills, as being therefore frequently called the great mystery.

How many cautions, counsels, exhortations, and encouragements are here to be found, for the retrieving the evangelical spirit amongst Christians, and for the waiting for the promise of the Father? All which I cannot but conceive do relate more immediately to the spiritual faculties of the soul, unless the imagination be the seat of the evangelical spirit.

There are also judgments and blessings pronounced, the one on the obstinate refusers of this Spirit, and the other upon all such as shall yield themselves to the call of it, as it shall grow louder and louder. This also bears a relation to the will; and it is so correspondent with the methods of divine providence, and to the manner of all ancient, undoubtedly inspired prophets, as I know not what can be reasonably objected against it, after what hath been already considered under the foregoing prejudices: by the evidence of which, I am forced to conclude that there are some, yea many things in these writings that do relate to the faculties which are the proper subject of the true spirit of prophecy.

Not only so, but the very scope and drift of all these writings is to set the mind free from images, to purify all the avenues of the imaginative faculties, and to drive the soul into a Super-sensual and Super-imaginative state. And however sensible mediums and images are made use of in the process to this attainment, and, to make the same known to others, are taken up instead of words, for their great significancy and expressiveness; yet all this is but an artificial way of denudating the imagination with the greatest familiarity and ease to itself, in order to that blessed state of seeing God from, in, and through a simplified and pure heart.

There may be, and really is a great distinction betwixt imagination and the work of God upon imagination. The greatest part, if not all of the angelical ministration doth herein consist. Thence is it not of force to say, that the imagination itself is sufficient to represent such objects as really as if they were present. Unless it be likewise evident that there could be no operation of God upon it, or co-operation with it, by the interposition of angels, to presentiate the objects to that faculty.

The imagination is properly Speculum Anima, which in its lapsed, depraved state, is filled with innumerable broken images, very inadequate and preposterous; but in its restored, and pure state, all these images being cast out, it becomes a bright mirror, to reflect the immaculate and entire image of God, as it is in the Virgin nature of the Lamb (then seen upon mount Sion); and so through this one image, hereupon reflected, the spirit of the soul, as in a glass, may be said to behold God, and the Divine world (all whose figures are adequate and regular), not indeed nakedly and manifestly, but somewhat obscurely and enigmatically.

And thus proportionably as the imagination is more or less evacuated, all the imaginations of the heart of man being evil, and evil altogether, there is (or may be) an admission into it of that vision for which it was originally formed, either in a higher or lower degree. Whether it may be so in this case, or how far it may be, may not be perhaps unworthy of a wise man's search.

But sixthly, you yourself, dear Sir, seem sensible enough, that all could not be the mere effect of imagination, since you are so willing to admit the influence of evil spirits upon it.

Wherefore, this prejudice of imagination being insufficient, even according to your own method of reasoning, I shall consider the next prejudice, which instead of corroborating seems to overthrow the former; unless the obsession and influx of an evil spirit should be confounded with a constitutional or accidental infirmity, and the same thing might be said at once to be both natural and preter-natural.

X.—Another heavier prejudice then remains against her writings, even no less than this: that it is in the power of the devil to represent sensible ideas to the imagination, where God is pleased to permit him; that there is no security against the interposition of evil spirits in a faculty, wherein they are permitted to act by the ordinary rules of providence; and that evil spirits are most likely to be expected in the ways made use of by us for attaining the Spirit we pretend to.

Now if there can be a security against the interposition of evil spirits, even in this faculty, and we actually have this security, then will this prejudice that is levelled against these writings in special, and against the society in general, fall to the ground.

Now, that there may be a security even in the imagination itself from evil spirits interposing themselves, I think may be made good, not only a posteriori, from undeniable instances, but also a priori, from the nature of the subject. Now it is firm, that every faculty in its original constitution must have its proper certainty, otherwise God would deceive his creature, i.e., be no God. And as certain as truth cannot be the fountain either of a verbal or essential lie, or as two contradictories are impossible, so certain it is that every faculty, power, or might which proceeded from God, the essential Truth, must attain to its proper object for which it was formed or procreated; conditionally, that all that which would debilitate, darken, or impede the same, be removed out of the way: and when it hath attained its object, it must of necessity be certain of this its attainment. Intellectual truth is the proper object of human understanding, and though it be possible for the understanding to be mistaken with respect to truth, in almost infinite cases, yet it is absolutely impossible for it to be mistaken in some, as particularly in those common notions wherein all mankind do most unanimously agree. Nay, it is impossible to be mistaken in any, where but the objective truth is fairly and fully presented, and the faculty sound and naked of all prejudices.

Besides, there are some few general rules for finding out and discerning of truth, which being strictly observed in the application of them to particulars, no error can be admitted into the understanding. All which is in like manner applicable to the imaginative faculty, that has its common images, wherein can be no mistake; that has its soundness as well as its infirmity, and its true position as well as its false. And that is to be regulated by such plain, easy rules of discretion as will exclude all illusions.

This is universally so in the several faculties and gifts of God to men, without any exception, natural or super-natural, purely spiritual or mixed, internal or external.

Good is the proper object of the Will, to which, according to its true original constitution, it may attain. And Infinite Good, or the supreme Good, is the only true object of the will of man, for which it was formed and capacitated; and to which it may therefore, according to its original formation and native capacity, attain, and having attained, rest satisfied in the possession of its object, with an infallible certainty. And though we daily and hourly experience how possible it is for the human will to be misled with respect to good, yea, how very difficult (and almost impossible) it is not to be mistaken or biased in this pursuit; yet where the objective good is perspicuously and sensibly presented, and the will unfettered, and in the full liberty of the spirit, it is perfectly impossible for it to be here misled, or not to have a sufficient security against the deception of apparent good.

Material beings are the proper objects of the external senses, and though it be notorious what innumerable errors have sprung up through these, and what gross and even ridiculous mistakes are hence made by the unlearned, yet is it altogether impossible for these to be when the organ is sound and perfect, the object proportioned to it, and the distance neither too remote nor too near. There are common sensations in which mankind do all mutually concur; and there are also certain natural rules of addition and subtraction of sensible ideas, of their division and multiplication, and of their negation or abstraction, and comparison, which do afford many solid and substantial truths, and cannot anywise lead into error when attended to.

Nay, it is an impossibility for the senses of themselves to deceive any one, since the error is not in them, but in the judgment that is made upon them. And all that has been said with respect to these, and the superior and purely spiritual faculties of the mind, are likewise applicable to the imagination, as might be distinctly showed, if I were writing to a person of less penetration.

Thus, then, even the Imaginative faculty is capable of its proper evidence, as well as the intellect, or as the will, or any of the senses are of theirs; and indeed as capable as any faculties or powers whatever, angelical or human, since all alike do so equally depend upon the nature of the Divine truth. Nor is it enough to urge that this is only a natural evidence, and therefore to be suspected for fear of a supernatural deception by the subtle insinuation of evil spirits transformed; for were it but in their power but to null or supersede this evidence, where there is a due disposition of subject and object, they would be more powerful than God himself, who hath willed such an evidence to arise from this or that disposition or combination, according to certain immutable and eternal laws of truth. And though so long as this faculty or fountain is impure, and not regenerated from above, there may be no security against the intrusion of such kind of spirits, yet certainly, as this is purified and renovated by the spirit of Jesus, the greatest security is possible to be obtained. In comparison whereof, that of external signs and miracles, can be but of an inferior degree. Since no evidence from without, (how great soever,) is any, but so far only as it is apprehended by, and doth correspond with, the internal principle of sensation, and perception, by what name soever called.

An instance whereof I take to be the famous ecstasy of the great Pythagoras, when he ran about as an Energumen, or possessed person, with his Eureka, for having found out that noted theorem, which is as the basis of all Trigonometry. He was thus transported out of himself by the energy of truth, so as to forget that he had a body; this transport was caused by the inaction of the truth upon his mind, whereby his animal spirits being so actuated, through the surprising clarity of what before was very obscure, his imagination was filled with the ideas relating to such a sort of a triangle, during the suspension of his outward senses.

This inaction or energy of truth was so powerful only from the conformity of certain imaginary ideas one with another, and the combination of them according to such and such laws, that are necessary and self-evident. This conformity even of imaginary ideas, was of itself a proof vastly superior to any other that could be given. For I believe that no man will think he could have been half so certain of the truth of that proposition, if he had spent all his days in measuring of triangles by rule and compass, or if the whole body of mathematicians at that time had declared it unto him, or if any wonderful operation of magic had been wrought by any of these for confirmation of the same.

All external proofs, all mechanical figurations, and miracles themselves, even to the raising of the dead, would have been given as an inferior evidence to that which he had, and which every one may have also, when the first elements and terms of geometry are clearly understood.

Thus it is, every faculty of the soul hath its proper evidence and its proper energy, which all things can never be able to balance or arrive to.

And here I cannot but observe, that the Divine energy upon the soul is not without good reason so often mentioned by the great Apostle; I should think with some particular regard to these degenerated times, if he may be allowed to have had the spirit of prophecy, as he doubtless had, when he prophesied of the son of Belial (ὁ ἀνομος), to be manifested in the energy of Satan, with apparent miracles, signs, and prodigies. But without pretending to uncypher this prophecy, I dare be confident, upon as good grounds as we can have for the interpretation of any one text in the whole Scripture, that the application, neither in part nor in whole, ought to be made to the present case.*

Nor can I but take notice, that in seven places where this word ἐνεργεια is used by St. Paul alone, in his Epistles, there are no fewer than six of them where it is certainly taken in a good sense. And in this one place by you referred to, where it is taken in an ill sense, it is only incidentally, and upon an extraordinary occasion, though for the deeper emphasis and impression this be indeed repeated. Wherefore I cannot yet see a ground, either in reason or in Scripture, to conclude, that even in this very faculty of the imagination itself, there can be no security against the interposition of evil demons, or that there may not be a natural as supernatural evidence in this so decried subject, when it is rightly disposed, through the holy energy of God in the soul; which may be in any or every part or power of the soul, as the soul hath its energy in any and every part of the body. Whence ariseth that great diversity of ἐνεργήματα (which I take liberty to call Seminal Operations) of the Holy Spirit, mentioned in a very accurate diatribe upon this matter by this very Apostle, for the use (as I suppose at least) not of one age of the Church, any more than of that one particular church alone whereto it was immediately addressed, but of all ages of the Church: some of which are more internal, others more external, and all have a peculiar energy, manifestation, and ministration, different from all the rest.

And for farther confirmation of this considerable position, that every faculty hath its proper evidence, as well as its proper object, and that consequently, there may be a security obtained from all fallacy of any kind whatever, there are not lacking arguments a posteriori that I could produce, if it were necessary, and instances in the imaginative faculty of unsuspected truth, κατ' ἐνεργειαν ἐν μετρώ, as the Divine powerful energy is commensurate with it. This faculty was very pre-dominant, or rather exalted in the prophet Ezekiel, more than in Daniel himself, i.e. more masculine and vivid. And it will not be more difficult to answer how he could be secured against the interposition of the spirits of delusion, than it will be how some others may also have been secured from them, and especially upon the consideration of those three grand visions, that of the wheels, that of the dead bones, and that of the temple. He and many others have had this security, notwithstanding that the ordinary rules of providence do permit evil spirits to act in the imagination, wherein Divine visions are also exhibited.

Now that there may not only be such a security, but that we actually have this security, may be made out from several grounds, not easily to be shaken. But, to omit others, I shall here insist on two, that are taken from that very passage in the second epistle to the Thessalonians, to which you have been pleased to refer me, as which, I think, do necessarily flow from the design of the Apostle. For if I know the cause or causes that do expose me to the interposition of evil angels transforming themselves, and to their energy of delusion, I know also certainly, that my security doth consist in removing the said cause or causes. And if a contrary cause must produce a contrary effect, I cannot but know, that if there be the sign of this contrary cause, it would be absurd to expect the same effect.

* It will not be forgotten, that this writer became afterwards the ingenious author of the 'History of Montanism.'—By the way, Fenelon's 'Maxims of the Saints explained,' was omitted to be particularly recommended to the student of Mystical Books, in regard to the orthodox and the spurious of Mystical Doctrine.

Now the causes of the Divine permission of evil angels to interpose themselves, are expressed to be two, (1.) an opposition to the gospel of Christ, and not only so, but even a fixed hatred against it; the opposition being expressed in these words, μη πιστευσαντες τη αληθεια, discrediting the gospel, and the hatred by these, την αγαπην της αληθειας, ουκ εδεξαντο, they admitted not the love of the gospel. (2.) An obdurate impiety expressed by these words, ευδοκισαντες εν τη αδωκια, taking pleasure in unrighteousness, as we translate them, entirely approving, acquiescing, and being possessed by it, resting in it, as in their nature, never, or rarely at least, moving out of it, or beyond it, but still carried towards it by a strong self-propension, with the greatest affection and contentation of mind. This was the case of Pharaoh, and of Ahab, in the Old, and of Simon Magus, in the New Testament, for their infidelity and impiety, being given up by the just judgment of God to believe a delusion, after that they had wilfully resisted the truth.

On the contrary, the causes of Divine protection against the interposition of evil spirits, for to work after this kind, in the deceivableness of unrighteousness, are, (1.) faith, (2.) holiness, as they both are taken here in a lax sense, and in the lowest degree that they can properly be predicated of any subject. Otherwise, the argumentation of this Apostle hereupon would be infirm, the inference that he draws for the support of his beloved charge, would halt in a great measure, and his sacrifice of thanksgiving which he offers unto God for them, would be extremely maimed. (v. 13.) Whence I must conclude, that the very lowest degree of faith, or belief of the truth, and the very least measure of holiness, or sanctification of the spirit, are real, proper, and sufficient preservatives against all fear of diabolical enthusiasm. And that wherever the signs of these are found, but in any degree or measure whatever, there to lay such a charge as this, or even but to insinuate it, is not only most unsafe, but also most unreasonable.

Nay, farther yet, if there be but a possibility of doubt in this matter, through the insensibility of the signs, there may be greater danger to pronounce so severe a sentence, than you, dear Sir, with many others are aware of at present.

Another corollary that I hence deduce, is, that the more intricate points of schism and heresy, are not the proper criterions of such an enthusiasm as this, though they may be the effects of it, and so may, indeed, be made use of as subsequent proofs, where the evidence is plain. For this is the most terrible judgment of God that ever can be inflicted against the most obstinate, and refractory opposers of the Gospel, as in its full latitude, and after the knowledge of it; and therefore cannot be justly declarable against those, who are mistaken in the profession of it, how gross and unhappy soever their mistakes may happen to be. Since also this delivery up to Satan is not for their reformation, but for their destruction, it is upon a full and decisive judgment against them for their former crimes perpetrated. And it would be very hard on the part of a most righteous God, if this were only for points of a disputable nature, that have been and are continually agitated on both sides by men of good will, and wherein it is not impossible for men of learning and probity to be deceived.

And as on the part of God it would be hard, so on the part of man it will be much more so, to set himself up a judge in this critical case; since even he himself can never be so catholic and orthodox in his own sentiment, but that a much greater body of Christians will be against him, than any one that can be for him, (the Church of Rome itself not being excepted), and cannot be safe so much as one moment from falling under this very judgment, with sorcerers and witches, if he should be so unhappy as through inadvertence to mistake in a matter which very few can agree about. For the majority will certainly agree in this, let him take what side he pleaseth, that he is a schismatic, or heretic, if not both. And let him depend upon the infallibility of his own reason, or the infallibility of another's, by what name soever this or that is called, whatever sincerity and love of the truth he may truly pretend to, I do not see how any one can have but a tolerable security of not suffering even in this life, according to the sentence pronounced against the first born of the devil; if either schism alone, or schism with heresy be allowed of, as a true criterion of enthusiasm, when diabolical and when not. Unless the irresistibility of Divine truth (in its strictest sense) be maintained, and likewise the particular application of it, infallibly and irresistibly demonstrated. No other possible security can be invented, and to assert either of these, is, I confess, an enthusiasm that I have not yet reached to. Now God forbid, that I should make myself by this a patron either of schism or of heresy. I know very well the evil and the danger of them; and I bow my knees continually before the God and Father of my Lord Jesus Christ, that he may preserve me from them both, and keep me evermore in the unity of his Holy Spirit, with all the true Israel. This only, I beg leave to say, that all the topics of reasoning that not only are, but can be drawn from either of these, are much too short to infer in any one a diabolical energy.

And that how many and how great soever the arguments may appear, that hence are raised, they cannot amount to a proper criterion of such an enthusiasm as is pretended, nor be accepted as such, without running expressly counter to the design of this Apostle, who maketh it to consist in infidelity and impiety, and in these two when arrived to their crisis. And that these only can be relied on as the inseparable and characteristic notes of all anti-christian delusions, I take to be further manifest from sufficient matter of fact, proving the invalidity of any other: since it is not only possible for such sort of delusions and obsessions of evil spirits to be found there, where there be not the least appearance either of schism or of heresy, but examples of them have likewise actually been that can hardly be disputed. Among which I place Simon Magus and his companions in the first place, while they yet continued visibly in the communion of the Church, and in the fellowship of the Apostles. Whence the Christian Religion fell under the odium of the times for their sakes. And all Christians being thought to be involved in the same crimes with these, were by some good and wise heathens condemned, as well as by the wicked and ignorant.

In the Apostolical Church of Thyatira, as also in that of Pergamus, it is highly probable that they did not separate themselves from the external communion of the saints, or publicly maintain any heretical doctrine against the catholic faith. And it seems that the faithful Thyatirans were therefore reprobated by Christ because they tolerated in their communion persons guilty of such enormous impieties and idolatrous practices; which they were not wanting to cover with some specious pretexes from the false and evil spirit of prophecy, which did strongly move in them. Apoc. ii. 20. Thus it was even in the first and most pure age of the Church. And how it was in the succeeding and more degenerate ages of the Church, you know, Sir, very well. You know what sort of persons were sometimes raised to the chief patriarchal sees, and how Satan (in a more real sense than is ordinarily understood) might be said to have his throne in the temple of God.

I will not now ask what communion there can be betwixt God and Baal? Or how can such as these be the instruments of conveying the Holy Spirit to any? Or why the two mentioned Asiatic Churches should be utterly exterminated for permitting the evil leaven of Balaam and of Jezebel to creep in among their prophets and teachers, and others who have trodden in the same steps should not also be laid in the same bed with them, according to the equal and righteous judgment of God?

These and many questions more would naturally fall in; but I am not willing to be burthened some to you, and do leave them only to your consideration, and your free disposition to take notice of them or not.

XIII.—Now the sum is this: there is a security to be had against the interposition of evil spirits, and that in the imaginative faculty itself. This security is not hard and perplexed, but easy to be obtained, and to be judged of by all Christians. It consisteth in knowing the grounds of God's permission of such evil spirits to interpose and act after this manner, and the preservatives against them. The grounds why God permits evil spirits thus to interpose, are malice against Christ and an abandoned life. The preservatives against their interposition are faith and holiness, though but in an inferior degree and measure. Schism and heresy do not of themselves expose to this danger: they cannot be justly or safely made the presumptive marks of a diabolical energy or enthusiasm. This is no less possible, and no less frequent also (if not more), in the external unity of the true Church, than without it. Wherefore, if the visible unity maintained with the undoubted catholic Church, and the external profession of orthodoxy, can be no manner of security against the greatest of all evils; and some may fall into one or both of those two evils, before mentioned, and yet have still a sufficient security (if they please) of not falling into this last, so long as there is but any sincerity remaining in them; I cannot see how it can be denied, that we may, or actually have a security of this kind that is sufficient for us to rest on, without running into such consequences as you yourself will not be willing to allow of. For it will not be difficult to find out, now there are many living witnesses, whether it has been a life of infidelity or a life of faith, which this person has led; and especially for these thirty years past, wherein she lays claim to the more immediate familiarities with the true Spirit, whether it has been a life of impiety or a life of angelical sanctity; whether she has had pleasure in unrighteousness, or rather in righteousness. If the former be found true, then is there no security; but if the latter be true, then is there all the security that can justly be demanded or expected. This security is stronger than miracles themselves. It is all that God is pleased to give, even for the discernment of pretended miracles, in that most perilous case instanced in by the Apostle. And though it may be indeed possible for some persons that are neither wicked, nor unbelieving the Gospel, to be hurried beyond themselves by the efforts of a natural enthusiasm, innate or accidental; yet it is as impossible for any but the maliciously wicked, and the perversely unbelieving, to be delivered up to that which is diabolical, as it is impossible for God to deceive.

Nay, should they be sometimes even exposed to this, by the course of Divine justice, for some wilful misdemeanour against the truth and holiness of God, it would yet be impossible for his good Spirit to leave them to the ravage of the Evil one, before they shall have filled up the measure of their iniquities, and not to set bounds to the incursions of the disguised enemy.

Such a security then there is in this present matter, as great as the justice and truth of God himself.

Since if we have received not the love of the truth, or if we have rather believed it, when and so far as it is made manifest, our consciences must answerably condemn or acquit us. And it cannot but be known to the persons concerned, if they have rejected obstinately the sanctification, or sanctifying energy of the Divine Spirit, or if they have embraced it, in order to the attainment of the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ, whereof such frequent mention is by them made. And if this may be known to the persons themselves, (as it is known to them infallibly,) so may it be known likewise to others, according as the external demonstrations are given of either.

As for my own part, I stand before the judgment seat of Christ. But it is well known what my exterior life has been, and my interior is known where it ought to be, I dare not justify myself: for if I do, my justification is not true. Only give me leave to observe, dear Sir, that you herein so unawares justify me, while you most condemn me. Since if I were truly under the energy of Satan, it must have been in vain that you have taken so much pains to recover me; and all endeavours of this kind must of necessity be frustraneous, being directly opposite to the expressed will of the Sovereign Judge.

XIV.—Another general prejudice there is against these writings, that they were not penned by the person under whose name they are published, but by another, and by one also that was censured publicly for doctrines and practices of an evil nature.

And here I must confess, that so much is said, and so well laid together, that had it been a matter of fact some hundreds of years ago, I could never have resisted the force of so many probabilities amassed together, but must have surrendered myself to your sentiment. Which I cannot now do, because the matter is fresh, and because the most plausible conjecture will avail nothing against real experience, and sensible demonstration.

For the plain truth is this. I find it was the constant course of my mother to write down with her own hand day by day, all her own experiences and discoveries, with several memorandums also relating to her external as well as internal life. This was observed by her so long as it pleased God to permit her the use of her eyes, which was for almost a year after I was brought to be acquainted with her. In which time she described in secrecy with her own pen, the Treatise of the "Eight Worlds" (the original of which so written I do keep by me), with some other things not yet published. But since the loss of her sight, (occasioned by the intense exercise of her head in meditation and recollection and by much writing) she has been constrained to dictate to another, and not always to the same, but to several persons. In which her great expediteness in all subjects and upon all difficulties before her, is not a little remarkable.

She had indeed for some years the assistance of a man of letters, who accidentally (if a Christian may use this word) contributed much to the preservation of the greatest part of her Diary.

For whereas what she wrote was in loose slips of paper, like the Sibilline leaves, he transcribed them for his own private use, without any thoughts of their publication: whence in haste he frequently copied the very grammatical errors, and false orthography, leaving void spaces for the words he could not read, some of which were filled up by her own hand, but others not. And upon comparing the originals that remain with the copies, I do not find any interpolation of words to make them look more pompous, any variation of the style, or of the sense, (except through mistakes in the punctuation,) this being only to be confessed as to the former, that he sometimes transposes the verb to the former part of the sentence, with which my mother useth to close it.

Whereby while he renders the style a little more familiar and natural to the ear, it is indeed broken and made more languid. Of which I could bring instances not a few, if it were worth the while to stand upon such little niceties.

There are also omissions in the copy of a word, of a line, and even, though rarely, of an entire sentence. Yea, some of the loose cartels were forgot to be written by him (where some whole dates are omitted), and others are verbatim twice written over.

The very first book which she published, being the Heavenly Cloud, (printed 1681, that very year when her friend died,) was printed off from her own hand, and never transcribed by him, nor indeed so much as revised as to the prose. And I dare appeal to you, Sir, whether the style be not the same in this book, with that which is in her late printed Diary, and even in the very parts of it which being lost in the original, could be found only in the copy.

For some parts of it are printed from the original itself, where the copy happened to be lost; for the evidence of which you may see June 20th, 1676, p. 253, vol. i.; and June 30th, '76, p. 256, with the note at end of the former, to omit others.

But had there been no such evidence to be brought that my mother is indeed the author, next to that spirit (whatever) by which she is conducted, of what has been published under her name; yet have I daily undoubted proofs of her capacity to write in such a style, and that upon all sorts of cases and subjects, that have been presented to her from abroad, by persons of several nations, ranks, and qualities.

XV.—But notwithstanding this, a considerable doubt will still remain, if her friend were truly such a one as some would have him to be. But I have made the most narrow search into his life that I am able to do, without the least partiality or favour, and I cannot find him guilty of that black charge, most barbarously laid against him. As he was not exempted from human passions and infirmities, so he showed himself not an indolent combatant in the Christian warfare. And from all that I can possibly learn, I must believe him to have been a person of much integrity, of very deep experience in spiritual matters, and of most worthy and holy aims. Such an one was this Dr. John Pordage, that was ejected out of the living of Bradfield, by Cromwell's commissioners, in a most arbitrary and illegal manner.

But whatever he might have been in 1654, and before that, it is possible that in the space of twenty years, and those too under the Cross, he might become a new man. For it is not till about that time, as I perceive, that his familiar friendship began with my mother.

It being in August, 1673 or 74, (the date differently through mistake entered in two places) that they first agreed to wait together in prayer and pure dedication. And from this time till his death, his conversation was such as malice itself can hardly except against, he pressing forward to the most perfect state that is attainable, though not without the sense of his imperfections, and of the manifold temptations of Satan. And in the year 1675 I find remarked under his own hand, how many years he had been earnestly striving after the heavenly pattern contained in the Gospel, complaining how he had fallen short of it, and giving the reason whence this defect proceeded. I find several other private remarks relating to his internal state, by him made, which do invincibly (as to me) demonstrate that he could be no hypocrite; that he was not one fit to manage clandestine designs, that he was not imposed on by lying spirits, and that he was guilty neither of those doctrines nor practices, with which some have charged him.

He has written a Treatise against the errors of the Quakers, and has fundamentally overthrown the principles of Rantism in another of his unpublished books. From which, and his other remains, it doth appear, that he was an impartial seeker, and hearty lover of truth. Yet as he was one that desired, as he says himself, to hold the just balance with the even weights, so it will be evident to every one that examines his case, that he indeed met with from others false weights and measures. This you cannot but discover yourself, if you consult but his very accusers: there is such a confusion amongst them, such a disordinate passion, such a plain wresting of words, such a ridiculous report of matters, and throughout such an unchristian demeanour, as doth recoil upon their own heads, and so do hurt these more than his.

Instances whereof are evidently to be found in the author of Famalism arising out of the bottomless pit, in the Demonium Meridionum of Mr. Fowler, and even in Mr. Baxter himself, though with far greater moderation, than either of the others, and but at the second hand. If you read his Apology, called Innocency appearing, to which the second pretends to be an answer, you will find a distinct relation of the matter of fact, that is principally disputed, concerning the apparitions both of evil and good spirits, and the manner of the openings of the two contrary kingdoms or worlds, as it came to pass by the will of God in the Autumn of 1649; which was also lately reprinted by Mr. Edward Stephens in a Treatise concerning witches, etc. [Son-in-law of Judge Hale, and author of "Ancient Ascetics."]

And truly having considered not superficially both the printed accounts, and what other corroborating evidence I have met with from several persons, that could be exactly acquainted with it, one of whom was then of All Souls College, and went with another Fellow of the same college to Bradfield, to make on purpose an inquiry into the truth of this matter, they being both of them persons of an unblemished piety, and also of a good understanding.

I must freely say, I see as much reason to confound Simon Magus and Simon Peter, as to confound Everard the sorcerer, and Pordage the divine, together. St. Peter resisted and overcame his adversary, who had hypocritically insinuated himself to be a visible member of the church; so did Dr. Pordage also by virtue of that promise, (not appropriated to the Apostles alone, but to every true Christian,) resist the devil and he will fly from you. This, and no other, was the case of Bradfield.

But it was not an easy combat; there was required to it, continual watching and praying, without any interruption, for whole weeks together: while one slept, others watched and prayed in their turns, and whensoever there was but the least flagging, the enemy as I have heard presently prevailed, and recruited his force. But though by the grace of God, and name of Jesus, he was constrained to fly with his wicked instrument, yet did not his malice here expire, but lay a new plot, which took effect five years after, by the intemperate zeal of those times, and some personal piques (which it has been always ordinary to cover with the cause of religion), that must not be raked up afresh.

But herein I except Mr. Fowler, in whom I believe it might be pure zeal, for the most part. Of which he (or any one) could not give a more signal instance, than in the present case, all matters duly weighed. However had the Doctor been never so guilty, it would, I think, have been of far better report, if any other had undertaken the cause, than one that is said on many accounts to be obliged to him, and to have been raised through his means from an indigent state to what he then was, so as even to sit as a judge on his quondam friend, while he also made himself both a party and witness, for the surer dispatch.

Thus an ungoverned zeal transcends all limits, and especially when it flows from rigid principles. For it is no wonder if one that took pleasure in denouncing of hell and damnation not only as infinite, but as inevitable also, and that even according to principles, condemned them who knew not their right hand from their left to an irreversible destruction, so as in the flight of an enthusiasm, to fancy the very place of everlasting terrors to be paved with the souls of little children; it is no wonder, I say, if such a one (if it be true what is reported generally concerning this Durus Pater) should be transported into a paroxysm of zeal, upon hearing of matters so extraordinary, so little understood, so misrepresented, and lastly so loaded with other criminal charges.

But notwithstanding what this severe judiciary hath brought to invalidate the solemn appeal to God, made by the Doctor, when there was no redress to be expected on the earth, and a re-hearing of his cause which was sued for, had been denied to him; since he would never afterwards withdraw this appeal, by appealing again to man, or returning an answer to the accusations of the Demonium, I dare not offer to put in my plea against it, but must let it rest there where it is. And therefore also I shall omit many things that might pertinently enough be urged on this behalf, for the setting right so distorted a case.

This one thing only I cannot but mention, which in other cases is constantly allowed of as a certain evidence of credibility in the person, and which the special Providence of God hath here favoured me with, beyond what I could ever have expected or desired to have found. I find there among the papers of his which are fallen into my hands, (some of which were never designed to be seen by any,) several unquestionable marks of an undesigning honesty. And I must needs observe, that he is so far from concealing his own faults and imperfections, (as a cunning impostor would have done,) as that he has in sundry places taken shame to himself, and given glory thereby to God, by the act of his own hand. And this he hath done when there could be no invitation (so much as presumed) for so doing, unless from a generous and open principle that moved in him, and the holy conduct of the Spirit of Truth. Hence he did transcribe several admonitions, reprehensions, and even some prophetic threatenings, that were expressly levelled against himself. And were the cases never so secret, to which these did respect, he was never less faithful, or less diligent to preserve them, doubtless for caution and instruction.

Neither could he indeed hide his infirmities, as far as I can learn, would he never so fain. He confesseth ingenuously the dulness of his soul to comprehend or express what was revealed to him in the Spirit. He cautioneth against confounding the ratiocinations of his mind, with the illuminations of the Spirit. He complaineth of his inadvertence, of the irregularity of his natural fire, of his elevation for some time, and of his too great activity at another. He reporteth of himself in his Treatise of the Dark World, how that not many years after his ejection out of the living of Bradfield, a most terrible voice came to him and said, Take this unprofitable servant, and cast him into outer darkness. And how that immediately hereupon, he was snatched away thither in spirit, and made to feel there the heavy strokes of Divine justice, so as to be able thence to describe that world in the manner that he hath done.

Where he owns, even after all the Divine enjoyments and communications, which he had had, that he was still but an unworthy servant in the eye of God, and had strictly merited to be cast alive into hell, according to that dreadful sentence, which was sounded in his ear, as from the Sovereign Judge. And if this be the mark of an impostor or of a wizard, I must confess, that such a one was this known (or rather unknown) person.

But neither is this all, there are many other corroborating circumstances of his veracity, in this particularly, which can be produced, if need require. And I must say, if he were not innocent of these charges against him, it may behave us perhaps to consider well how to clear holy Job, and David; of whom it is probable that they were made in like manner to undergo the pains of hell in their souls for a season.

This lasted upon him, by fits, for some years: during which times the heavens were shut to him, and he continually exposed to the buffeting and scourgings of Satan, so that he was enabled to write as he solemnly saith, what he had in those dismal regions heard, and seen, and felt, and tasted. And in this very Treatise he taketh sufficient notice in a few lines of the injustice of the Demonium.

Upon all which considerations, and many others that might be instanced, were I to write an Apology, I am (after the most exact enquiry that it is possible to make) fully convinced that this very Dr. John Pordage, who is so much blackened, though he was like other men not quite free from human passions and frailties, yet was a man truly fearing God, and hating a lie: yea, that he was a laborious searcher after truth, and utterly incapable to be the father of such a grand imposture as is surmised.

XVI.—But there remains still a nearer prejudice against these writings, that is, supposing them not to have been contrived by another head, nor forged upon another's anvil, yet there is ground enough to suspect their original, from the style itself, wherein they are composed, and principally from the honourable mention there is made in them of magic, against the practice of the primitive Christians, who condemned all sorts of it, as well the white, as the black.

This is indeed a very considerable exception; if you have taken here this word in that proper and most determinate sense, according to which it is used in these writings throughout. But give me leave to say, that I very much doubt whether you have done so: and it is no wonder if upon a cursory view, we frequently mistake an author's sense, and find there our own meaning, where there is it may be just the contrary. I have done so myself, (and even in this very case too,) and therefore can pardon it in another.

And let it not seem strange to you, Sir, if my mother do no less condemn, the white magic, so called, than the primitive Christians did themselves. Sure I am that she doth in that sense, which it is commonly taken in. For the whole scope of her writings is clearly against all manner of intercourse even with good demons and angels, by the means of certain religious rites and invocations; and against every degree of communion, confederacy, and familiarity with these (could it be obtained without such rites), but in and through the Spirit of Jesus; whereby she agrees exactly with the sense of the primitive Christians, and is no less distant from the Porphyrian magic, than they were, when both are rightly understood. But more peculiarly this is the design of the Treatise of the Enochian Walks with God, where this very subject of the communion of saints and of angels, is expressly delivered, and the method of attaining to this communion is proposed according to her own experience.

Whence if there were any of this evil science in her, it would certainly be found here, if anywhere.

Whereas the quite contrary is found, and no society is recommended with them, otherwise than as in the body of Jesus Christ, and no way to arrive to this blessed society declared but the life of Christ.

So that consequently she condemneth all demonolatry of the Paganizing Christians, ancient and modern, and all that εθλοθρησκια, and all that pomp of worshipping of angels, which was condemned by the Apostle in those of Colosse, by her making the body of Christ the sole medium, and vehicle (if I may so say) of communication with beatified spirits, and assigning no other mediational natures for the recalling up the soul to the Deity, than this one in him, wherein the pleroma of it (and of nature also) did corporally reside.

And that false humility, which is the foundation of this sort of magic, is so diametrically opposite to the very character and spirit of these writings, that were all the libraries of Europe to be searched, it would be hard to find any, (since the days of the Apostles) that have less of it, or that do more directly press into the very bosom and heart of Jesus.[1]

For this counterfeit humility doth variously transform itself, and is more or less to be discovered in most writers, even in them of the very best fame, as being the mother of a twin-offspring that at one time or other do govern all mankind (viz. superstition and infidelity) under several disguises or mazes, by the fair names of piety and prudence. By which it is most evident, that it could never be the intent of these writings to honour this magic, which is called white, whose very foundation they do entirely overturn, or the meaning of the author to introduce into Christianity a cult of demons, which is so contrary to what she everywhere drives at, of doing all things in the name and power of the Lord Jesus.

Which alone is to me a sufficient characteristic of the truth of her spirit, and of her estrangement from whatever savours of the pretended angelical art, the Ars Paulina, or the Key of Solomon.

My curiosity, I confess, has led me heretofore to look into these, and by this I am the better able to judge in a matter of this nature. For indeed among all the prayers I have seen in such sort of curious books, printed or manuscript, which are many, some of which prayers are also very excellent, as to their substance, I do not remember so much as one that was offered up to the Father, in the name of the Son, explicitly or implicitly. This is the fundamental error of the magic which the ancient Christians so much condemned, and which to this day, (as I am well informed,) is really practised by many nominal Christians, even of great rank. And for this very cause, I cannot but place an exceeding value upon the greatest part of the Collects of the English Liturgy, as which seem most directly levelled against this practical error, and so likewise on these or any other writings, that tend so much to the exaltation of the mediational dignity of our blessed Saviour, as might be demonstrated.

Therefore the word magic, in these writings, is not to be taken in any sense contrary to the practice or the belief of the first Christians.

But if you would know in what sense it ought to be taken, you need do no more than admit the author's own explication of it. The word, Magia, saith she, in a marginal note to a book, the most obnoxious of any, is the created power of the Holy Ghost, so to be understood as often as named.—Rev. Rev. p. 51. And again, in another marginal note, she saith, Magia is the faith of the operation [energy] of the Holy Ghost. From which it is clear, she means such a Divine faith as was in the Apostolical Church, being begotten in the soul by the inhabitation of the Holy Ghost, and of the gift of Christ, to give a demonstration (both internally and externally) of his kingdom, and of the subjection of all nature and creature to his all-powerful will. And however this may have been degraded, or condemned by the after and corrupter ages of Christianity, I humbly conceive that it was not so by the first and purest. [See Freher's Treatises, and Law's "Way to Divine Knowledge" for the full justification of Behmen's word Magic.]

XVII.—The other exceptions that are brought against the style of this author, are of far less moment, and might be enervated without any difficulty, by a bare explication of the terms that give offence. And though they should appear to be borrowed many of them from the customs of unjustifiable curiosities, there is no reason that I know, why it should be a more just prejudice against these, than against some others that are to be found in the Old Testament, and also in the New.

Both Judicial Astrologers and Alchymists do find in these, what is very consonant to their style. The Chaldee Oracles I understand not: but when they were made use of by the enemies of Christianity, who knew how to counterfeit and interpolate them for their turn, it was then very reasonable to censure them. In the old Platonic divinity there may be as much truth, I am apt to think, as either in the old Aristotelic, or modern Cartesian divinity. I am sure the style of the first is more agreeable to the primitive antiquity of our Christian religion, than either of the last. And if this be any objection at all against my mother's style, it will be as good against Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, etc. Whether it be so or no against St. John, I do not say.

As for the style of the modern enthusiasts, and all that you bring under that denomination, let them speak for themselves. But, however, a true and a false prophet may have the same manner of speaking; and the same character of style, may be exactly imitated by persons of a quite contrary design. You instance only in JACOB BEHME, who is little understood by any; for whom there is much to be said, to prove him to have been no enthusiast at all, in your sense of the word. I am told that the learned Zimmerman has written a very judicious Apology for him, against a certain professor at Frankfort. And I know a person of great accuracy of thought, and coolness of mind, as well as of a most holy and primitive life, [FREHER? See Roach's Great Crisis, p. 111.] who is undertaking to render him intelligible, by a true and genuine representation of his Principles, both of Divinity and Philosophy, after having read all his books in the original more than ten times, though not without the greatest disgust imaginable in the beginning.

And yet I do not find, that J. B. doth any where attribute a sacredness to his style; but on the contrary supposeth it to be full of faults of his own, which he was willing to correct, by the advice of learned men, his friends. Whence, living in a place and age wherein Paracelsian chemistry was greatly favoured by many, it is no wonder if he was persuaded to make use of its terms, when they were proper.

XVIII.—And indeed there is not a greater, and perhaps more grievous mistake, than to imagine, that every person inspired by God, is infallibly directed in the use of the phrases and words that do express this inspiration. For from this, once allowed, many bad consequences will naturally flow, which you can see into without my particularizing them. So that should these which are objected be real faults in the style, and not only these, but several others unmentioned, yet it is still possible for the substance of the inspiration itself that is here laid claim to, to be true.

That this is really so, and that God doth actually accommodate himself to the infirmities, (yea, and prejudices) of the instrument which he takes up, is not difficult I think to be made out from the histories of Moses, of Joshua, the Prophets, yea from that of the Apostles themselves. Now this is all that is pretended to, that the matter of the Revelation, where it is delivered as a revelation, be true: and that the manner of expressing it has been sufficiently taken care for, yet not superfluously. Had the latter been more accurate, I should not the less, but more have suspected it. The Alcoran of Mahomet is said to have been written in a far better style, than the Gospel of Jesus Christ: and you know there are some who tax his Apostles for writing like barbarians, who do not hereby think that they lessen their authority, or deny that they were guided by the Holy Spirit; and consequently maintain the matter which they deliver to be no less worthy of regard, than if all the syllables were externally dictated as by a local voice, wherefore I proceed to your exceptions against the matter.

XIX.—But as the imperfections of style are no justifiable prejudice against the sacred authority of the matter revealed, so neither is every mistake in the matter itself derogatory to the principal design of the author, though truly inspired. Justice requires of me, that I should distinguish betwixt matters less principal and accessory, and them that are fundamental and essential; betwixt what is delivered as an express word of revelation, and that which may be only a deduction made from it, by that soul to whom the revelation came; and lastly betwixt what may be conditional and what positive in a revelation, what mutable and what immutable, what in nature and what above nature. And if the foundation be but true, though some errors should be found in the superstructure, I shall not be much concerned at them. For if that be Divine, it must abide when whatever is of human production superstructed upon it, shall be burned up, notwithstanding it might come from a very innocent and good meaning. Instances whereof are to be found among such, whom the catholic Church hath ever accounted for saints, and lights in their generation.

So if what is essential and given as a clear express word of revelation fail not, and if what is positive, immutable, and above nature declared by this word, can stand the test, we are not obliged I think, thence to invalidate this that is so in any writer, [N.B.] though what is accessory and matter of deduction only, should indeed fail, and what is conditional, mutable, and in nature, should seem to suffer loss. St. Cyprian may have been truly illuminated, and have had many of the more extraordinary Divine favours, visions, and voices, yet is it possible for him to have been mistaken in the point of rebaptization, and in his revelation about the elements to be consecrated in the eucharist. Yet do I not positively say, that he was so, much less dare I be so bold with this holy martyr as some Protestant writers are, being satisfied that he was far from being either a dreamer or a cheat.

St. Chrysostome was a burning light in the catholic Church, and had, for certain, true inspirations himself, and excited others also to believe and wait for the same. Yet was he certainly mistaken in the prophecy of his return from his exile. Of St. Austin I doubt not in the least, but that he was converted by a revelation, and that he was also afterwards followed by sensible Divine teachings and intellectual openings, if what he has written of these (in his book, de Magistro especially) can be credited, there is no question to be made. But I do not therefore think that he was guided at all times without error, or that there was no need for him to write a book of retractions.

Besides these three instances, there are others no less obvious in antiquity; whence I cannot but greatly admire at the vulgar apprehension of inerrability to accompany all them who at certain times have been inspired by the Holy Ghost, for a private or public good, no less than at that of some others, of thinking impeccability to be a consequent of regeneration, or an effect of the ordinary Divine grace, since there appears to me one and the same bottom for both of these. And therefore I do not see but that there is as much need of a spiritual as of a natural discernment, according to the diversity of the object, whether from revelation or reason.

Nor would it be more unreasonable to reject the many excellent natural truths that are to be found in the most rational writers, which they have learnt from the common light of mankind, by a due application thereof, for the sake only of some errors with which they may be mixed, through either an inapplication or misapplication to the said standard; than to cast away (or but undervalue) those Supernatural Truths which are to be found in the best spiritual writers, which they have learnt from the Divine light, the true Light of the world, by the means of a right conversion to it, and application of it, for the cause only of some mistake committed in the use of this superior standard.

And if in the former the error may be discerned by its proper light, which is reason; so likewise in the latter may it be discovered by its proper light, which is the Spirit of God, when rightly attended to.

Nor is this any greater disparagement to the true Spirit than it is to true reason.

In some sense it may be said, every man is, or may be infallible; but in another none is, and perhaps cannot be while we are in these bodies.

And truly I am so far from easily attributing infallibility to any one, howsoever highly illuminated and favoured, that I do indeed doubt whether in its strict sense it can be applicable to any but Christ himself.

That the Apostles themselves might be mistaken, both in understanding of the Scriptures, and of their own revelations also, sometimes (without derogating from the foundation of the Christian faith), there are two notorious instances which I think render it more than probable. The one is of St. James, the brother of our Lord, the most stiff assertor of the perpetual obligation of the Mosaic law, grounded upon some expressions in it, and confirmed by the catholic interpretation thereof.

The other is of the great St. Paul, who having had a particular revelation of the glorious return of our blessed Lord, seems to suppose it to have been then very near, and by consequent hereof, to confound as it were the impendant fate of Jerusalem with that of the whole world, a private with an universal judgement, and a temporal deliverance of the Church with the general resurrection of the saints. Whence I conclude, that it is possible for them who are at some times extraordinarily assisted by the Holy Ghost, and even filled with it, to err nevertheless, in matters both of faith and practice, where they suffer themselves to be guided either by tradition (oral or written) or by particular inductions of their own, drawn from that which is of revelation.

And thus it is not so extremely to be wondered at, that Nicholas the Deacon, a person full of the Holy Ghost, was misled himself, or at least was the occasion of misleading others into a pernicious error, by a mistake by him (or them) committed in the latter. This to keep all humble, and that every one take heed not to exceed the measure of the Spirit given to them, or to frustrate it by succedaneous sentiments, either of others or of themselves, which has been often done.

XX.—But how it is in the present case, I shall leave you to determine, when I shall have represented the matter as it is, and not as it may at first seem to be.

There are three points which you take notice of, and call antiquated heresies, which I shall say nothing to vindicate in this place, but only set them in their true light; whether it be heresy or truth, new or old. The first charge is of Gnosticism, from the seeming to introduce a female personality into the Deity. The truth is this: she useth to speak of Wisdom in the same manner as doth Solomon in his Proverbs, and the author of the Book of Wisdom: yea, as Christ himself doth, Matt. xi. 19. Upon the reading of the first, she had her first vision: and this was the representation of her under a female figure, presenting the book of the Holy Trinity, and promising to unseal the same.

This she supposeth to be as an Effluence or Glance from the whole Deity, but principally from the Father, or αυτοθεος, the original source of existence and power, and it may be called agreeably to her sense by these several names, Speculum Trinitatis, the Tabernacle of God, the Eternal Schecinah, the Heavenly Bethel, the φως απροσitos, the Throne of God, the Mundus Divinus, the Vehicle or Chariot of the Divine nature, the Chasmal of Ezekiel, the Hand of God, and more expressly still, the Right Hand of God where Christ sitteth. In the famous prayer of Solomon, it is called Shamaim, and addressed to by him, 1 Kings, viii. 32. And in the prodigal's confession, ο θυρανος, Luke, xv. 18., many other names are given to it by the sacred writers, by philosophers, and by the illuminati, in the confessedly purest and most infallible ages of the Church. Some expressing one character or property, and some another, of this holy Divine principle, through which God is conceived by them to descend into Nature, and to clothe himself as it were with Nature. This is believed by my mother to be as the matrix of all immortal spirits; and more eminently with a particular regard to man, the true mother church, the matricula and fountain της παλιγγενειας, that must be entered or rather re-entered into by all, and the womb of the morning of the resurrection, which was seen in an allegory by one Apostle, Gal. iv. 26., and in a vision by another, Rev. xxi. 2.

She calleth this by a harsh expression, the Spouse or Bride of God; yet not without the warrant of the ancient Prophets and Apostles.

She distinguisheth as to this, the inexistence in God from eternity, and the figurative manifestation in time. Of the former she says, that it lay hid in the Triune Deity (tanquam in semine planta); of the latter, it was taken into God's bosom. I do not know that she anywhere expressly calls it a Goddess; but amidst some hundreds of places in her writings where this Eternal Virgin nature is mentioned, in only one I find it said, she may be termed so (φύσις θεα, 2 Pet. i. 14.), by reason of her near relation to the Godhead.* But neither is this there said simply, without any restriction: for to prevent all manner of suspicion of an evil meaning, or of transformed paganism in the word, this very limitation is added, in a high and sober sense. And it is directly opposed to the attributing Divine honours to the blessed virgin Mary, whom yet none will strictly call by this name, or Queen of heaven, but only derivatively. Yet, however, had such a limitation of the word been omitted, if the reason of the Apostle be just, 1 Cor. viii. 9., as also of Christ himself, John, x. 34, 35, 36., it might not have been so altogether indefensible as it doth at first, appear. This Virgin Divine nature she maketh to be the true mother or manifestatrix of Christ before he was born of the blessed virgin Mary. But as she distinguishes betwixt the hidden inexistence and the figurative manifestation of this Divine nature, so consequently of the Divine Word also, by it manifested. And therefore, as she clearly supposeth not only an eternal co-existence and inexistence of the Word, with and in the majesty of the Father, while yet unmanifested in the creature, as Λογος ενδιαιετος, or the ΜΙΝΔ, but also a visible figuration of this very Word before time and creature, in eternity indeed, but yet not from all eternity properly, in order to a manifestation thereof in the creature and time, as the Λογος προφορομηνος, or IMAGE of this mind.

* From what is herein contained, there can now be no manner of doubt of the justness of Law's observations on the Philadelphians, and that BEHMEN is the mother of Pordage and Lead, as illuminati; whose originality consists in the creaturely form or idiosyncratic peculiarity of their conceptions, deductions, or 'revelations,' whether just or otherwise, and their great devotion; as referred to in the second paragraph of the Annotation, p. 148.

Hence according to this latter, she asserts Christ to be born, or manifested in a glorious figure, out of the Virgin nature of the unmanifested Σοφια. And this manifestation or birth is called the beginning of the works of God, the first born of the creatures, the Divine image, the eternal Adam, the Heavenly Humanity, and the Son of Man which came down from heaven.

By means whereof she believes that Christ did really appear to Adam, to Enoch, to Noah, to Abraham, to Moses, and to most of the patriarchs and prophets. So that her meaning is, that as Christ was born of the Virgin Mary in the frail figure of our sinful flesh, so he was also actually before brought forth in another more glorious figure by another Virgin, not of the earth, earthly, but of the heaven, heavenly, containing in it the primogenial matter and life, out of which all created beings were afterwards to proceed. And that this was the Similitude after which Adam was created in his original purity and beauty, which is called by Moses the similitude (or form) of God, and expressly the God of Israel, Exod. xxiv. 10, and by Ezekiel several times, the glory of Jehovah, and perhaps by the apostle μορφη του Θεου, Phil. ii. 6. And was the Goel [or kinsman] of Job, that was seen and believed in by him, chaps. 19, 25, chaps. 41, 11, 5. And the proper medium of communication betwixt God and man in all ages. The glory that appeared in the Jewish temple sitting betwixt the cherubims, and the tree of life in the superior paradise, on which Adam ought to have fed had he not sinned, thence called the bread that came down from heaven, (i.e. that of Paradise,) the bread of God, the hidden manna, as being most emphatically the Ζωη, and the Λογος Ζωης upon which the whole system Λογος, that is angels and men must live, is very often clearly insinuated in these writings.

Her meaning is, that Christ had a celestial form before he had a terrestrial, both generated from a Virgin nature, by the omnipotent Father. In the former of which he gave forth his laws and rules to Moses and the prophets. As also Justine, M. Theophilus Antioch. Tertull. Cyprian, Euseb. Cæsar, (besides Origen,) do:

And in the fullness of time was superinvested by the terrestrial, for the transformation and glorification of our vile forms. She denies not any where Christ to be the Wisdom of God, as well as the offspring of Wisdom: that is, according to this manifestation. But as the Nicene Fathers themselves thought it no robbery to style Christ, Light of Light, though he be called the Light. So also she thinks it none to call him the Wisdom of Wisdom, or to say that he is generated out of the Wisdom (and Light) of the Father, though he be also rightly called the Wisdom.

She means not to assert any diversity of sex in the Deity, as the Gentiles and Gnostics did, who is so far from it, as to think that it did not even appertain to the created Humanity in its first and best state, which was paradisiacal, and that it shall again cease to be in the state of the resurrection.

Whether her sentiment be true, or no, I am not concerned, but thus much at least it proves, that she can never be guilty of such a gross imagination as she is charged with; and by consequence that there ought to be a presumption rather for, than against her, where some metaphorical and symbolical expressions are made use of, that are capable of more senses than one. This would be allowed in another case, therefore, I hope it will not be denied here. Since then it will not be unreasonable to interpret these expressions, or the like according to the analogy of the sentiments of an Author; since the sacred writers themselves, do (under a veil) frequently attribute human passions and members to the Deity, which are interpreted in a high and sober sense; since the appellation of male and female, when appropriated to the Divine Being are equally improper. Since, that the affections of both are attributed to it in holy Scripture, according to a sound meaning, and that not only in the prophetic writings, but in the very epistles of the Apostles. Since the common name of God in the book of Job, seems to be of a feminine termination, and no less, also, possibly that most high and lofty name of JAH, so frequent in the book of Psalms; and since the female doth constitute part of the Divine character in pure and undefiled nature, as well as the male, she being designed as the glory and crown of the head; and lastly, since the glory of God may be considered distinct from God himself, (though in him and out of him,) Heb. i. 3, it doth not appear why her words should be interpreted in a low and gross sense, when they are capable of an higher, which is neither dissonant from Scripture, or antiquity, nor derogatory to the simplicity and spirituality of the Divine Being.

And in this high sense, she supposeth the glory of God to have pre-existed in God, as Eve did in Adam, before the Αναναγμα thereof did break forth in the visible person of the Λογος, and was produced as out of the womb of this glory, being no other than the Eternal Wisdom itself, (called by her both a Virgin and a Mother,) going forth into manifestation in the said glorious Person, by whom all things were made, and without whom nothing was made, that was made. He being properly Χαρακτρ της του Θεου, in his laying the foundation of all things and still upholding the same, as her writings do elsewhere declare. And whether this may not be the meaning of Tertullian, to whom you refer me in another case, may, perhaps, deserve to be a little considered. Who in his book against Hermogenes, as if either he had conversed with my mother, or my mother with him [!], writes thus :—

Prophetiae et Apostoli tradunt primo SOPIAM conditam initia viarum in opera ipsius. De hinc et sermonem prolatum, perquem omnia facta sunt, et sine quo factum est nihil. c. 18.23.49.

Whether he delivers this as his own private sense, or whether as an apostolical tradition; and whether what he has written in other books concerning the Divine body, ought to be understood so grossly, as it is generally, and not rather soberly, and in the same, (or near the same) with the former, according to catholic prescription, I leave to be considered. But if this Father's meaning in his controversial writings against the heretics of his age, as to this be either defensible or excusable, then is not my mother's cause so bad as you might imagine, even there where it has been thought the weakest.

Indeed his and her meaning are so akin, that I cannot distinguish them asunder: and I have not been wanting in diligence to find out what is truly hers, or in sincerity to represent the same, that so judgment may pass on it accordingly.

XXI.—But there is another block of stumbling, which is (and unless this block can be removed, all that was said besides will be to no purpose,) that she is inconsistent with herself. Now whatever foundation there may be for such a charge against her, in any other particular, I dispute not: but in this I can see none. Well, doth she not make the Virgin Wisdom born under the planets Sol and Venus, the planets created by her own son? If she doth so, I will confess all that you would have me to do. And if she doth not, I confide that the great generosity and integrity of your soul will not let you be ashamed to acknowledge that you have misunderstood her, and also that it will incline you more strongly than ever to forgive another when mistaken.

It is true that she doth make use of these terms, which did indeed shock me for some considerable time; but withal she premonisheth to take them in a sober sense, and expressly declares but a few lines before, that she intended not by the planetary names what the astrologers did, or the inferior and visible planets, which they make to have the dominion over man, so long as he is in subjection to the curse. But the superior and invisible ones, which are so many Divine powers, properties, attributes, modes, energies, etc., which do deliver from the curse. Moreover it is evident, that she speaks not of the nativity of wisdom, as in eternity, but only as in time; not of her origination before the world, but of her manifestation in the world; not of her first manifestation in this our orb, but of her descent again into it, after that she had been constrained (by the fall) to forsake it; not of the process of the Divine form (or beauty) through the universal system of beings, which was in the beginning, but of that in one particular order of them, and which is yet to be in the end.

She speaks of its renovation, restitution, reproduction, and regeneration, evidently supposing an antecedent rise and formation, as is clear, both from the main drift of that very book whence this objection is started, and the passage itself to which I suppose it may refer. The words are these: Wherefore it is all-worthy to be enquired, in what planet the nativity of the Virgin may be again RENEWED? which must be by bright Venus, which must bring forth the mighty birth under Sol; in conjunction with the rest of the SUPERIOR planets, which are all harmonized in one, etc. Rev. p. 24. And in the MS., with some little variation, I read thus: Which must be by serene Venus, that must bring forth the mighty birth under bright Sol, etc.

Again, presently after, these words also do occur: The Divine mould for her SHAPE is again found according to what was BEFORE either angels or men were formed, which is not to be portrayed till she come to be essentially manifested within it.

From which it is evident, I think, that she can mean nothing but a certain manifestation to the soul of man, not superficial, but essential, of some pre-existent substance that is spiritu-corporeal. But to express what is her mind hereby (depending upon a thorough understanding of that whole book, and of the nature and progress of the Divine kingdom which she expects), cannot be done in a few words.

The terms of Sol and Venus which are not taken up at random, ought for this end to be well understood, in a sense that is both physical and metaphysical. And how harsh soever these may seem, or unwarrantable, yet are they not also without a ground even in Scripture, the one in Psalm xix. 4, 5, 6.; the other in 2 Pet. i. 19.; Apoc. xi. 28.

We may call one of them Light, and the other Love, or passive Love. Or we may regard one as the energy of the Son of God, and the other as that of the Divine Spirit. But whatever other names we shall substitute in their room, there will still somewhat in these hieroglyphics remain unexpressed.

The mystery of the Divine numbers, if there be any such, doth here lie couched. And the seven spirits before the Father's throne, from whom the greatest of mystics wisheth grace and peace (Rev. iv.) are these superior planets, those high and exalted powers, which must all concur, in the most perfect harmony, to the formation and production of this mighty birth, so frequently spoken of in these writings, and to which all the powers and wonders of the kingdom of Christ are appropriated.

This she supposeth always to be the way of natural causality, and correspondent to outward and fallen nature, and not by such a rushing, transient influx as descended on most (if not all), in the first promulgation of this kingdom after the ascension of our Lord.

And this according to the spirit of these writings, is the establishment of the Melchisedechian priesthood in his members. Upon whom He doth not barely reflect his image, as the visible sun reflects his on the waters; but in whom he doth represent himself really and vitally, and beget in them his express similitude, as the same sun doth also in a low degree bring forth his in all the subjects of temporal nature. He standing properly as the tree of life, in the midst of this our vortex, without whom, all that is therein contained of visibles would presently be dead.

So this royal manifestation, or birth of these holy, priestly Magi, is said to be under Sol, i.e., under the direct rays and immediate communication of the Divine and invisible Sun, who is become to them the tree of life and immortality, on which they continually feed, without danger from the cherub of Moses or the chariot of Elias.

And such a continued participation of His light and life, may in a sober sense not unfitly be called an eternal and substantial generation. According to which, every one that is called of God, as Melchisedec was, must be both απατωρ and αμητωρ, with regard to his eternal generation, according to the express appointment of Christ, Mark, x. 29, 30; Luke, xiv. 26; and also his example, Matt. xii. 46—50. Whence he will be likewise αγενεαλογητος, i.e., without any genealogy, whether paternal or maternal, in this mortal world; calling no man father on earth, and not hanging upon any mother, though even the universal mother of all flesh, as having one Father in heaven, and one mother, which is the new Jerusalem: being therefore said to be redeemed or separated, from among men, and out of the earth, said to be a virgin, i.e., without succession or end of days, and figuratively represented to us, standing out of this gross atmosphere, upon an high and glorious mountain.

Now, to arrive to this eminent state and honour of the everlasting priesthood, belonging to the first fruits, according to the present theory, it is required there be an antecedent state of revelation, and Divine vision opened in the soul; and that all the spiritual faculties, senses, and powers, which will in the future life come to be manifested, be so in this (p. 43, 44.), which state is by the author continually appropriated to Wisdom, and in this place named her renewed nativity, as it is distinguished from the succedent state, which is by her appropriated to the WOMB, according to the former distinction of the African father. And this state is much more noble than the former. For though that be here represented as exceeding glorious, and is really so in itself; yet falls it vastly short of the glory that is revealed in this other, which is no less than the very brightness and refulgent character of the glorified person of Christ, as the firstborn from the dead. And therefore to this state, as derivatively through Him, is applicable that most eminent decree of God, Psalm xi. 7., upon which the order of this priesthood (there at large treated of, p. 92.) is founded, and may as well be called a birth, she thinks, as that which is but the beginning of a low and mortal life. The one is a state that is all glorious within, but vile and contemptible without; the other is glorious outwardly also, and makes the vile to become honourable. The one is as the exemplar of the other, and which contains the other in its womb. But to both there is required the exact harmonization of the powers of the world to come, and of the seven principal emanations from the throne of the Divine Majesty, that so nothing be redundant or defective, nothing disproportionate or discordant.

Wherefore it is said they agree to bring forth (or manifest) the Mother and then the Son, in the Virgin humanity. And as the fetus receives figure and form in the womb of its mother, and her earthly matter, so does this from the heavenly matter of undefiled Virgin nature receive both in the sense of this author.

They are called by almost as many different names in these writings as the most cabalistical authors have been able to invent, either for the prima materia, or the summum bonum in nature. But the most ordinary are the birth of Wisdom, and the birth of Power.

In the last consists that which is the new creation; and in the first the idea of it. In which idea, the generative or prolific virtue (expressed here by the term of Magia) being included, it is called therefore the Divine Venus, in a sense well understood by many of the ancients. And as all generations in the fallen state of Adam's transgression, do proceed forth from the earthly and impure Venus (who truly sits as a queen upon the beast of nature, and can be said to be the Goddess or idol of all flesh); that is, as they come out of the same polluted mass and seminal corruption, so do all the heavenly generations, and the children of God that are brought forth in the regeneration and resurrection, according to the restored state of Christ's righteousness, proceed from this heavenly and pure Venus (that is, as the virgin clothed with the sun) out of the same one undefiled substance and seed of incorruption, which some have significantly named the One Element. [Here and hereafter refer to Note of p. 111, which is by this writer.]

And also as the planet Venus, when a morning star, doth arise before the sun, and yet doth not shine from any other light, but what proceeds from the sun; so in like manner, the morning star of Wisdom, allowing the present hypothesis, may be properly said to arise in the soul, before the sun of the intellectual world come forth out of his Chuppah, and yet it may shine in the soul by no other light but what is reflected by this sun, while he remains in the Chuppah; which is an antecedent, internal ministration of familiar Divine converse, preparatory to the more public and glorious manifestation which is to succeed in the coming out together of the bridegroom and the bride.

Now, should we suppose the outward sun to be the creator of that outward, planetary body, the star of Venus, and that because the light of this star is produced from the light of this sun, and is inferior to it; yet notwithstanding, I do not see any inconsistency, or even inconvenience, in mentioning the said star, either as before the sun, or as after the sun, according to different respects. And thus will it be with the superior star of Venus, according to the same hypothesis.

For if there be any such star, or power in the intellectual or angelical world, corresponding to that which appears to us in the visible heavens, though it be inferior to the light of the intellectual and angelical sun, and have no more than a derivative light from its light, yet with respect to manifestation may be conveniently and truly said to be before it.

Nor is that which is manifested, in the order of science, known after that by which it is manifested, imaged, generated, or even created; but on the contrary: which different respects are sufficiently distinguished by this author.

XXII.—But moreover, that which appears so very confused at the first reading, and the mere product of imagination, is perfectly agreeable to the principles of the most acute and deep Philosophy that I have ever met with.

And as the most regular system of the universe doth favour the same, so likewise many passages in the holy Scripture are not (as far as I can apprehend) otherwise intelligible.

This hath been very surprising to me; but I cannot here expatiate into particulars, neither stay to lay down those principles, according to their due light, or to produce those passages, and apply them as would be necessary. Only, in transitu, I observe, as the astronomers do now make the sun the centre of our vortex or world, so do these philosophers make their Sun (as distinguished from both the unoriginated sun, and from the first begotten image of it,) the centre of every vortex and world, both visible and invisible.

And this sun, in the Septenary System of spirits, they place the fourth or middlemost; calling it the fourth form, the fourth power, fountain or spirit of Nature: the Fire, the Holy Fire, Ignis Magorum, the Cross, and Tree of Life, universal and eternal. So that the birth of Wisdom in the soul,* by opening therein the secrets of the invisible worlds, the soul becoming as a clear, unspotted mirror, to receive their reflections, cannot be, according to the principles of the true central philosophy, but under the fourth form and fountain of nature, i.e., under Sol. And they show, consequently, how this magical birth, originated under the fourth, cannot be brought forth but by the help of the fifth form of nature, called the fountain of Love and Venus, in conjunction with the rest of the superior forms, fountains, powers, and spirits, constituting the wheel of Nature, which St. James is thought by some to allude to, iii. 6. Particularly they make the harmonization of the Seven Spirits of God, and the conjunction of the seven forms of incorruptible nature to be after this manner, viz.: the fifth with the third, the sixth with the second, and the seventh with the first; so that out of each conjunction there ariseth an eternal harmony in the perfect octave, an eternal circulation of love and joy in the soul. All the said Spirits and forms being thus harmonized in One, which is the fourth, standing in the midst of the rest, they make the fifth to contain in its womb the sixth, and the first combination of forms to flow into the second; which second is the reproduction in the soul of the image of the Word, as the first was the image of the Wisdom. And the seventh they make to finish the whole mystery of God in nature, by the third and last combination receiving the other two into itself, which is the Sabbath of nature, beyond which it cannot go.—All this perfectly agrees with what has been the occasion of so much scandal in the writings of an illiterate woman. [See p. 43, (e.)]

XXIII.—And this may suffice to let you see, that she is not inconsistent with self, or with principles, in the present account that you were pleased to urge. And that there must be somewhat more than ungoverned fancy to speak so consistently with what she has delivered in other places, and so consonantly to the principles of a certain Philosophy, which doth require more than ordinary penetration of spirit to understand but in part. The truth of these Principles there are much abler persons ready to vindicate. However, let these be disputed ever so much, it can hardly be denied that she has written according to them, with an agreeable harmony that is indeed wonderful. And it is plain, that the terms taken from arts not understood by her, have yet been managed by her as if she understood them perfectly. These two births some also do understand as well outwardly in nature, as inwardly in the soul. And in the former interpretation they say doth lie couched the process of the renovation of all things, by a new virgin earth, and new virgin heaven, according to the famous prophecy of St. Peter hereunto applied. Also, besides this universal regeneration, which is two-fold, there are grounds in nature to believe a particular regeneration, in like manner two-fold. And this regeneration of certain individual subjects, as plants, etc., which some chemists do speak so much of, would, according to the description that is given thereof, much elucidate this matter, were it proper here to enlarge. Whence, some persons even of a mechanical head, and busied in the examination of nature, I have heard greatly to admire at some passages in her writings, which they said they had found to be exactly conformable to the truth of experimental philosophy, whereof she herself could not yet be supposed to have any knowledge at all.—Wherefore I conclude that she cannot be justly charged with introducing a difference of sex in the divinity, or with inconsistencies and unintelligible jargon in this point; but that she must have had the assistance of some superior intelligence in her account of wisdom. [Which the reader, in the course of the following pages, may suspect to be Lee himself!]

XXIV.—The next charge against her writings is the Manichean heresy of two co-eternal principles in the Deity. But here also I doubt much whether she has been fully understood. I do not see anything that may seem to favour this but the private resolution of a question that was put to her, the answer to which she doth not say she did receive from any voice or vision, as it is frequent for her to do; whence it might as well be from reason, as from a principle more disputable. And if she doth here reason amiss, in a point which the wisest heads have not been able to unravel, yet what is said to be, elsewhere, from express revelation, may be nevertheless true.

But whether what she declares in the Postscript to the Enochian Walks, (which is the only passage of this nature) be from her own reasoning, or from revelation, her meaning may perhaps not be so heretical, as is at first easy to apprehend; yea, may be as far wide from the doctrine of Manes, as that which is most common at this day. This may be made to appear from what she elsewhere delivers, speaking again to this very question: she says, hell, death, destruction, and the lake, are of themselves. And if they are of themselves they are not of God, or in God; and there can be no co-eternal principle of evil in or with the Deity, from whence they could be originated, she opposes the imperfect act of a created being, to the perfect act of the Creator: and the confusion and disorder of evil arising from the one, to the unity and harmony of good, existing in and flowing forth from the other. She makes good to be natural, and evil to be preternatural: good to be eternal, without beginning, or end, and evil temporary, as having both a beginning and an end. All which seems to me directly opposite to the condemned doctrine of Manes, and Valentinian, making the evil to be no less natural and eternal, than the good, and to owe its original, not to the creature, but to the Creator himself.

Nor is it simply asserted by her, that hell and death, etc., are not of God, but of themselves; For it is a conclusion drawn by her from the premises which she had laid down; which premises are exactly conformable to the principles she before went upon in the Post-script.

Which do turn upon the manifestation of God in nature, and the breach of the original band of nature by him constituted. Now as all variety is comprehended in this band, and doth branch forth from it, so as soon as this is broken, there must needs arise disorder and confusion, instead of order and beauty, by the will of the creature being separated from the Divine will, to act independently, and of itself.

This will appear to be the origination of evil according to her meaning. The only difficulty will be, how this variety in the band, could proceed at first out of the eternal Unity. But whatever way may be taken to account for the creation, this difficulty will alike recur.

That which is most easy, and according to that chain of principles upon which all this turns, is this. The UNITY is the beginning and the centre of the variety, which variety was comprehended in the unity. The variety is generated from the unity, and is the end of the unity, and must return back into the unity: the harmony proceeds both from the unity and variety together, in the unity without the variety there could be no harmony; and in the variety without the unity there could spring up nothing but contrariety. This UNITY, VARIETY, and HARMONY, was before the angelical creation: it was in the angelical creation, and it was after it.

It was before, in, and after, all creations whatever in the Deity: and after all creations, and revolutions, that are to be, it will still be in the Deity; throughout all the circles of eternity, when shall be all in all, Deity in nature, and nature in Deity.

This unity, variety, and harmony, was in all the angels at their creation, when they sang together for joy: and it would have forever continued in them all, had not some of them adventured to make a trial of the might of their own wills, whereby the harmony was perfectly broken, by their not returning back into the unity, by, and in, an humble resignation of their wills. And so through the variety brake forth the contrariety. In this contrariety is evil, and it springs up out of the separation of the perfect band of nature. In this band while unbroken, was every created being to have existed eternally; and therefore was it called an Eternal Band, and this nature, Eternal Nature, that is, immortal and incorruptible nature. There would have been an eternal circulation of life, light and love, in the unity, through the variety, by the harmony; if this eternal band had not been violated, as to some, in the angelical nature. And there is such an eternal circulation of life, light and love in all, where it hath not been violated, or where, having been once violated, it is again renewed.

On the contrary, in this band while it remains broken, or dislocated, no created being can exist eternally, but is made subject to vanity, there can be no circulation of life in the creature thus made subject. There may, indeed, be a temporal circulation of life in this state, but the vanity which is in the creature, and which flows from the contrariety, cannot live for ever. The vanity of the creature is not eternal, but as it stands in the contrariety, it must pass away with the contrariety sooner or later: for it cannot subsist out of the contrariety. And the contrariety must be at last conquered, unless there be two contrary co-eternal and co-equal principles, that is, two Gods; and being conquered it must pass away into the harmony. And thus entering again into the harmony of Divine Love, through the most beautiful variety of the heavenly light, centres in the original unity, which is the very life of God. Whence, where there is an eternal circulation of life, there must be also an eternal circulation of light and love, in the band of perfect nature, without all contrariety, and all disharmony.

And if the creature, through the contrariety, and through the disharmony, be made subject to vanity for a long duration of ages, the better to display the wonders, both of time and eternity, this contrariety must, in the end, be made itself subject to Him, who is the head of the whole creation, the Alpha and beginning thereof, in and by whom the variety of all things created, were manifested in perfect harmony; and who alone is able to subdue everything unto himself. Whereupon, all disharmony in the creature must vanish away, all things being again put under his feet, as it was in the beginning; through the all-powerful harmony of love, prevailing over that which has stood in the greatest opposition to it.

In the contrariety stands all evil, death, darkness, and wrath: in the harmony stands all good, life, light, and love. When the harmony subdues the contrariety of nature, then is death swallowed up in life, darkness in light, and the wrath of God in his love; and all the evil in the creature, whether of sin or of punishment, vanisheth away, as if it had never been. This is the victory of the Divine Harmony in the spirit of CHRIST.

But when the contrariety breaks the harmony of nature, whether in angels or in men, (which during the times of their probation can only be,) violating the natural subordination of their wills to the Divine will, and not centering in the supreme unity, from whence they primarily were originated: all manner of evil must be expected to proceed out of this breach and violation of eternal Nature; according to the degrees of the contrariety, and proportion of the disorder, multiplicity, and confusion thence arising in the creature, that has departed from the fountain of its unity.

Thus death, say they, entered into the world, through the transgression (or deviation from the unity) of one head angel, or angelical patriarch, and then of one man, or patriarchal head of the human race: whereby both the angelical and human natures in those hierarchies of Lucifer and Adam were as totally separated and divorced from the original source of their life, and from the unity and harmony of the Divine Being, which had before comprehended the variety in them, and kept all in its proper place and station, unviolated. And thus, through this disharmony and separation, did life disappear in death, the light vanish in darkness, and the love cloud itself in wrath. Yet the life was in death, the light in darkness, and the love, in wrath. But the death could not comprehend the life, neither the darkness the light, nor the wrath the love. So that the life, the light, and the love, were now unmanifested, and incomprehended: as death, darkness, and wrath, were before unmanifested, and incomprehended, which stood but as a faint shadow in the creature; and could never have been manifested, or comprehended by the creature, but through the contrariety of feeding on the knowledge of good and evil, life and death, etc.; and these should never have been manifested to all eternity, but for the better display of the wonders, the glories, and the triumphs of the eternal Life, the eternal Light, and the eternal Love.

But being manifested, they have not yet a positive existence, thereby in themselves, as everything derived from God hath. They have not their existence in the band of Nature, for that is good, yea very good, but they have it out of this band; and therefore the existence of them, and consequently of all evil, is more relative than real, more negative than positive.

For their existence is formally nothing else, but the separation and disunion of this sacred band, which was derived from God entire. And their manifestation in nature (as it is now lapsed and broken,) is but the hiding of the Divine love, light, and life in the creature, or from the creature: so that God becomes to it, as a hidden God, an angry God, a God inhabiting thick darkness, and a consuming fire. And yet, by this, here is not the least variation in God, the Spirit of eternity. Nor is there any new existence, or new degree of existence given hence to the spirits in time. Nor anything new produced (notwithstanding this change in the creature,) which was not already before in the band of nature, actually or potentially. But only a loss, and breach effected in the same.

Notwithstanding which, as God, so also Nature abideth invariable, according to its eternal order that was given it in the beginning; which is good, and eternally good. So that the good which is in nature hath an existence most real and positive, and also eternal: but the evil which is introduced into nature, or manifested by the separation of nature's eternal band and law, not existing after this manner doth stand as a dark shadow in opposition to the Divine Light and Truth; and hence death is called a shadow, and hell outward darkness, and sin blindness.

For this blindness and darkness have only a shadowy existence, from the violation of original nature, as angelical in one order of beings, and paradisaical in another.

And yet had there not been the potentiality and root of darkness in nature, neither the outward darkness, nor the inward blindness could ever have sprung up, or in either of these two orders of beings have been made to exist after any sort.

And had there not also been something in the Deity to be manifested or glorified through this potentiality and root, it could never have been in nature after any manner: or even supposing it to be in nature, it never could therefore have been brought forth; but must have remained for ever hid in a mere empty and impotent possibility, as it is in the blessed angels and perfect spirits.

Now what that is in the Deity which was to be manifested through this dark root of nature, is not difficult to be seen. It must be good in itself, because in the Deity: but it may not be good to the creature, because all that is in the Deity is not communicable, or manifestable to any created being, but according to its proportion of aptitude.

It cannot be positively evil: but it may be relatively evil, where it meets with disproportion and disharmony. Nay it must be positively and essentially good, but it may not be good to be tasted by the creature.

This is no other than the severe Justice of God, which could not be manifested before the birth of the contrariety. This Divine justice is both darkness and light, both death and life, yea both good and evil, according to different respects in the creature. But before the contrariety of the creature arises, it is unmanifested; it being in the Unity, and not in the divided root of good and evil, wherein the knowledge of it can only be had. And this is no less glorious and excellent in itself, than the Divine Mercy; which also could not but remain unmanifested without the contrariety.

But being terrible and unsupportable to the creature, it bears the relation of evil, and comprehends under it the manifold scenes of misery, all which do serve to a fuller unfolding of the mystery of the kingdom of Christ, of the beatitudes of the saints in light, and of the exceeding riches of the Divine Goodness; and to an higher manifestation of the wisdom, power, and holiness of the infinite Creator: which will be eternally surprising. Wherefore, if that be terrible which is glorious, and that evil in the creature, divided from his root, which is good in the Creator; then that which is glorious and good in Him, may yet in the creature, and with respect to the creature, be termed dreadful and evil, without any design to advance the condemned heresy of Manes, or to deny the unity and simplicity of the Godhead. And this is no more than what the infallibly inspired Divine writers both of the Old and New Testament have done, whereof frequent instances cannot but be observed by you, which having not been understood by many, for want of a very easy distinction of GOD in Nature, and GOD above Nature,* has occasioned them foolishly to make God the author of evil; the most, indeed, consequentially, but some also directly. Which had been impossible to have been done, if they had known how the Divine justice, or the Divine mercy though they be two in nature, yet are but one in God; or how God in nature as the supreme universal cause, acts in the divided root of nature, remaining yet in his own eternal unity. In which eternal unity all things, according to this writer, are comprehended; and were in the beginning comprehended, as they were created, and did flow forth out of it, through the variety, into the harmony of nature. Thus she constitutes one undivided principle in the Deity, containing all principles, elements, and seeds, in an eternal temperature. And she considers the Deity in a transcendental sense, above all that is called material or spiritual, dark or light, mortal or immortal, terrestrial or celestial; and above all names, specific or general: so that matter and spirit, darkness and light, life and death, earth and heaven, may be said to be in God, or not to be in God, according to different relations; and both without injury to the eternal unity, and the eternal harmony of God. Now how far this is from making two co-eternal Gods, or two co-eternal principles in one God, the one good, the other evil; how far this is, both from the Chaldean doctrine, as to their Oromasdes, and Arimanius, or from the Valentinian, as to their Achamoth, and Ananche, I leave you, Sir, to determine.

XXV.—The third charge of heresy against her writings, is that called the Origenian, for maintaining the finiteness of hell torments.

But if this be an heresy, it is absolutely inconsistent with the original of good and evil from two co-eternal principles, in the Deity. For if they are co-eternal a parte ante, they must necessarily be co-eternal, a parte post, and consequently the torments of hell must be as infinite as the joys of heaven: which consequence is so natural and easy, that every one must see it. And therefore if the torments are to be believed so infinite in their duration, as not to cease before God ceaseth to be, it is impossible for me, (I must confess) not to fall in with the Manichean doctrine, or to refuse to believe an eternal principle of evil, as well as of good, that is an eternal root and cause of hell in the Deity. But while I believe the torments of hell, and consequently all evil to be finite, it is impossible for me to believe the principle and root of evil to have been co-eternal with the good a parte ante. And therefore, if by such an easy train of thought I am driven to embrace one of these two doctrines, I had much rather incline to that which makes only the principle of good to be eternal both a parte ante, and a parte post, than to that which makes the principles both of good and evil to be in like manner so. Since it appears equally absurd to believe two universal principles (the one good and the other evil) eternal a parte ante, and but one of them eternal a parte post; and to believe one universal principle eternal a parte ante, and two co-eternal principles a parte post, standing immutably in the contrariety to each other.

Wherefore it being impossible for any one to hold at once the finite duration of evil, with Origen, and the infinite duration of it in both respects with Manes: and my mother having so professedly expressed herself in favour of the former, and never professedly in favour of the latter, she ought not to be taxed with the belief of this which is so inconsistent and impossible with the other position, and is also absurd, pernicious, and blasphemous.

XXVI.—But that position of the finite duration of evil, and the infinite duration of good, however it may seem at first, in this age of licentiousness to be hurtful; yet certainly it is not against the light of reason, or against the honour of the Divine Majesty. There is neither absurdity, nor blasphemy in it. And if it be pernicious, it must be so to them that understand it not. And thus the most undeniable truths of the Christian religion may be, by accident, pernicious to many. Nay, it is uncontroversially true, that the vulgar doctrine itself, hath not been without its pernicious consequences.

And if this doctrine of the universal restitution or final annihilation of evil, be reconcilable with the Scriptures (as some men of no small learning and piety do aver), then will there not be the least shadow of difficulty remaining, why it should not be embraced. For I esteem it none at all, that the books of that great and holy man, whose name is famous for it, were publicly prohibited about three hundred years after his death, by a counsel that gave the fairest lift to the establishing the papal supremacy; or that it was privately condemned by some persons of name in the church, but notoriously partial, an hundred and fifty years before, but about as many after his death. It doth not appear from this that it might not be a doctrine of the catholic Church, or at least held piously probable in the second and third centuries; or if it were not then publicly known as a general doctrine, but reserved only, among some few that were initiated into the mysteries, it doth not thence appear that it ought not to be published now; or that it is unsound, because unfit for every age.

A clear view of the matter of fact and right will be here the best evidence that can be desired. XXVII.—The substance of her doctrine as to this point, is plainly this, viz. angels and men were created by God, to be eternally happy, by loving and enjoying Him. That they might eternally love, and eternally enjoy God, they were in their creation made partakers of the Divine nature. This participation of the Divine nature, consisted in the communication to them of the Divine Life, Divine Light, and Divine Love; whereby they were, as it were, branched forth out of the Deity: and were to have lived for ever in the Deity, as their root and fountain. God communicated himself to angels and to men in the unity of his life, in the variety of lights, and in the harmony of love. This He did, that they might love him, and loving him, behold him, and beholding him, be transformed into the express image of his life, which is life eternal, both to the angelical and human creation. By this communication of Himself, he did not design, that any angel, or man, should hate him for ever, should turn away from him for ever, or should be transformed for ever into a shadow of death. It was in the power of angels and men to interrupt this Divine communication in themselves, but it was not in their power totally to cut it off, any more than it was to create themselves, or to annihilate themselves; since it entered into their original constitution.

The original root of all spirits, is the Divine Being, and their beginning or root, must not be different from their end. Their author and finisher is God, their beginning and end is Christ, their first and last life is the divine Spirit in harmonious concord and blessed unity.

One great angel was permitted to go out from the face (i.e. the light) of God, and so leaving his first place and station, he was not only distinct, but separated and turned away from his original source. And thus not keeping his beginning and native principality (Jud. v. 6.) but running from it in the power of his will, he entered into the contrariety against God, and against his beginning, which was the eternal Light of life. And hereby was first broken by him that heavenly harmony, which was in the band of angelical nature; and instead thereof, a sinful disorder brake forth. This being broken by one angel, other angels finding the same liberty in their wills to abide in the unity (with God), or to go out in the contrariety (from God), they immediately consented with him to the latter, which appeared of the two more noble, potent, and great.

They found where their might and strength was, and so they awakened what they could not fathom the nature of. Now their strength was their fire, the fire of nature, spiritual and eternal fire.

This fire while it was in union with the spiritual and eternal light was good, but as soon as it was separated from it, it became evil and the root of all evil. Thus sin was conceived, and evil brought forth in the angelical heavens, by the fiery strength of the Luciferian spirits; not kept within its bounds, in a meek humility, and parted from the Divine Light; being parted from which they could no longer remain in their angelical principle.

Therefore man was created by God in their room, and essenced a little lower than they. And hereby it was provided that his fall should not be so great as theirs, if he likewise should not keep his first estate and beginning. He was created upright: but he stood in a free liberty either as to the good, or to the evil. Both angels and men were created good: but before the end of their probation they were to be immutably good.

Immutability of good is in God alone, and therefore every creature, intellectual and rational before their fixation in him, must be mutable to good and evil. But after their fixation in him, as in the fountain of their being, they become immutable to evil, and are unchangeably good, as he is eternally good.

The image of the Eternal Goodness is also eternal. The eternal image of God, in which man was created, could not be destroyed by man; for that he stood essenced in it, as to his superior part. Yet it might disappear to man, by the superinducing another image: which was accordingly done. For the fallen angels envying this new and heavenly image in man, conspired how they might involve him in the same state with themselves, and make him to bear their likeness.

And as he was essenced, as to his inferior part, in that very matter which they knew how to defile, and had actually defiled in themselves, so they more easily effected their conspiracy.

This was the poison and seed of the serpent cast into the human nature: and the fountain being poisoned, hence came the infection of all mankind. The universal human nature being infected, an universal antidote was hereupon prepared to expel out all the poison. This must have its effect sooner or later; and cannot be resisted by any particular, inferior, or subordinate causes. In some it has its effects in this life, and they are the first born, and the first fruits, in others it has effects, not till after this life, and they are the after born, and latter fruits.

The principle, or seed of sin and defilement in the fall of angels did extend to the curse of that heaven, whereof Lucifer was king: and so an hell was there prepared for him and his angels.

The principle and seed of sin and corruption, and sin in the fall of men, did extend only to the curse of that earth (with its atmosphere) whereof Adam was king. And so the earth was corrupted and defiled. And death was prepared for him and his progeny. This death is passed through in soul and in body by every man; every man being under the same condemnation. And the great degeneration of the soul from the Divine life, and of the body from the paradisiacal life, was a real proper death, when man was cast out into this accursed earth.

And answerable to this twofold death, there is a twofold resurrection, to be attained by every man, but by every one in his order: the principle and seed of holiness and incorruption, extending itself, no less universally to all.

The seed and principle of corruption, conveyed to all mankind, has a greater place in some persons, originally, than in others; yet in none doth it extend so far of itself as that any shall be condemned for it to the flames of hell, which was not prepared for fallen man, but for the devil and his angels. Whence none of mankind can be cast into hell, strictly so called, to suffer the second death, but such as shall have by unbelief and disobedience wrought together with the devil and his angels, and loved darkness rather than light.

So that all who die in a state of minority, as under the age of about twelve years, have a certain world or kingdom allotted them (called by her the children's kingdom), where they neither know the torments of hell, nor the joys of heaven, for the present, but are there trained up in all that is needful to perfect them for the latter, according to the variety of their previous dispositions, and of their being found within or without the covenant.

Also the holy seed has originally a greater place in some than in others, as in Isaac than in Ishmael, and yet it doth not reach so far, as that any shall simply for it be admitted into the kingdom. But it must be perfected in them, first by the obedience of faith, in co-operation with Christ, till they be redeemed fully from the defilement of the earth.

From this holy seed of Divine Light, there is a common illumination, whereof Heathens, Mahometans, and Jews, do partake with Christians, as the law which is written in the hearts of all men. And there is besides a special illumination, which none but true Christians can partake of; which is the internal revelation of Christ's death, resurrection, ascension, and descension in the powers of the Holy Ghost, operatively and effectively, whereby the regeneration is perfected.

They who have only had the former, however faithful they have been to it, cannot yet thereby be admitted into the kingdom of God. But being not far from it, they are reserved in custody, where their souls are kept from evil, and they have the gospel of Christ crucified preached unto them, and inwardly opened in the mystery, that so they may ascend where he is.

Moreover, of professed Christians who depart out of this world, besides those that go to heaven or hell, there is a great number who are imprisoned for a season in certain elementary regions, or middle places, till the contrariety of the evil shall be at last wrought out in them.

And even of them that have had a good degree of knowledge and belief in God and Christ, and [N.B.] have seriously laboured after the new birth, being truly convinced of their depravity and lost estate, and of the necessity of their redemption through Christ, and having come off in part but not clearly from the world, there is none that can enter presently into the kingdom of heaven. But they have a higher degree in the elementary regions, near to Paradise; where as they feel not much pain, agony, or sorrow, so but little pleasure or joy, because they cannot reach the vision of God so long as any impurity remains. And that impurity may be done away after the separation of this body from the soul, she thinks none ought to withstand, who deny perfection of purity to be attainable during this conjunction: for that otherwise few (if any) could be saved.

All souls therefore must pass through the refining and calcining regions, prepared for their purifying, according to the measures and degrees they do attain to in here in this life; and the more they do suffer here, [in attaining to a state of perfect love, humility, meekness, patience, and resignation, for the direct process to which, see pp. 8, 9, and notes of pp. 75, 127, etc.,] the less they will have to do and suffer in the life to come, where the difficulty will be much greater.

Whereupon, at the first delivery of this doctrine, these express words are found: How numerous years may you abide in these purging and frying furnaces? One day here, while in the body, would have set forward your work more than years in those centres, where you are to be confined. Therefore let this be an acceptable, etc. Enoch Wal. p. 16.

And thus all souls having been created by God to be happy, after their purification by such ways and methods (in such regions) as the Divine Wisdom shall see fit, shall in the end be eternally so. Who being first truly humbled are then made capable to love God, and to enjoy God for ever, according to the order of their creation, which will be in the unity and harmony of his own life and light in them.

But this is not generally to be, but after some considerable time beyond the thousand years reign of Christ, when the high and great saints of all ages of the world, shall sit as counsellors and judges with him, and by virtue of his authority demand all such condemned souls as are captivated in the infernal prisons, and set them free from the dominion and tyranny of the dark prince.

And this Universal Jubilee of mankind will be the bruising of the head of the devil, which he shall never be able to move more. It will be taking away the sting of death, the seizing the prey of the mighty, and the treasures of darkness.

After which jubilee, the angels, also, which fell, shall attain to the end for which they were created and designed by God, and shall recover again their primitive state, beauty, and lustre. For seeing themselves now divested of all their might, and become so weak and poor as to have no place, nor subjects to exercise any authority upon, they will be deeply pierced.

When they are thus abased, then the eternal and pure nature which ingenerated into them immediately from God at the first, and could never be either corrupted or lost, will be stirred up and awakened for their recovery.

This will be done by the Father of all spirits, the eternal UNITY, who will not fail to gather to himself what is of his own, and to annihilate whatever is not derived from him; that so the contrariety may finally cease in Nature, all things being re-united to their original, from whence they branched forth in the beginning, through the eternal Word. So that whether they be things in heaven, or in earth, or things under the earth, they must bow and pay their obedience to the ONE Supreme Being.

Yet until the wonders of the mystery of iniquity be fulfilled in all lapsed worlds, the disobedient angels will refuse to surrender up their kingdom, or to humble themselves before the throne of God and of the Lamb, that they may be admitted into their ancient thrones, or new thrones then erected.

And when this mystery shall be filled up in all its wonders, then will the end be: the end finding the beginning, and Christ becoming (manifestly) the Alpha and Omega of the whole creation, and as the first so also the last.

But as the order of the transgression of the angels was different from that of men, so also shall the order of their restitution be.

For as the restitution of man was more proper to the Word made flesh, so their restitution is more proper to the Father of their spirits, as he is the Spirit of Eternity. And as the Father there moved in the Son, so the Son here will move in the Father, by the same Spirit. And as Christ was the creating Word by which they were created at first, so again the second time will he be: First consuming and devouring all the diabolical nature, by an impregnable fire of Love from the breath of the Almighty, invisibly blown up: and then reintroducing himself by the eternal generation of the Father, into their eternal essences; that so being created new, they may be recovered to their primary existence in the Deity, and inseparably united with their true original.

Moreover, as God did introduce himself again into the fallen human nature, in a corporeal manner, for that its depravation was chiefly in the outward birth, called the third principle of nature; so will he into the fallen angelical nature in a spiritual way, for that its tartarization was chiefly in the inward spiritual root of their essences, called the first principle of nature. And therefore their fall having been so deep, it cannot be recovered, but after an universal and radical dissolution, in the second death.

Which death must have its resurrection, as the first death had its, by a new creation and new generation from the Virgin principle of Wisdom in perfect nature:

Since the foundation of God being in them, can never be annihilated, but must abide for ever, and so cause in them this angelical resurrection and new angelical creation. For which they are to be prepared, and made to believe the same, by the ministration of Michael, and the rest of the holy angels commissioned by God for this end; who cannot but have a sympathy of nature for their fallen brethren, and desire that they also should be happy, if it be the will of God, in loving him, and ministering before his throne, as they do?

This is the sum of her doctrine concerning the general restitution of the creation, as far as I do apprehend it. I have endeavoured only to represent it in its true light, as delivered; and having done so, I leave you to judge whether it do indeed give that favour to libertinism, which many think.

I would also ask you, whether you believe it altogether unreasonable* and precarious? or whether the contrary be so expressed in Scripture, as that it is not possible for sober and considering persons to fall in with this sentiment?

I do not vindicate it, or think it necessary so to do; but if it were, there is hardly one doctrine about which Christendom is divided, for which more can be said.

This plucks up Manicheism by the roots, and so also Gnosticism, or the false magical knowledge of the ancient heretics, it having been a fundamental doctrine, you know, of Simon Magus their head, that the God who created Adam was not the supreme God, but an impotent demon only, for that he was not sufficient to preserve his work from being marred, or to hinder his will from being disobeyed. This puts an end to many otherwise inextricable controversies, throws down the foundation of many ancient and modern opinions very destructive to mankind, reconciles the sentiments and decrees of persons and churches one with another, that have been thought most inconsistent, and above all, promotes catholic love and universal peace. And supposing

* The following extract relating to this point, is taken from a private letter of Law to one of his intimate friends:—"It is not possible for any one to have treated this matter of the Recovery of Angels in a more cautious, inoffensive manner than I have done. It is my capital doctrine, that God is all Love, and merely a Will to all Goodness, that he must eternally will that to the creature, which he willed at its creation. Can any one carry the Divine Goodness farther? Would you have me say that I hope their recovery is possible, and should be glad of it, if it is so? I have, and do willingly say it. Would you have me say, that I know it to be possible? I should say what nothing in Nature, or Scripture, enables me to say.

It was certainly God's primary intention in the creation of man and angels, that they should, both of them, keep their first created state. This is undeniable. But what an argument would that be, to say, that God's intention cannot be defeated; therefore, neither angels nor men have lost their first state?

As to the purification of all human nature, either in this or the next life, I fully believe it, [See "Address to the Clergy," pp. 171-178.] But as to that of angels, my words are, p. 65, of The Way to Divine Knowledge, that it cannot be affirmed or denied, but from the known possibility or known impossibility of the thing, which does not yet appear. If it is possible, I am glad of it, and also sure enough that it will then come to pass. Is this a doctrine for you to bid an eternal farewell to? And yet this is all that I have said.

I have condemned neither side, preferred neither opinion to the other; but set the matter in so plain a point of view, as might content both sides, without giving either of them the victory over the other, by showing that each of them was under the same necessity of neither affirming nor denying.—Dear soul, adieu."

The following letter from Mr. Law to Mr. Robert Dawson, a hatter, of Southwark, may be suitably appended to the preceding extract:—"Sir, in the Spirit of Prayer, the matter stands thus, "If thou hast nothing of this birth, when thy body dies, then thou hast only that root of life "which the devils have. Thou art as far from heaven, and as incapable of it, as they are. Thy "nature is their nature, and therefore their habitation must be thine." Now, Sir, let it be supposed that I had then, and there, added these following words, viz.: 'But if thou hast something, or some degree, or beginning of that birth, when thy body dies, then thou wilt not fall into the state of the devils, but into a state of purification, till this something, or degree of the Divine Birth be finished in thee.' Now in these two assertions there is, not only no palpable contradiction, but the most perfect uniformity and agreement with each other. And this is neither more nor less, once the truth of this doctrine, there are besides these several other advantages, too visible to be denied, which will hence flow. Be it as it will, this may be enough to excite any rationalist impartially and unprejudicately to enquire into the same. [Such subjects are as poison to holy souls.]

XXVIII.—Now whether it be true, and the revelation for it be likewise true, are of different consideration.

I may be convinced of the one, but not of the other: I may be convinced of one by the other: and lastly, I may be convinced of either by divers mediums. But if both should be found to be true (upon a free and just enquiry), then will this be an unquestionable evidence, as for that spirit which was the author of such a revelation or revelations, so for the person taken up to be the instrument for their conveyance to others.

For though an evil spirit may reveal a truth, yet it is not to be believed that he will ever reveal a truth to any that is capable of doing so much good in the world; or that he can take satisfaction in foretelling the final destruction of the devil's kingdom. And though a person may also receive a revelation from a good spirit, and not understand it, yea even mistake some part of it: as did, say some, the very Apostles, who had a revelation of angels, that they should see Christ return in like manner as they had seen him to ascend, and did misapprehend it, as if his return was to have been during their lives, or very suddenly; and did misapprehend Christ himself, in relation to the exit of St. John. I say, though a revelation which is from a good spirit be not understood, or even misunderstood, yet is not the instrument through which this passeth, therefore to be undervalued, but God alone to be adored and admired, who knows how to make use of the meanest instruments for their conveyance to others.

Let this now suffice for the charge of heresy, as also for that of enthusiasm.

XXIX.—There remains still the first and last charge to be considered, which is Schism. But here, also, the best way will be to represent the state of the case nakedly as it is, and then to search out what is the proper nodus of the question.

The society whereof I profess myself a member are not of one ecclesiastical communion, nor under one civil government. But they are of different communions, and are under several jurisdictions, temporal and spiritual. They are not for dissolving any obligations to the princes and states they are born under, nor for transferring their allegiance to another whose right it is not, on the account of this alliance: but notwithstanding it, they think themselves bound to the same civil obedience, as if such an alliance had never been.

So likewise they are not for destroying the obligations hereby to any rightful or lawful authority in the Church, that is derived from Christ and his Apostles, so as either to assume the same to themselves, or to transfer it where they please: but they are for maintaining the same spiritual obedience still, which could any ways be antecedently claimed, either from the principles of primitive Christianity, or the common motives of ecclesiastical peace.

Hence in Lutheran countries, there are many aspiring with us after the renovation of the angelical spirit and life, and the restitution of the Church, and yet do not therefore break off from the communion whereof they are subjects, or withdraw their obedience there, where they are permitted to pay it without violating an express Divine command.

The same is also in some kingdoms of the Roman communion, and even in Rome itself. Nor is the same altogether unobserved by our friends that live under the reformation of Calvin.

The true members of this Society, wheresoever dispersed they are, and under whatever kind of government in state or religion they live, are never for opposing the established constitutions or acknowledged rights of any, except where they are directly against the law of Nature, or the light of the Gospel. But they had rather bear with many things, and submit themselves for conscience sake, than to run the risk of disturbing the peace and rest of the public, by withdrawing from their true superiors, and denying them that obedience which Christ hath commanded. Yet the object of this obedience may be very easily, and is very commonly mistaken. Of which in the

but that very same agreement and perfect uniformity, which is found betwixt the three passages to which you refer, ["Spirit of Prayer," Part I. p. 35.—"Spirit of Love," Part II. pp. 105. 232.]

I CONSIDER ONLY WHAT IS TRUE AND FALSE; AND ASSERT NOTHING FOR THE SAKE OF JOINING WITH, OR DIVIDING FROM, ANY SECT, SOCIETY, OR SYSTEM OF RELIGIOUS OPINIONS. I am, Your hearty well-wisher, Wm. Law."

We also take the present opportunity of inserting the following letter from Law to the Rev. Mr. Neve, father of Timothy Neve, D.D., Fellow of ——— Coll., Oxford. — "Dear Sir, I had the favour of your ingenious, friendly, and good letter.

Your observations upon the Sweating Statue [See the xxivth of Behmen's Epistles,] are such as I could not help making, at my first reading it; and had the rest of the book been like that, I should not have read it any more. J. B. himself knew that neither you nor I could judge of it any otherwise, than we have done: and therefore, he tells the person to whom he wrote, that it ought not to be shewn abroad, etc.

But the time will come, when such supposed mysteries in J. B. will no more lessen your opinion of that fountain of light which was opened in him, than the spots which are said to be discovered in the sun, do make you suspect it not to be a body of light.

I have sent you the two volumes you mentioned [Query the ed. in 12mo. 1665, of the "Forty Questions," and the "Three Principles,"]; and the rest are at your service, when, and as often as you please. Read them through, without staying at that which you do not comprehend; and you will all along see, both why you should continue reading, and why you must be content to learn very gradually: and also whence it is, that the greatest and most concerning truths are such a mystery to us.

The Manuscript I mentioned and which you speak of, you may depend upon having. But you must permit me to judge of the proper time for it: which, I am sure, will not be, till you know much more of J. B., and also what it is that you want to be helped in.

It is with great truth that I subscribe myself, Your most affectionate, humble servant, Wm. Law.

P. S.—The marginal observations in the Three Principles, are not mine. I have only noted places to be corrected: pinned to the title-page, which I hope you will take care of.

Roman Church itself, where the practice of this virtue is most eminent, several have greatly complained; as particularly Father Baker and Gertrude More, writing expressly against that servile obedience which the Jesuits generally required.

These explicitly declare that the true object of obedience is God alone, and that none can live in true obedience without attending to the internal Divine call, whatever their superiors may persuade to the contrary, or their spiritual directors dictate. And herein we cannot but concur with them; yet do not for this think that we separate from the church whereof we were before members, any more than they did separate from theirs, unless that church that claims us should either deny this Divine call or prohibit the obedience to it.

But I have a far better opinion of the Church of England, in which I have hitherto lived, than to believe that it be ever guilty of such an excess as this. Since from its very liturgy, I have sucked in those very principles, which oblige me to act as I do at present. And this in my answer to Philalethes I have fully declared, and could yet declare more abundantly. But let this be as it will, the principles of our society are compatible with all due subordination to rightful superiors; and the members of it are not for levelling all communions, as if there was no difference betwixt them: much less for overthrowing the establishments of our for settling and establishing the true communion.

For though it would be for them a great absurdity, and wholly incompatible with their design, to take on them peremptorily and immediately to determine the right of the many contending parties, yet they do not by this their refusal allow any right to an heretical or schismatical communion to take any from the true communion (wherever that is). But they do leave all things in the same state, without interfering with any, but where it is absolutely necessary, and then, too, with all imaginable candor, still reserving to themselves a liberty to join these, where truth doth most balance.

They profess with the Catholic Church a true veneration for all the positive institutions of the Gospel; which gospel they say is everlasting, both as to this world, and as to the next also.

They think it very warrantable to labour after an evangelical perfection; but then they do not evacuate the means which are subsidiary to it, under pretence of being in it. If they had lived in the age of the Apostles, or at least before the Church was poisoned under nominal Christian emperors, I dare say there would be very little difference betwixt them and you, about the regular subordination of the gifts of the Spirit, and consequently about the trial of spirits. Since God, according to your own most true observation, was pleased so to distribute his gifts, that the supreme governors were endued with the highest gifts, and the most undeniable credentials. For they cannot so easily persuade themselves that this is so in every true communion at this day, or in every communion that is by you acknowledged to be a true one.

They say, that though there have been, and are even still, some excellent persons, and endued with the Spirit of God, in the chiefest dignities of the Church; yet there is no general example for this in any one church at this time whatever, from which a conclusion may be drawn, that the true Spirit of God must needs be subject to the decision of the majority of them that are so advanced, as if to them of inseparable right did belong the gifts of γυβερνησεις, and διακρίσεις πνευματων.

And they suppose, that the worst persons being always the most forward to prefer themselves, even under all kinds of constitutions, civil and sacred, and there being no possible security against the intrusion of such but a constant miraculous gift in the governing part of the Church, of spiritual discernment; therefore, none ought to challenge this subjection, without more than human credentials for being possessed thereof, or allow that to be a fair way of proof now, which would not have been so in the Apostolical age, when none was admitted to be a presbyter, much less the head of the presbytery, or a bishop, without an express Divine call, and without a real and sensible communication of the Apostolical spirit by the imposition of hands. And albeit Christ never has, nor ever will withdraw his Spirit from the church, or suffer it to be totally eclipsed by the powers of darkness, they cannot but think that there is a great degeneration at this day in every part of it; and that God seems to have included all parties under evil, even they that are, above the rest, most catholic, that so all being left without excuse, he might have mercy upon all.

And particularly as to the legal Church of England; they do not so much object to the evils of the times, or the corruption of particular persons, as they do the heavy load of sacrilege and Erastianism which entered into its very constitution, and which some do call the original sin of this Church, lamented both by the governors and subjects, but never yet cured, or like to be cured.

And therefore such as are more immediately herein concerned, do want to be convinced, how a superiority of the Divine Spirit in the governors of the church, can be universally and constantly claimed under such a constitution as this; which even those themselves do lament as imperfect.

Now, no arguments that it must be so, will be sufficient, unless it do actually appear that it is so. And if even the contrary do besides appear de facto, in some cases at least, then all reasonings de jure, concerning the perpetual succession of the Apostolical Spirit, will be here insignificant.

But that this doth not actually appear, but rather the contrary, we think is evident (if not demonstrable), from the communication of baptismal Spirit to all the Christian proselytes in the first churches, whereby not only the ordinary graces, but even the extraordinary gifts of this Spirit were conveyed, compared with the present ministration of this holy initiatory mystery, in which the gifts are never, and the graces thereof but rarely, transmitted. The which is confirmed by sad and general experience, there being of ten that are baptized (whether infants or adults), hardly one found that can so much as be pretended to have received the Spirit in baptism, as a permanent principle of spiritual life; many of them never receiving it during their whole lives, and the most of them that do receive it, receiving it a long time afterwards.

This appears also from the communication of the Pastoral Spirit, as it was heretofore practiced, compared with what is now succedaneous to it in the very best reformed Churches, as well as in the Roman and Greek. And seeing that, de facto, the succession both of the pastoral and baptismal Spirit is not perpetual, there being evidently many baptized with water, who are not baptized with the Spirit, and many ordained to the pastoral function by the imposition of hands, who have not received thereby the Holy Ghost; therefore, as many as are of this spiritual society, can not presently yield to own a superiority of spirit in the pastoral and episcopal order, as their peculiar and inseparable right. But they think themselves obliged to be faithful to that measure of the Spirit of God in them, which they either mediately or immediately have received, and which is not at all different from the Spirit which is in the true pastors of a true Church, but is the very same with it, and with that which ever has been in all the true pastors and governors since the Apostles.

They think that the Epistles of St. Paul and St. Clement to the Corinthians do bind indeed spiritual persons to a due subordination to their spiritual governors ; but then they also suppose that this subordination was not merely (or chiefly) political, but that it was according to the various distribution of the spiritual gifts, the lower gifts being made to give way to the greater, according to St. Paul's enumeration ; whereby all the members of the mystic body were both distinguished from each other, and united together into the same band.

Thus have I represented to you the case of the Unity of the Church and of Schism, as it is understood not by myself alone, but by many persons of good will in other countries, with whom I have true spiritual correspondency and union.

And the sum of all is this, that the Unity of the Church is the unity also of the Spirit, (et vice versa,) and that there may be a political unity in a true communion without a Spiritual Unity, (et vice versa.) And that they who are of the nearest spiritual unity in the same communion, or in different communions, are not to break themselves off from their respective political unity, so long and so far as they can maintain the spiritual. But where political and spiritual cannot be both preserved, or so well preserved together, there it is safer to recede in some things from the political unity of the Church, than from the spiritual, which is the ground of the political relation of Church members.

XXX.—We of England observe not just the same measures, as they that are abroad : but our principles are the same ; only our reasons of appearing in a more outward work are different.

And even several of us here, that have not a sensible, internal call to such an appearance, do choose rather to retire privately, and wait in peace for the powers of the Holy Ghost to descend, and the kingdom of Christ to come into souls duly disposed ; and so to pray and wrestle together in spirit with us for the times of restitution ; than to declare and proclaim openly the external manifestation of what they enjoy secretly, without a positive command for so doing. Which some having received, do meet together twice every week, as a religious society, for the free exercise of spiritual gifts, and for the better manifesting to others our faith and hope : without raising up altar against altar, or setting up a divided church or communion. In pursuance whereof we do not come together on the Lord's day in the morning, which is a solemn time of public worship and communion every where over the whole world. Nor do we oppose either the doctrine, the discipline, or the worship of the established communion of this nation ; or seek to withdraw any from it, that we may gain them to ourselves.

But on the contrary, we have hitherto acted as friends, while we have been counted as enemies.

Some of us are so far from giving any just occasion of offence, that willingly they would not have met on the Lord's day, or at least not till all the whole service of the day was performed, and could not be prevailed to dispense in this point, but upon some considerations that absolutely necessitated them.

The doctrine of the general restitution, as it is not an article of faith, or term of communion amongst us, nor even generally understood, or maintained by our English Society, so it is not opposite to the established doctrine of an eternity of future punishment in a scriptural sense, nor to any of the articles agreed to in the beginning of the reformation.

It is not condemned by any of the four general Councils, which are received by the Church of England, though it was known before them all ; nor by any of her convocations, as far as I can learn.

Nay, the doctrine of præexistence, which falls in with it very near, has been publicly asserted by some of her learned members, without incurring a censure or being so much as struck at by a decree of an university.

The doctrine of the guidance of the Holy Ghost is indeed carried much higher, than what is vulgarly taught in her pulpits ; but it is not a doctrine contrary to what she anywhere delivers ; but seems rather most conformable to her principles, or at least easily deducible from them.

The doctrine of the Spirit of WISDOM, and of its being distinct from the WORD, as well as one with it, is no less than Apostolical tradition, if we may credit so ancient a writer as Tertullian. And, (being rightly stated,) has never been condemned, as I know, either by the Catholic Church, or this particular church.

Neither do we oppose the discipline of the established Church, any more than the doctrine. The private discipline of our Society doth not interfere with that, or very easily may be kept from interfering.

And the discipline of the Church, being confessedly defective, we have begun to revive among ourselves privately some of the Apostolical constitutions of the Catholic Church.

And that we do not oppose the established worship of this communion, may be made evident from many matters of fact, and not only from our solemn declarations ; which in the Reasons, Propositions and Constitutions of our society have been published.

Some assist at it with much sincerity and devotion : and even at the more solemn parts of it, are not less zealous than the most rigid confirmists. We do not hence claim the name of a Church, but are contented with an inferior title. We say indeed that this Church is imperfect, and so cannot be accepted of Christ as his true bride. But at the same time we own ourselves to be yet imperfect, and therefore we wait to be of that perfect Church, which we surely expect to arise in this nation, and to be gathered both out of the episcopal communion, and out of others that have separated themselves from it, with a design at least (as we hope) of a greater purity. And thus it is mentioned in the first Message to the Philadelphian Society, by way of parable : in which the defect of the Reformation, and of all the sub-reformations in this kingdom, is pointed at, as by the Spirit of Christ sitting in judgment. [The time draweth nigh : as already and hereafter indicated.]

But since we do at present only wait for the manifestation of a pure Church, which is there described, and do not name ourselves that Church, but only a Society preparatory to it, therefore

p. 51

though indeed we do excite others, both publicly and privately, to join with us in the same expectation: yet is not this to make them separate or divide from the present communion, notwithstanding imperfections in it, for the sake of greater perfection in discipline or doctrine, but rather to embrace all that is good and true, and pass over what is not so in an imperfect church.

This is what we have declared again and again, all manner of ways, and upon all occasions, and do hold to, except where there is a clear Divine authority to preponderate the judgment, and some evident and eminent mark of the Divine will.

And though we may seem perhaps to allow no prerogative to the true communion, yet it is because we think there is no great fear that, if truth be set on equal terms with error, that she must turn her back to her adversary. Nay, we desire no greater prerogative for the truth, than we court, than that she may be upon equal terms with whatever may contend with her for that name. That is, we require only impartiality and indifference.

We are not for dissolving either spiritual or the political unity; but since there may be the political without the spiritual unity even in a true communion, and also the spiritual sometimes without the political, therefore we think it our duty, never to recede in the least from the spiritual unity, however the political may occasionally be dispensed with. For to prefer the case before the jewel we have not learnt. This is the state, and these are the pretensions of this Society in England.

XXXI.—Now as for my own part, I believe the communion of saints in the holy catholic Church, and whatever my present engagements are, or may seem to be, I hope I shall ever study to preserve the same, to my utmost ability, wherever it is truly, and never be found to violate it in any part of the church.

I do also believe that this communion will be better understood than it has hitherto been, (the Church of Jerusalem itself not excepted, where it did not continue long in the saints, but began to cool,) and that [N.B.] the church will be more catholic and more holy than it is now, or has at any time been.

And, in acting according to this belief, consists the whole Philadelphian Design. As for irregularities, seeming or real, may have been committed by myself or others, through human frailties, in the prosecution of this design, I am not unwilling to take shame upon me, and I hope, never shall be. But as these do not concern the substance and foundation thereof, I presume that no persons of any ingenuity or candour, will be very severe in charging them. And whatever irregularities and anomalies there may remain for a while, they are perhaps not more to be minded than the scaffolding work to some royal structure.

I am far from having the least natural propensity to what I am now engaged in. And whoever thinks it can proceed from passion or interest, I leave him to enjoy his own thoughts, till the truth shall vindicate or condemn me. Nay, did I consult with flesh and blood, I know, I should not find a greater natural aversion in any, than I do in myself, against what the love of God has constrained me to in these late proceedings; and with respect to which, I hope I may be said with the apostle, to die daily. For truly it is such a cross, as to all outward considerations, that to speak in confidence to you, I were of all men most miserable, if I had not a more than human support to bear me up under it, and the sensible communion of that Spirit, which none can take from me, to comfort, and assure me, that I am yet a true member of the Israel of God.

But because you will doubtless say, that this may be nothing but my own warm imagination, though it doth bring along with it that peace, which is not only above all imagination, but also above all understanding, therefore I beg the favour of you to consider,

Whether there can be proved both de jure and de facto such an Apostolical spirit in the governors of any Church at this day, which may not only oblige every member in all cases ordinary and extraordinary to hold communion with it, but also to hold communion with no other, even where nothing but what is manifestly Apostolical is required for a term of communion, and wherein no part of the discipline doctrine or worship of the said Church is opposed.

Or otherwise, Whether a person who doth not oppose the discipline, doctrine, or worship of a Church which is imperfect; but is willing to hold communion with it, so far as he can with an imperfect Church, may not in some extraordinary cases, as where he really and truly believes a Divine call for it, be permitted to have fellowship with a religious fraternity (not separated, and) that requires nothing to be believed or practised, which is not clearly Apostolical, without incurring thereby the sin against the Holy Ghost, or rebelling against the Apostolical spirit, as resident in the governors of the said Church.

With whomsoever the credentials of such a Spirit shall be found, that can oblige all the members of its communion after this manner, I shall heartily acquiesce, and entirely submit myself to their guidance in all cases.

But then these credentials must be very convincing, and the matter-of-fact solidly established, as well as on ancient Divine right vindicated. Which right, be it never so well vindicated, if it be not made yet evident by facts, is like to faith without works.

Now if this be a dead faith, that possibly may be a dead right, or if it be not altogether dead, it may be paralytical even in a proper sense of the word, whereof to find instances would not be hard.

Whence the stress of this article of Schism, as it is here applied will lie in this proposition, viz. There is an uninterrupted succession of the Apostolical Spirit in every true communion perfect and imperfect, which doth without reserve oblige every one living in such a district, to the exclusion of any other spiritual communion, even while not inconsistent with it.

The consideration of which, and of the consequences thereof, will put an end not only to this, but to many momentous disputes besides. But till they who claim a right by succession to this Spirit of the Apostles, can show it also by real works, that is, by the acts of the Apostles, I am afraid the matter will not be brought to any issue. [N.B.]

XXXII.—In the mean time, whatever may be the censures not only of evil, but also of good men, I cannot easily recede from those principles and practices, which the sincere research of truth against the contrary bias of education and constitution, yea, and of interest too, as well as of honour, has made me to embrace. And if you on your part, require an external evidence, I think it no less reasonable, that the same should here be given to me; the pretensions being so very gree' and the pretenders also many. So I heartily pray that the good LORD would illuminate all Bishops, Priests, and Deacons with true knowledge, and that they being filled with the Apostolical Spirit, may be able to demonstrate it by gifts and powers, agreeable to their respective stations in the church of God : which will be the fulness of my joy and triumph ; and for which I could not only be content to be the least amongst the Nethim of his glorious temple, but even to have no lot at all in the joys and glories of the first-born, or of perfect spirits before the final judgment. If it be His will, you will see where I stand ; and that nothing can separate me from being Hogsdown, Easter morning, 1699.

Your true brother, Francis Lee.

P.S.—I beg your pardon and Mr. Cherry's, for this tedious delay. It is a mistake that I should ever put you off to any of the Theosophic Transactions. I know not whence it should arise, except from this, that somebody might suppose that letter to be yours, which came to me from an unknown hand, and is answered in the state of the Philadelphian Society. I have several times confessed that I was indebted to you an answer, but was not willing to show what I had written in this letter, before you yourself had seen it. This I thought myself obliged to by common decency, besides that special value which I have for your dear person. Whom I pray God long to bless for the good of his church, and for something greater in it, than has yet appeared.

I fear not but I shall be treated by you as a friend, and that the lesser slips that are not of concern to the main subject, you will candidly pass over. Some passages I thought to have struck out, that will appear to have been written with a certain warmth, that I was not master of ; but I have left them in, that you might have a true clear view of my inward parts. The faults also of the transcriber I beg you to pardon, and to believe, that none is, or can be more sincerely and cordially yours, than your old friend.

The following letter accompanied the preceding one :—

Dear and Honoured Sir,—The great sense of my own disability, my natural and acquired aversion to a scholastical war, and the particular advice given me by a learned friend, not to write too soon in vindication of my present sentiments by you attacked, but to wait till I should be able to do it more fundamentally and solidly, as well from higher and clearer experiences in myself, as from a greater maturity of the times, besides other concurrent causes, both internal and external, made me to lay aside this Answer which I had written to your second and third Letters in the year 1698, the conclusion excepted, which I added upon Easter day in the following year, just as I was then going to give the most solemn sign and evidence of my adhesion to the Unity of the Church, according even to your own sense. And I am still ready, on all occasions that are offered me, to do the like, and to express with relation to the national Church, wherein my education has been my hearty and sincere desire of external and internal union, so far as is consistent with Catholic communion, and not repugnant to the operations of the Holy Spirit, which were undoubtedly given to the Apostolical Churches. By which limitation I would not extricate myself from any obligation I may be under, to maintain the peace of this particular Church, to which it pleases God that I should bear a relation, according to his unsearchable wisdom and foreknowledge. I only hereby mean, that I would not have lesser obligation supersede a greater, a succedent one annul that which was prior, or a particular destroy that which is general ; and that I am not to be precluded, by virtue of any private laws or customs in such or such a Church, from obedience to those laws, which are either more universal, or more ancient, or that are uncontestedly derived from a superior authority and a more immediate Divine origin. [N.B.]

This I doubt not but you will readily agree to : and though we may differ in the application hereof, I think about the foundation there can be no dispute.

If any of the rules or prescripts of the Church of England by law established, for the breach of which I am judged of my brethren, can now be proved to have these qualifications, in opposition to what I have been endeavouring to advance in the whole Christian Church these some years past, not without much weakness, and indeed with great reluctance of the flesh, I am content to undergo the severest censure they can pass upon me for the same. And moreover, whatever reparation is in my power to make, I shall be more ready to offer of my own account, than any one to ask ; if the matter appear otherwise, upon a strict examination, than what I have really thought, or asserted to be.

The matter wherein we differ is indeed a matter of great importance : but that I have therein been engaged by the pretences of any mortal, I cannot yield. I can have no fond or partial respect for any ; since I know that Truth is transcendently more related and more connatural to the essence of my soul, than any relation, whether of consanguinity or affinity, can be to my body.* As

* The following paper, found amongst Lee's MSS., in his handwriting, may be deemed interesting in connection with the contents of the above "POSTSCRIPT." It is headed, "Some Questions."

I.—Is it possible for God to deliver over to a spirit of seduction any sincere soul, that shall seek above all things to please him, that shall forsake all things for the sake of him, and that shall take up the cross of Christ in that very thing which is of all others most directly contrary to his nature : And even to deliver him over in the very act of the highest dependence upon the Divine Majesty ?

II.—Is it at all agreeable with the methods of God to suffer evil and seducing spirits there to intrude themselves, and even actually to bring about their design, where man doth not first surrender himself for a prey to their malice, and put himself wholly out of the protection of the good spirits ?

III.—Are our human frailties, or the ordinary and daily sins which well-disposed souls are subject to, in the state of continual combat betwixt the flesh and the spirit, interpretatively before God an act of such a surrender ?

IV.—If they are not, how is it possible for any soul in such a state to be given up by God to a strong and restless delusion in the most material point of his whole life ? Or doth not the state of warfare necessarily infer, that God has not given up such a soul to the deceivableness of unrighteousness of the present case doth suppose ?

V.—Is there, in the course of a man's whole life, a greater, more material point than marriage,

God is no respecter of persons, so I would gladly be an imitator of Him herein; and should I fall in my research after truth, yet this shall be my comfort, that it is not for want of indifference and impartiality, but of capacity, which is not in any one's power, I am sure, to help. If it be my misfortune, it shall never be my fault. Yet I cannot but have better thoughts of the Divine Being, even as considered without Christ, and count nothing more absurd than that imagination, as if he who is truly called the Father of Lights, should refuse to be found of them that seek him in sincerity, for want of sufficient light communicated; or as if he should permit any one to be misled by a false light from the path of truth, who above all things importunes His guidance, and would behold nothing but in His light; or lastly, as if he could make one guilty for a default in this case, which it was in his own power to have prevented, and in none besides. No, surely; the ways of God are equal and impartial, however unequal and partial ours may be. So I need not fear: for I have this abundant consolation springing in my soul, that greater pains none could take to divest himself of all partiality and particularity. For which it were not hard for me to bring even demonstrative evidences.

So far have I been from venturing my eternal state on luscious fancies, or from being biased by warm and unaccountable affections, I have truly examined with as much accuracy as I am capable of, or as the matter will bear, all that may be so reputed by many. I have not been afraid of discovering my error, or even of having it discovered to the world, but have greatly laboured in the discovery, and that perhaps with as much satisfaction as another can take in the discovery of that of others. In this scrutiny which I have made, I have showed no favour or fondness for any person whatever, or for any sentiment whatever, but have considered the weak and indefensible side of both, with the very same indifference as that which is more strong and defensible.

Wherefore, I have not been wanting to declare my dissent, wherever I thought the interests of Truth did oblige me so to do, without any regard to the persons of any who might otherwise appear to have the greatest influence over me. And as I have scrutinized things with such a strict severity, as greater and more objections I think none can find, if so great and many, as what I have already found; so I am better enabled hereby, not only on one hand to judge of the truth that may dwell in me (as I firmly and rationally hope), but also better prepared on the other hand to acknowledge freely, whatever may not be found conformable to the eternal and unchangeable patterns of Truth.

Now, Sir, I could have wished almost, you had either contained yourself within your first argument, or had produced others no less than that of a general nature, and had not sought for evidence from that particular case which you have made choice of. For that as I am extremely averse in my nature to all personal disputes, so especially to such of these, as wherein my interest or affection may seem anyway to have involved me. Wherefore this also has been one occasion of this long delay in not sending you my Answer when finished.

Whatever this or that particular case may be, my principles are the same; I have not taken them up on a sudden, but have compared them for a long while with the Scripture, and also with catholic and Apostolic tradition.

I have brought matters fairly to the test, at least as I am able, and have not been wanting to examine the pretensions of all the several churches and communions, without the bias either of a friend or an adversary; whereby I have been greatly astonished at the strangeness of the mutual misrepresentations, at the Babel of words and terms, at the heats about the obscure or less momentous points of Christianity, and at the general declension of all, both from the faith and on which the happiness or unhappiness of persons doth so much depend; and that not only for this present time, but even beyond it? And if we are to believe that the Divine care and providence, according to our Saviour's doctrine, is concerned about every private circumstance of our lives, shall we suppose that it is unconcerned in a matter of such vast importance: so as to suffer the great turn of human life to run at random; and to submit but the very least and weakest of all God's children and servants, herein to the play of deluding spirits?

VI.—Can there be a greater impiety than to commit a villainous act under the mask of religion; and therefore ought not the grounds of evidence for such a charge to be proportionable?

VII.—Might there not have been many successions of jealousies and surmises against most of the undoubted Prophets of God; yea, even against Christ himself; which might probably be set out with some plausibleness, when yet there was nothing of reality at the bottom? And is not human nature the same now, as it was then: and may not the same pretences be renewed again many times, by which it may be possible for well-meaning persons to be scandalised and take offence?

VIII.—Were there not heats and contentions sometimes among the Apostles themselves? Were there not suspicions and misreports one of another? Were not some of these reports occasioned by them that had an immediate mission from the Apostles? Were there not certain of these Apostolical missionaries who, by an excess of zeal, exceeded their commission? Did not some of these lay heavier burdens on others than was either necessary or laudable? Did not others condescend too far, out of weakness or fear? or were not even their just condescensions perversely misinterpreted? Were not the impositions of the one, and the compliances of the other sort made to have another effect than was intended by them? Did not rents and scandals arise in the churches from these misapprehensions, and from the siding with such as had a manifest Apostolical commission? Was it ever known that spiritual persons were exempted from the danger of falling into this partiality, if they kept not to the head? Were there not very bad consequences drawn both from actions and doctrines that were not only innocent, but holy; by such as had submitted to the Divine authority of the persons? May not the heats and contentions of the (really or pretendedly) spiritual persons of this day arise from the same ground; and will they not naturally produce the same effects? And is it at all to be wondered at, if many evils and scandals do arise out of a spiritual jealousy (which is often found lurking in such as are otherwise very good persons,) and that this spiritual jealousy doth arise from a partial consideration of many causes, not always attended with an evil will: Wherefore ought we not to be very careful in taking up reports and jealousies against a brother or a sister, even from such persons as are truly spiritual?

IX.—If the best and most spiritual are capable of being mistaken or misled, either by inadvertency, or intemperancy of zeal, is it not most advisable to forbear from condemning any one, till discipline, as well as the practice of the first and purest times, while the gifts of the Holy Spirit remained yet in the Church.

And what the result has been, I owe to certain principles and digested axioms, which are not flexible, but very stiff. Wherein the principles that I stand on (as considered in themselves) are faulty, I shall be glad to be informed. And indeed I expected hence that the Propositions, etc. of the Philadelphia Society (or somewhat of that kind) might sooner have fallen under your examination than those books, [N.B.] from which only a guess can be had at what these may be. And truly I cannot sufficiently admire, that this has generally been the method of the most or all of them that I have had to do with in this matter, that they count it enough to fall upon such or such particular writings, [N.B.] that are most obscure and farthest from being comprehended, or upon some sentiments and tenets that are positively declared by us not to be essential, or upon our religious meeting as a Society, and some practices in it; and yet take not the least notice of those grounds and elements on which we proceed, and upon which the whole superstructure is laid. Whereas whether any one receives or receives not these writings, whether he adheres to such doctrines or leaves them, and whether he be free or not free to be present at such exercises, [N.B.] he may still cleave most firmly to the first and common elements, to which all do universally agree, that breathe with us after the renovation (as we think) of the true evangelical Spirit, and of the Apostolical dispensation; and till these be overturned, all the labour that is taken besides will be to little if any effect.

But I am persuaded that the first principles and common elements of this glorious dispensation (as I take it to be) will not be so easily to be shaken by any as some perhaps might imagine, who have thought us more worthy of contempt than of notice. There are men of the soundest heads have undertaken this province, to represent them in their due light: and what is wanting in me, I doubt not but God will abundantly supply in a little time, by the concurrent assistance of others of a far deeper learning. I have the honour and happiness to be acquainted with some of several nations, [N.B.] that are exquisitely skilled in human and Divine knowledge; of whom I am certain that they will leave nothing unturned for the sake of Truth, which has been so greatly oppressed through the violence and prejudice of parties. And if our first principles be once established, as some think they may, almost past contradiction, then do I not much fear any attacks that are, or shall be made against the superstructure. [Who they? what their writings, if any?]

I proposed some Questions to you in my first letter, which had you been pleased to think worth an Answer, for which I could think of none so fitly qualified as yourself, as I should have taken it for a particular favour, so it might much have contributed to the setting me right, if I am in the wrong. But I would put any task upon you, how much soever the consideration of them might conduce to elucidate the truth, or make out the falsehood, of certain principles that I cannot forego, they appearing to me as irresistible as steel.

I find that under the Judaical dispensation there was the greatest imaginable care for the preservation of the unity of the body, by means of the communications of the Divine Spirit, as from a visible head. And yet it cannot be denied, but, this dependance notwithstanding, there have been some who have publicly prophesied in the camp and Church of Israel, without any commission from that visible head, and who have not been reprov'd for so doing, after an accusation made against them for Schismatical separation.

Even Moses, who certainly was not a stranger to the extent of his own authority, and who but just before had received an express Divine order, to communicate of the same Spirit which there can be a full and thorough hearing of both sides: and if that cannot be, to suspend our judgment, to accept what is clearly good and approvable in any, and to cleave unmovably to the head? Is not this the safest method that can be taken both in general and particular disputes? Is there any possibility of being preserved otherwise from error and mistake? Or is there a more pernicious error in faith, or more dangerous mistake in fact than that which would seat us on the tribunal of Christ by making us transgressors of his law.

X.—If it be against the law of Christ to judge others, while we are not sure of being ourselves acquitted, who shall be left to set up a spiritual judicature? Is there any but Christ himself that can decide the differences at this day found among spiritual persons; and which could not but arise from the present crepuscular light prophesied of? Where there is therefore a most clear appeal made to his tribunal, ought any one to remove it thence? And if there be all the sensible marks of joy in the appellant, according as the decision seems to draw nearer, can there be a more evident sign of the appellant's sincerity?

[Here in the MS. there is an absence of two leaves or four pages, which are lost. What follows, however, will perhaps sufficiently instruct us in the nature of this document by Lee, which appears to be a casuistical justification to himself, of his marriage, against the judgment of his immediate friends, and of Mrs. Lead against the aspersions cast upon her as having brought about that event by intrigue; as also it informs us of the manner of Lee's becoming acquainted with Mrs. Lead, whence ensued his marriage with her daughter, which took place probably in the year 1696. His deep devotion to God, and pure love of the truth, be the depository of it where it might, and the operations of it never so offensive to unregenerate reason, may be inferred from what is related in this Treatise. Many of the MSS. referred to by his daughter, in her preface to his posthumous "Dissertations," the writer of these lines recently found amongst Mr. Law's odd papers, from which source the extracts herein given, are obtained. When Law retired from town, in the year 1740, some three years or so after the decease of his old friend Mr. Gibbon, he it would appear, borrowed Dr. Lee's papers to look over; and, judging from the carefully-written copies he has made of numerous of those papers, and from his own latter conformity of opinion upon certain mysterious theological points in the above 'Apologetical Letter,' he must have entertained a great respect for Lee's talents as a learned spiritual writer. The paraphrase of the "Supersensual Life," which was inserted in some of the last issue of the fourth volume of Behmen's works, published 1781, and there incorrectly stated (by Langelake?) in a note, to have been composed by Mr. Law, (the MS. of it having been found in his handwriting,) was written by Lee, and merely copied by Law. The writer of these lines has in his possession both the original of Lee, and the copy by Law, with other curious pieces by Lee, one of which is a Dialogue between Lazarus and his Sisters, after rested on himself, to a certain select number, durst not prohibit them to prophecy, upon whom the Spirit of God immediately fell, or without the ordinary means of conveyance. He condemned them not for this, as being private spirits, or as breaking the public and external band of the one Spirit. He stood not here on his ecclesiastical prerogative, neither called he on the Divine Justice to vindicate his cause in behalf of the true Spirit, as in other cases he had done. But so far was he from condemning, that he justified; so far from confining the gifts of the prophetic Spirit to such a select and separate number, that he even earnestly wished and prayed that the whole Lastly might be made partakers of it.

And have we not the example also and command of a greater than Moses, not to be rash in condemning all those spirits, that walk not with us in the same external communion? If I mistake not very much, there is some such thing which our blessed Lord has taught his disciples. And I know not how to make any sense of his words, if there may not be a true internal communion of the same Spirit, in some cases, under different external communions. I think also, it is an ancient observation, that the Eastern Magi so soon as they diverted to seek counsel at Jerusalem, where was yet undoubtedly the true church, lost the sight of the star, which was given to lead them but was taken from them, while they were consulting with the ordinary leaders. [?]

How applicable this may be, I leave for others to judge. There is an infinite variety, you know, in cases, and it is utterly impossible, that any two should be exactly parallel. But thus much at least is evident, that the true and genuine Spirit of God is not so limited as some have been apt to imagine, in favour of themselves, or of that communion which they espouse to the exclusion of all besides. There are many things relating to the economy of Moses and the prophets, as also of Christ, and his apostles, that I could heartily wish were thoroughly and impartially considered for this end.

And after all that you have written for preserving the unity of the Catholic Church, I am fully persuaded that there are yet some things remaining behind untouched by you, that upon a further examination you will find to conduce to catholic peace, as much as anything you have hitherto said. Perhaps also they may more, as the genius of mankind runs at this time.

It is not to me altogether absurd, to believe that there may be even in false and contradictory communions sometimes a real participation of that very Spirit, which was conferred by our Saviour's baptism. And I cannot find any demonstration, that the true Spirit of prophecy was ever confined by God, so much as to the Jewish church only; while that was his peculium: nor dare I to say, that He was such a stranger to all the world besides, as some would have him to be. The ways and methods of the Divine Wisdom are various, yea infinite. I can say, had I not seen, I had not believed. But having seen, I believe that the Spirit of God blows where it lists, and that no man knows whence it comes, or where it goes.

How well soever accountable the style of one or two persons, whom you mention in particular, (while there is a whole cloud of witnesses that stand up for the very same principle,) may be from such other originals as you name, distinct from that of the Divine Spirit, it is not very material in my opinion: however, I had considered them before, and though much remains, that might be said on each of the heads, I forbear. If an atheist, or deist should say, that the style of the Jewish prophets is very well accountable from originals, distinct from that of the Divine Spirit; or if a Jew or Pagan should say, that the beginning of St. John's Gospel is very accountable from Platonic philosophy, I do not think that you would be hereby moved in the least to detract either from the Prophets or from St. John, that veneration which is for certain due to them. And were I his return from the dead, wherein he answers the inquisitiveness of Martha and the occasional remarks of the meek and peaceful Mary, concerning his sensations and experiences in dying and in the spiritual world, all according to the principles of Behmen's central philosophy, and as especially set forth in the paraphrase of the "Supersensual Life" tract: among which also is a series of Four hundred and fifty devotional Mystical Meditations, part of which, by the way, might serve as an Exercise Book to the Grammar of Wisdom (p. 8.), etc.—Freher was another author, whose works in MS., Law procured to peruse and copy, and where needful he improved the composition of them in his own copy. These are the writings that are required in sequence of those of Law and Behmen to make the scientific world to pronounce Behmen the prince of philosophers ancient or modern; for Freher could satisfy the demands of experimental science, by displaying each link of the chain from the centre of spirit to the most outward physical development, both of powers and substances. He was also an intimate acquaintance of Gichtel.—The period when Law first became acquainted with Behmen's works would appear to have been between the years 1733 and 1736, whereupon he acquired a knowledge of the German language, in order to understand that wonderful writer in his native tongue. He would doubtless not fail at the same time to make researches after living masters of Behmen, and so would hear of Freher's MSS. also more particularly of the Philadelphians, Lee and others. And this supposition is probable, from what Law says of Pordage and Mrs. Lead, in his "Animadversions" tract, in 1740, and in his already quoted letter to Dr. Cheyne; though it is possible that Law's perfectly square and evangelically illuminated reason might have afterwards submitted to a greater toleration of Lead, (though he would class her compositions among those peculiar writings which are only fit for private perusal,) than now appears; judging from the trouble he took in copying Lee's MSS., and from his having adopted some of the particular opinions on certain mysterious theological points which are so ingeniously displayed and contended for by Lee in the above correspondence.

In regard to visions and revelations, Law, as Behmen and all the judicious mystical divines, maintains that they are not at all to be sought after, or even desired, in any part of a religious soul's exercises; for that the Divine Wisdom in this respect, bloweth only where it listeth, and no man can take unto himself to be a Divine Oracle, any more than he can raise the dead. Such as are led by the Spirit of grace, from the outward to the inward, on their way to the inmost, will do well to remember the sole end of Christianity, in regard to themselves, viz.: holiness, devotion, and usefulness; and also to notice the descriptions or distinctions in regard to Divine visions, made by Law, in reference to Behmen, on p. 86, of the present treatise, the fourth or last particular of which belongs exclusively to the individual who is the subject thereof, that is, whose ternarius sanctus has been opened, so that he has to himself an apprehension of supersensual realities; the afraid of uttering anything that might seem any wise to contribute toward the reigning Deism and infidelity of the age, I could shew in almost every one of the ancient prophets, how their style may be accountable from different originals. And how both matter and style in most might have been excepted against in those days, not only by Sadducees, and such as the French call Les Esprits Forts, but even by the stricter sort of religionaries among the Jews, and the very precisions and zealots themselves of the law. This might be shewn not only in Daniel, who was an archi-magus in the Chaldean College, and in Ezekiel who seems likewise not uninstructed in the eastern philosophy and magic; not only in Hosea and Zachariah, whereof the one as to his manner of speech is scarce (if at all) defensible, according to the European method of writing, and the other is truly magical therein, and in his figures appears to have written much after the rules of Oniroticritics; but even in Jeremiah himself, who from a child was called to be a prophet (in like manner as Samuel), and was certainly sanctified to a special ministration from his birth, and was mighty in word and in power, even to that degree, as hardly anything can be spoken higher of a mere man than of him, and yet it might very well be conceived, how his prophesies might give umbrage to the majority as well of the clergy as of the laity, and make them to count him for an enemy of the temple, of the law, and of the holy people. For which it would not be difficult to produce several plausible grounds at this distance of time, from not a few places in his book: and doubtless some others might then be produced by his enemies, both priests and prophets. And if so great a friend of God, as this holy prophet, was no better understood or received in his day, we must not think it hard in ours to meet with near the same lot. God will vindicate his own glory in his own appointed time; and truth will at last get the victory over all error, and dispel the clouds of misapprehension.

On which account, I have been the more large in the Examination of the particular Case itself, on which you lay so great weight. I have shewed the several prejudices both special and general, not to be altogether so legitimate, as upon a cursory looking into these books you did conclude:

I have shewn that the author no where denies right reason, but only corrupt; nor supersedes the authority of Scripture, but only the false glosses upon it: That no doctrine is taught in these revelations, which ought to be called another gospel; and that the testimonials which are brought for their authority, are not so insufficient, as is commonly pretended: That imagination is not capable to produce all the effects specified in them; and that even to the imagination itself there are proper criterions of truth, which may very clearly be discerned: That the pretence of complexion is likewise precarious and unaccountable; and that to fly to fevers and distempers is a refuge not becoming a wise man: That to suppose the influence of evil spirits in this case, is most particulars of which, however minutely related, the hearers cannot by any possibility understand, but only their possible certainty. Yet, as Mr. Law says, it is in these things that the inquisitiveness of otherwise well instructed minds is employed, as if it were possible to apprehend them; and in another place, that Divine secrets will only be made known in God's own time, and not a minute sooner, however men may try to fathom the prophecies.—Let this be a monition to all visionaries, in publishing their favours to the world; let them know that the only possible good such things can do, is to lead those and those only who have ears to hear, or are specially constituted for such statements, to pursue the process they themselves pursued, before arriving at the state, where Wisdom could open to them her sevenfold gates;—which consisted simply in a strict conformity to the Gospel counsels, from the first commencement of repentance to the highest perfection of holiness and purity. At the same time, let them warn their reader, that these things are simply personal to the subject of them; that he must not think of seeking or desiring visions, but simply follow on (in the indicated process, of the “Grammar of Wisdom,”) to know the Lord, diligently pursuing that path day by day without drawing back, or looking aside, until he attain to the true high degree of Christian development, and himself arrive at the portal of Wisdom's temple. And further, that even then, were the gates of the Divine revelation to be opened to the newly arrived soul, she is not to demand or expect the self-same revelations as she might have read of in others, for the wonders of the Divine Wisdom are infinitely various, as also the complexions of the souls she delights to manifest herself unto; so that never are two revelations alike. Had visionists, that is such as were truly holy, and have had their ternarius sanctus really opened, or their friends who have published their writings, (Behmen is not herein comprehended, for he, guided by Wisdom, most wonderfully shields every part of his writings from abuse,) had they but offered these common-sense cautions to their readers, they would have prevented much fanaticism and self-deception, at the same time had honourably thrown all necessary protection around the holy doctrine, that God has his peculiar blessings for every age, and is ever ready to open the treasury of his Wisdom to such of his devoted holy children as will prepare themselves by purity of heart, for such manifestations—a doctrine, inseparably interwoven with enlightened Christianity, however it may be ignorantly slighted or vehemently denounced by even good men: nor will the Church rise into its proper grade of perfection and glory until this doctrine be duly promulgated, though of course to such only as are arrived at a state to receive it.—These reflections have arisen in the mind of the writer upon reading the prefaces to Lead's works, and other pieces of Lee, in connection with the Philadelphia Society. Not that he considers her prophetic, mystical, transcendental writings of any public utility, or that she was an inspired prophetess, or that her declarations are uniformly true, any more than those of Bourignon. But we must by a natural process arrive at a state, in order to apprehend the truth, and God in his regulating wisdom brings every persevering seeker into a state to know every truth that will benefit him, or carry out the secret purposes of the Divine Love. Let him that readeth judge of this from a proper state.

Law being a person of reputation as a learned and pious divine, and an accomplished metaphysical casuist, he would have no difficulty in obtaining the loan of the MSS. alluded to, (as also in Lee's posthumous “Dissertations,”) on his retiring to King's Cliff at the ~~close~~ ^{early} of the year 1740; though it is evident from his “Appeal,” that he must have been a student of Freher's works previously. From that period to the year 1749, when the First Part of the Spirit of Prayer was published, his chief literary recreation at King's Cliff might have been the making himself master of the lights of Lee, Freher, Behmen, and other scientific and experimental theosophical mystics, both of the continent and this country; so as to reproduce the essence or quintessence of their knowof all absurd, as it is most uncharitable, and is directly contrary to the very sense of St. Paul. I have also shewed that the said books are not published under a false name, but that they were really written by the person that pretends to them: That Dr. Pordage, however misrepresented to the world, was a person of great sincerity and ingenuity, and wholly improper and unlikely to be the father of so notorious an imposture as is charged upon him: And lastly I have considered and stated those sentiments which are accused of heresy. And upon the whole I cannot discern those greater evidences, which you make your appeal to, in opposition to them, which I have in this matter.

I would not please myself, or deceive others with any fallacious excuses, nor have I the least ambition of making any proselytes to myself, or of setting up a new sect. I have proceeded after quite another manner, my conscience bearing me witness.

It is well known, that I have not wished to encourage any to desert the ordinary methods and means of the Christian Religion, upon any pretences of greater purity or otherwise. But on the contrary, I have both by letter and by word of mouth, frequently admonished and excited such as I have found to be of a soaring spirit, to adhere closely to the common rules and ordinances of Christianity; and to abide and wait therein, that they may arrive to a life of Contemplation, and thereby to the more peculiar favour of God. And at a time when I was most of all exclaimed against, I was then most busy in vindicating the precepts and institutions of my blessed Lord, and particularly of his baptismal Spirit: as the copies of several letters lying by me can testify, though some of them may be lost. If it please Him to draw souls into this more secret and hidden way, into which he has graciously drawn me, it is my duty to be assistant to them, all that I can. You yourself would do so, had you that conviction which I have. You are indeed concerned with an holy zeal, and are sensible of the contagion (as you call it), as beginning to spread in the University. And so am I also concerned with a zeal, which I hope is according to knowledge, for the glory of God, and for the advancement of his true kingdom on earth; and do not therefore fear that it shall be imputed to me for sin, if haply I should mistake, after I have done my utmost to gain the best satisfaction. We both contend for God (give me leave to say so); we both call on him as our Father, in the name of his Son, and we both, I hope, seek to please him as such; and both study nothing but the propagation of Truth, and the same blessed interest. Wherefore if we cannot in our sentiments, let us still embrace as friends, if not as brethren. And O that we could as brethren! Dear Sir, shut me not out of your bowels, who do comprehend you in mine. If I have straggled from the fold of my shepherd, treat me not as if I were become an adversary or a stranger. The greatest saints have fallen, that their rising again might be more exceeding glorious. And ledge, in his own incomparable standard style of natural logical thought and force of conviction in his future publications.—The candidate will apprehend the character of Law's theological principles and piety from his published works, as they successively appeared, the first epoch thereof extending to about the year 1719 or 1722; the second being a recession from what may be termed outward church hierarchies, principles, and systems, to the deep inward study of himself, according to the light of Christ, and therefore embracing the evangelical ascetic and pure mystic divinity, up to about the year 1733 or 1736; and the third being a superinduction upon the latter, viz. that of theosophy, or the true science of universals, the ground and relations of intellectual and physical Nature, after that period. It is to these last sublime studies, belonging only to those who have actually divested themselves of the ferine spirit, and are risen with Christ into his newness of life and light, that we hear so often applied by popular religionists, the hackneyed phrase of "being wise above what is written."—But is it not strange that it should never cross the minds of those who thus so glibly misapply Scripture, that to know what is written in the Word of God, can be no slight or ready task, even to such masters of spiritual knowledge as they may deem themselves to be; for as the Word of God, it must be an exact expression of the mind of God, of the wisdom of God, of the will of God, which must necessarily lie couched therein, and which therefore requires no ordinary vision to penetrate and to declare, in its variety, profundity, and life-inspiringness of truth. The Word of God is truly said to contain a revelation of all mysteries and all knowledge; as indeed the other expressed word of God, the book of Nature; and likewise that still more wonderful expressed word and wisdom, and fulness of the Deity, the book of MAN in his true form of existence, that is, a full-grown Christian; but the reader must have eyes, or he will in vain try to read it, but be like the Jews of old, who said, "are we blind also;" for it is according to the state a man is in, that he understands the Scripture, or any revelations of the Deity, in creation, or grace. For instance, if he be as yet in the state of nature, conversant only with scholastic theology, or but imperfectly awakened, he reads and explains the Scripture according to the rudimental principles of piety; if he have ascended higher into the school of real regeneration, and practical mystic science, he understands it further of the things of the Spirit, of salvation, of the conscious love of God, of the inward life, and growing union with Christ; and if advanced still higher, to the central, most inward, supersensual or theosophic ground, the pinnacle of all Nature, he then finds so much the more sublime testimonies contained in Scripture: but odd enough, each grade calls the next above it, enthusiastical or mystical! Hence it is, that to those who are in the lowest degree of Christian life and understanding, the Scripture only proposes low things; but in proportion as they return to their true original, and redeemed state, in CHRIST, it becomes to them a clearer and clearer mirror of the grace and love and wisdom and wonders, and deep things of God. Thus briefly upon "being wise above what is written:" we now return to the closing portion of the document of Lee.]

[See p. 502 & 49] of seventy years old [Mrs. Lead] is pressed by her friends not to neglect herself, since it had pleased God to visit her thus in her old age; but to take somebody to live with for the remaining part of her life, that might have the care of her in her outward darkness. And A. having one daughter, who had suffered much in the world, there being then a generation and Christian offer for her deliverance by a noble stranger, for the convenience of a special dedication to God; nobody could be so proper for her as she was. D. this noble stranger [the Baron of Kriphausen] is so touched in his heart, as he cannot rest till this be accordingly accomplished: and liberally contributes to the settling of the mother and daughter together for the end aforesaid. E. the daughter of A. embraces with joy both the offer and the condition of D. Now E. by having frequented the cell of A. to pay her duty to A., as often as she had leisure, which was once or twice what am I that I should boast in my strength. However with Job I must justify to the last : and I know that I shall not be utterly cast off by my God, though all the world should reject me, and none of my brethren know me.

You may please to remember, that I have never yet for myself, or for others, pleaded an exception from human imperfections or frailties ; and that in the very first public paper, relating to our undertaking, it was acknowledged, that there was much weakness and imperfection, superfluity, and mixture in the foundation of our Society, whence it may be a little disingenuous to tax us with every failure that we may be really guilty of, which we may be perhaps no less sensible of than others, though not able presently to redress. [N.B.] The greatest things have begun often very imperfectly, and I know that you are wiser than to despise weak beginnings.

The writings that you censure do appear in great weakness to the world ; but this hinders not the power of God working through them. And they have not been for certain altogether without their credentials or authentic proofs ; if an intrinsic evidence be here of any validity, which is so generally pleaded for in a like case.

These credentials may possibly rise higher and higher, and objections evanish still more and more, as it shall please God to favour a poor despised cause.

And notwithstanding that you may have entertained a worse opinion of our cause than formerly, by having turned over the said writings, I am persuaded that it is but an opinion, and therefore may not always abide with you. When I was in company with Mr. Cherry and your two other learned friends, I remember there was an objection started against this author, that appeared extremely plausible, as if in one of her books (which was then produced), she had written somewhat very derogatory to the Humanity of Christ. And as I heard of the same objection also (but mediately) from Dr. Cockburn, and several others, whom I esteem men of sense, and probity ; and was most sharply attacked by Mr. G. Keith on that very head, above all others, without the least mercy, I considered with myself, whether it were not possible so to represent the matter under certain Propositions as the whole truth might evidently and nakedly appear, either for or against her. Accordingly I drew up some propositions, and sent them him in a letter, wherein I have proved that Mr. Keith, according to his own principles, never yet renounced, ought to have been the first man in the world to justify her ; and that he has mistaken her meaning to that degree, as there cannot be a greater argument of her orthodoxy in that point, than what he, with others, have brought not only to charge her with heresy but also with blasphemy. I have patiently waited for his Answer, which he gave me hopes of, and therefore have hitherto forebore to communicate to any, what was sent to him, with a more immediate designation to his own private satisfaction : which I almost think has been given him, and that he finds now just reason to retract that opinion, which he so rashly entertained, (even in a week, meets there C. [F. Lee] : and a friendship is contracted betwixt C. and E. upon a spiritual account. A. also appoints C. sometimes to meet her at the Chamber of E., to which her letters were addressed ; her cell lying at a little distance in the country, and in a House of Charity, which was altogether inconvenient for her constant correspondence abroad. So at length A. opens to C. the proposal of marriage with E., who was a widow ; and confirms the same by an assurance that God would bless it eminently, for that it was made known to be expressly according to His will. The proposal is considered, all the concerning circumstances are examined, and the pretensions to a manifestation herein of the divine pleasure are weighed. C. knows not how to determine himself, seeks to have no choice of his own ; desires to be passive in this and in all God's designs upon him ; and with prayer and faith commits himself wholly to the heavenly direction in this great affair of life. He sees in E. a simplicity that was without guile ; and in A. a great disinterestedness as to externals, for the sake of the invisible glories of Christ to be manifested : and cannot discern in one or the other, that the overture did proceed from temporal and earthly ends. So upon the repeated encouragements from D., A. resolves to take a little house, in which she might have the advantages of a more commodious retirement, for their united waiting upon God, and for their carrying out their peculiar ministration which C. thought was committed to A. C. consents to the resolution : and an house is presently hired in a place that was every way convenient enough, and not far from the lodging of C. Here it is agreed that A., C. and E. shall give themselves up in instant prayer and holy watchfulness for the space of forty days : and to expect the further determination of Almighty God at the end thereof. This gives immediately an umbrage to the friends of C., who were apprehensive of what all this must necessarily tend to, particularly to the brother of C., who leaves all to be acted by A. In this space many strange things happen to C., and some great temptations beset him ; wherein he found the grace of God still present with him to support him, and bear him through. At the end of the days all things are accomplished for the marriage, which was blessed with the presence of some spiritual friends. And as C. at one of the first interviews with E. was to his greatest surprise directed to a strange passage in the book of Tobit, so was it concluded in the fear of God by observing the counsel of the angel to young Tobias. And much besides was done to consecrate this marriage to Christ, beyond any instance that is commonly known.

This is the case : and if all this can be but a satanical delusion, then is the marriage of C. and E. the most miserable that ever was in the world. But if it is not, then is it blessed, and is holy to God, whatever man shall judge concerning it." Thus ends the MS. in Lee's handwriting.

So much having been said throughout the preceding pages, of the "Christian Perfection" and the "Serious Call," as the law in the order of Mr. Law's writings, it may not be unacceptable to the reader to have afforded to him, a glimpse of the character of the next succeeding treatise which Law, in his letter to * * * in 1738, referred to p. 94, said he considered "well timed after those discourses." We therefore insert the following extract from that work, and, though so brief, we do not hesitate to aver, that it contains within it the fulness of that peculiar evangelical instruction, which is so specially claimed by the modern evangelical writers, as the peculiar characteristic of their doctrine ; and further, we challenge them to produce its equal in that respect in any of their own treatises in ten times the number of pages. Do but imagine a poor broken down penitent, well informed in the language of the gospel, conscious of the high requirements of God's righteousness, finding after repeated experiments no ability to live up to the gospel commands, and seeing no way for a deliverance from the weight and burden of his sins, in short, in a total despair against the honour of Christ's human nature, which he would seem thereby to maintain, as likewise his censure of good Mr. Bromley, that is no less demonstratively unjust, than if I should retort the same heavy charge upon Mr. Keith, as if he did not believe or teach an outward Christ.

Truth needs no more than to be fairly represented; that is the best apology for her that can be made. There is no end of running out into personal controversies, which are for the most part altogether impertinent, and drop of themselves, as soon as there is a right understanding. This I doubt not but you will find in the particular case before us (human frailties still excepted), and that the veil that is betwixt us being so removed, we shall yet know one another to be brethren in the unity of the same spirit, how variously soever and seemingly contrary the manifestations thereof may be.

And now, dear Sir, since you seem as to challenge something for the sake of the public, I leave you wholly to your liberty to do herein what you shall judge proper: and you may command the originals or copies of those letters with which you have favoured me, when you please. I would not have any involved in danger on my account; but on the contrary could wish myself even a sacrifice for the sake of my brethren, and of my countrymen, and for the peace of Jerusalem, which my soul loveth.

The good Lord reward your labour of love for me, your zeal for his name and for catholic unity, and crown you with everlasting blessings, in that inheritance of light, which may manifest things hidden as well from your as from my eyes. May he convince me by his gracious Spirit in whatsoever I err, or am in the wrong; and confirm me wherever I am in the right, that the gates of hell may never prevail against me, neither the tempests from a raging world overwhelm me. May he also, if I am in the right, so give unto you in the due time, such a spirit of wisdom and revelation, as by the most essential illumination of the spiritual eyes, and most experimental knowledge, you also may be made to confess that, for which I am at this day counted as the offscouring of the earth, and that I may have the joy of subscribing myself, even according to principles, in the deepest and most real sense, and more than formerly, Your most affectionated brother

Hogsdon, [Hoxton,] March 25, 1701.

In the heart of the Lord Jesus, Fra. Lee.

We append the following letters, (omitting the replies of Dodwell), which concluded the controversy:—

Hogsdon, May 31, 1701.

Dear Sir,—Yours bearing date April 28th. came not to my hands till the 28th. of this month in the afternoon, which surprised me much. I was at the same time visited by Mr. Edward Stephens, who did heartily enquire after you, and by other company, just as your letter was delivered of self and all creaturely help; do but imagine such an one in this state, (which it is the direct natural tendency of the "Christian Perfection" and "Serious Call" to bring their faithful student unto), and then say if any thing more suitable, more edifying, more evangelical, in the whole nature of gospel instructions can possibly be placed before such a character, or in Law's words, can be better timed. And yet this is the man, whom the modern Calvin divinity critics represent as "wanting a perception of the all-refreshing and comforting views of the gospel, or as keeping them in the background"! Take all the cherished conceits and imaginations of the modern evangelical doctrines together, and if reduced to pure essential truth, we repeat they do not contain one particle more of solid evangelical instruction for a penitent, to induce and enable him to "lay hold of Christ" in the importunity, simplicity, and full assurance of faith, than is contained in this following extract if duly apprehended; which is from Law's Review of An Account of the Nature and End of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper:—

"Further, this author's absurd interpretation of the word remembrance in the Sacrament, is founded on this gross error, that the things to be remembered, are things done and past, and therefore only capable of being remembered by an act of the memory. This he expressly says in many places. Thus, They, says he, could not do the actions here named, in remembrance of any thing which was not done and past. And in other places, that the benefits cannot be present that are to be commemorated.

And therefore the whole support of this arguing is founded on this error, that the things to be remembered, are done and past. Which is an error, that he could not have fallen into, if he had but moderately understood the nature either of the Jewish or Christian religion.

Now that which is to be remembered in the sacrament is Christ, or the benefits and blessings of Christ as the Saviour of mankind; but neither Christ, nor his benefits and blessings have the nature of things done, or gone and past, but are always present, always in being, always doing, and never done.

Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, always was, now is, and ever will be present as the Saviour of the world. He is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, and therefore equally present in and through all, from the beginning to the end. Behold, saith he, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him.* Thus he stood at the door of Adam's heart, as near as he stood to the Apostles, and thus he stands, and will stand knocking at the door of every man's heart, till time shall be no more. Happy he that does not consider this Christ as absent, and is only for such a supper of the Lord, as will not admit of his presence. [* Rev. iii. 20.]

The benefits and blessings of Christ as the Saviour of mankind, began with the first promise of a seed of the woman to bruise the serpent's head; they have continued with this promise, they are the benefits of every age, they will never be at an end, till all that was implied in that promise shall have its full completion in the utter destruction of the serpent. Jesus Christ was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; and the first sacrifice of the first man, and every sacrifice since, that hath been accepted of God, has been made solely acceptable through the benefits and blessings of Christ.

All the shadows and types, sacrifices and ceremonies of the Jewish religion were only so many ways of applying the benefits of Jesus Christ to that people.

Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, is the same in and through all ages; he to me. The next day being Holy Thursday, the weather also bad, I went not to town. But yesterday morning upon your information given me, that you had received nothing from me, I went to Mr. Took, who had either quite forgot, or else knew nothing of the matter, the same having been taken in his absence. But he presently found it, and promised to send unto you the very same day, what had been so long before designed for you. Whence I hope you shall have now received both my large Apologetical Letter, and the shorter one, which your repeated instances drew from me. I wish that for the future you might be pleased to send your letters directly to me by the post, or at least by some other way that might not admit of such delays. However, I submit this wholly to your prudence; as I do everything else that is in my power.—But it is not in my power, good Sir, to think after such or such a train or manner; no matter how reasonable soever it may appear to others. And there is no need for you to intreat to be determined by what I myself shall judge to be reasonable: for it is impossible for me not to be so. I assure you none shall more willingly surrender to the determination of right reason, than I do.

And having considered what Valerianus Magnus has written concerning it, in his book, “De Luce Mentium,” I must needs tell you, that I am (whatever you may think of me) one of the greatest admirers of reason in the whole world; that is, of reason in its truest and deepest sense, as the eternal and uniform (though multifarious) light of all created spirits.

Nor on the other hand know I how to believe the first revelations of our Christian religion, without believing also a succession of the same Spirit, (the spirit of revelation,) which gave them to be in the Church; and without believing several other truths which I apprehend necessarily to depend thereupon, and to lead into the knowledge of, and communion with the mystical body of Christ. Perhaps there may be a greater connexion betwixt what was anciently given by the Divine Spirit, and what is still by some few maintained to be so, than every one is aware of. The same holy Scriptures that forewarn us against a multitude of seducing spirits, do also warn us sufficiently of those, that do make the most clear revelations of God of no effect by their human glosses, criticisings, and do tell us not only of scoffers, and such as resist the Holy Ghost, and oppose the second appearance of Christ in the glory and power of his kingdom, but likewise of the virgins themselves, some whereof shall fall asleep and others slumber. I forbear to make the application. But I think it high time for the world to awake, and for the whole Christian Church to go forth out of her chamber to meet her bridegroom, who by many signs and voices declares himself to be coming. This confession I cannot but make before angels and men, howsoever I may be censured for it. I must do it, after having searched into the revelations of the Old and New was the Saviour of Adam, the Patriarchs, and the Jews, just as he is our Saviour. His body and blood, offered in their sacrifices, was their atonement, as it is ours, offered upon the cross. His flesh and blood was meat and drink, or a principle of life to them, as it is to us.

Jesus Christ was theirs as he is ours, he was the life, and substance, and spirit of the law, as he is the life, and substance, and spirit of the gospel; only with this difference, that then Christ was covered, and received under more outward figures and ceremonies than he is now; we do that more openly, which was then done more covertly by the Israel of God.

His atonement for our sins is not a transitory thing, that began and ended with his passion and death, but it began with the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world; for he was the Lamb of God slain in all their types and sacrifices through every age, till he became the real expiatory sacrifice on the cross for the sins of the world.

When he died upon the cross, his atonement did not then become a thing that was over, or past, and done, that was only to be remembered by an act of the memory, but continued increasing in its power and virtue.

As Christ by his death put an end to nothing in religion but types and prefigurations, so by his death he put an end to nothing of his atonement, but that which was typical and prefigurative of it. And as he arose from the grave with greater power and strength, and became instead of a meek and suffering Lamb, a powerful conqueror over death, a royal Priest over the house of God, so his atonement went on increasing in strength and virtue. [N.B.]

His atonement was so far from being a thing then done and past, when his blood was shed upon the cross, that it was shed for this very end, that he might for ever do that in the reality, which the high priest did in the type, when with the blood of the sacrifice he entered once a year into the holiest of all, to make the highest atonement for the people. [N.B.]

Thus Christ, to perform, and to continue for ever the most powerful way of atoning for us, by his own blood he entered once into the holy place—Now to appear in the presence of God for us.* Where he continueth for ever, and hath an unchangeable priesthood;† and therefore our atonement is never done and past, but is just as perpetual and unchangeable as his priesthood. For he can be no longer a priest, than while he maketh an atonement and intercession for us. And from this his unchangeable priesthood, the apostle thus argues, wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost, who come unto God by him,‡ seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for us? [* Heb. xi. 24. † vii. 24. ‡ vii. 25.] [And yet Law, according to the modern theology, is non-evangelical!]

But if he is able to save them to the uttermost, who come unto God by him, then his atonement is not something done and past, but always in being, always present, always doing, and always presenting itself every where and to every man: and if he is ever living to make intercession for us, then we have a propitiation that never ceases, that is as near to us as it was to the apostles, and will be as present to those that shall be born two thousand years after Christ, as it was to those who stood by his cross when he died. Agreeable to this, St. John saith, We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. And he is the propitiation for our sins. He does not say, we have had an advocate in this world, but that we have one with the Father, nor that Christ was our propitiation some time ago, but that he is the propitiation for our sins.

And indeed Jesus Christ is the atonement for our sins, in that same unlimited, universal and omnipresent manner, in which he is the life and light of the world. And as he is the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, and is not an actual present light to some, and a distant unpossessed light to others, only to be remembered by an act of their memory; so he is the atonement for every man that cometh into the world, and is not an actual, present atonement to some, and a distant atonement to others, only to be remembered by an act of their memory, but is Testament, according to the best of my skill. And if this be your losing me, then am I indeed lost. But do not conclude, dear Sir, too hastily, that you have lost me: it may be now dark, but it may not be always so. When the Light breaks forth, that which was before as lost, will perhaps be found, and you will know me better then, than it is yet possible for you to do. This supports my spirits and comforts me in the midst of my most severe trials, which are known to God alone. Certainly it would be much to my benefit in this world to desert a cause that is held so ignominious, and that is accompanied with a thousand difficulties besides; but I have chosen to sacrifice my all at the foot of the cross of Christ. He may do with me as he pleases. I have long since bid adieu to the world. It was put in my choice to receive here either a crown of roses, or a crown of thorns; but the grace of God directed me to take the latter. And I can say in sincerity, that he has opened my heart both to do and to suffer all his will. Therefore I must needs trust him, that he would enlighten my mind sufficiently to know the same, whom I know to be the light of my mind. That He may join us together in one firm communion in the inheritance of light and wisdom, that we may come fully to understand, what is the society of saints, and also of angels, and may embrace each other, though absent in the body, with joy and love unutterable, is the prayer that I make and shall not cease to make to my God and Father in Christ Jesus my Lord. In whom if you cannot acknowledge me to be your brother, yet at least be persuaded that in him, I am your servant to the death,

Francis Lee.

P.S.—Sir, if I have said nothing concerning the Mystics of the Roman church, it was not because I had nothing, but because I had too much; and that point is fully and (I think) solidly done by others, of which you cannot be ignorant. Dr. Stillingfleet's Fanaticism pleases me at the same rate as a good romance. And I know some that have made of it a quite different use from what he designed. Caveat lector.

Hogsdon, Oct. 25, 1701.

Worthy Sir,—There is somewhat has lately happened to me, which makes me intreat the favour of you to let me have the sight again of that Letter, written in my own hand, which accompanied my large Apologetical Letter to you, or a copy of it, as you shall please: which you may send me by the post, and I will take care to remit it to you by the same, after a few days being in my hands. So soon as your other necessary labours shall permit you to think on your friend, I shall be heartily glad to receive what you have promised me. Nevertheless, herein I would be far from laying any task on you, dear Sir, or from pressing you to hasten what you design. Only this grace I beg in the interim, that when and where occasion offer for the truth to be stated, you will not suffer an innocent person (and one that is also gone to appear before God, after his appeal to him from his most unjust judges,) to lie under the calumny even of a conjurer and a wizard: so that an atonement actually and really present to all, as he is a light actually and really present to all, and every man that cometh into the world.

Therefore this author's account of the remembrance in the sacrament, has not only those absurdities in it demonstrated above, but is also solely founded upon this grossest of all errors, that the benefits and blessings of Christ, as the Saviour of mankind, are something done and past; which is an error that no one could have fallen into, that had but a common knowledge of the first and plainest principles either of the Jewish or Christian religion. For both these religions are founded upon this great truth, and suppose it in every part, that the benefits and blessings of Christ were always in being, always doing, always present in and to every age, as well before as since the incarnation and death of Christ.

And as this author has been forced to assert, they were things absent, done and past, in order to make the sacrament to consist of an action of the memory upon those absent things; so seeing it is an undeniable truth, that they are not things absent, done and past, but are as actually present, as ever they were or ever could be, it follows accordingly to his own principles, that the remembrance spoken of in the sacrament, cannot possibly signify only an action of the memory, but must necessarily signify such faith and acknowledgment of Christ, as when we are bid to remember our Creator, or believe in God.

Further, this author proceeds thus, To say that the communion is the actual partaking of all the benefits of Christ's living and dying for us, is to put that upon one single act of obedience, which is by our blessed Lord made to depend upon the whole system of all virtues united. And again, Such a doctrine as this would, in my opinion, be not only inconsistent with the plainest declarations of the gospel, but directly contradictory and destructive to the main design of it.

What this author calls here a single act, and a single instance of obedience, is true only of his own sacrament, which consists only of a single action of the memory cast upon Christ at a certain instant of time, and to which single action, this author expressly says, that no prayer is necessary, not even necessary to attend upon it, either as going before or following after it. That in its own proper and peculiar nature, it has nothing to do with prayer or devotion of any kind, can have no perfection from it, nor be in any degree imperfect as to its nature and essence, for want of any prayer, because its essence is entirely distinct from prayer.

And therefore all prayers, thanksgivings, and devotions, are to be considered as things distinct from this sacrament, that have no relation to the peculiar nature and proper essence of it.

Hence it is plain, that we do not overcharge this author, when we say, that he places the whole nature of the sacrament in a bare single action of the memory. For if, as he says, no kind of prayer, devotion, or thanksgiving, is of the essence of this sacrament, or can be an essential part of it, then it has all its perfection within itself, as it is a bare act of the memory, and cannot, as to its own proper nature or essence, have any thing added to it by prayer, or taken from it by the want of prayer. Hence it is also undeniable, that this author's sacrament is not so much as a bare act of religion, nor can have any more religion in it, than if it was the act of a parrot. For no act can be a religious act, but so far, and in such degree, as it is an act of faith, and love, and devotion to God. But this author's sacrament will not, as it is a sacrament, allow faith, or love, or devotion to be any part of it, therefore it cannot be so much as a bare act of religion.

Nay, it may and must be said, that the right observation of this author's sacrament is directly an act of atheism. For if it is an act, that in its own nature, and according to its peculiar essence, cannot be performed according to what it is, unless it be done without faith, and love, and devotion the authority of your name may not be longer abused, as I hear it is among some at present, for countenancing such a piece of the highest barbarity, which I am sure you do in your heart most absolutely detest.

But certain I am that I need not beg that from the good Mr. Dodwell, which all justice divine and human commands.

As for other matters, let the living speak for themselves, but the dead cannot : wherefore I am the most concerned for the dead. As for my own name and reputation, I have sacrificed it at the feet of my dear Lord ; there I leave it, he may do with it what seems him good. And I thank him, I can in some sense say, that he has begun to harden my face as steel, as he did to Jeremiah, against the evil and ungrounded reports which I daily hear. The manifest absurdity of some of which, is I think, put beyond contradiction : and particularly that which Mr. Keith started, with relation to the Still Eternity, mentioned in the treatise of the "Eight Worlds." Which was distinctly stated to him in half a sheet of paper, without pronouncing for or against the revelation itself : the argument being drawn up purely according to his own principles, never yet retracted, as I know. And having expected more than a year and a half, without communicating the same to any, to receive the answer, which he was pleased to promise ; I think it somewhat hard to stand charged with patronising the most absurd blasphemy in the world, (when he himself is more guilty of it than I, or the author whom he charges,) upon a proof so exceeding frivolous. Which I am here moved to mention, because, though he seems to have dropped the plea, some of my old friends, I hear, have taken it up. What a sort of mortification this is I leave you to judge. Blessed be God for it. I submit to it as part of my daily cross, under which I am, dear Sir, yours,

Francis Lee.

Hogsdon, Nov. 22, 1701.

Worthy Sir.—With my thanks the enclosed returns to you again, the sight of which has given me some fresh considerations and excitements. Your letter which accompanied it has done the same. And after all, upon running over again the whole subject, with as great indifference and coldness of thought as I could, I cannot perceive either the necessity or usefulness of engaging into a personal dispute, while (at least) the general question remains undecided. My hypothesis concerning the spirit of prophecy, as it is grounded upon reasons, which every one may be a judge of, might possibly be discussed both with far greater ease, and advantage, than a corollary from it, which doth not only depend on those reasons, but also on singular experiences and matters of fact.

Whether an examination of these last may not be probably too voluminous, if not altogether towards God, then it is directly an act of atheism, because atheism is nothing else but a cessation of faith, love and devotion towards God. But the essence of this author's sacrament cannot be preserved, unless you keep prayer, devotion and thanksgiving out of it. Therefore to perform it rightly according to what it is, is to perform an act of atheism.

And if at the taking of the bread and wine, you should suffer faith, or love, or adoration of God, or thanksgiving, to take up your mind, you might as well have let the sacrament alone, for you have neglected all that in which its whole nature consists ; and have only been in such a state of devotion, as has nothing to do with it, nor can possibly be a part of it. And therefore, if you will perform this sacrament rightly according to this author, you must perform it atheistically, you must excite such a remembrance as excludes faith, love, devotion and thanksgiving, from being a part of it. And your remembrance is not performed, unless it be such a remembrance as these things cannot be a part of.

The devils are said to believe a God ; but why is it that their faith is no religious act, nor of any benefit to them ? It is because their faith is only a bare act of believing, just as this author's sacrament has only a bare act of remembering ; and that which is the perfection of his sacrament, is their wretchedness.

If you ask this author, why faith, and prayer, and adoration, and thanksgiving, are not of the essence, or cannot be essential parts of the sacrament : all he has to say is this, that the duty of prayer is a duty absolutely distinct from the participation of the Lord's Supper.

It may and must be granted, that prayer, humility, faith, hope, charity, &c. are absolutely distinct from each other : that humility is not prayer, nor faith in its proper idea prayer, and so of the rest. Yet notwithstanding this distinction between them, they are all of them essential to each other. Faith is of the essence of prayer, hope is of the essence of faith, and all of them are essential parts of prayer. Therefore when this author asserts that prayer is not an essential part of the communion, he is just as much in the right, and has as much truth on his side, as he who says, that humility, faith and hope are not essential to prayer, because prayer is distinct from humility, faith and hope.

What this author saith of the sacrament, that it is one single act, or one single instance of obedience, is only true of his own fiction of a sacrament, which he makes to consist in a single act of the memory : and indeed it would be highly inconsistent with the gospel, to make such a sacrament a means of obtaining the benefits of Christ. But this is not the sacrament of Christ, nor the sacrament which the church of Christ observes.

For all that relates to our salvation, either on the part of Christ, or on our own part, is plainly united in that sacrament which Christ has instituted. All that relates to our salvation on the part of Christ, is in the sacrament, because he has said, that his body and blood are there for the remission of our sins, and that his body and blood are there to be eaten and drank, as the food and life of our souls, therefore Christ as our Saviour is wholly there.

And all that relates to our salvation on our own part, is there, because we cannot come to Christ, or find him to be there, as he has said he is, unless we come to him with all those qualities and pious dispositions that correspond to him, as he is an atonement for our sins, and a principle of life to us ; therefore all that relates to our salvation, either on the part of Christ, or on our own part, is plainly united in the sacrament. And to call such a communion one single act of obedience, is just the same absurdity, as to say, that the baptism of a heathen converted to Christianity, is but one single instance of obedience. For every thing that is implied in such a conversion and baptism, whether it be on the part of Christ, or on the part of the person baptized, is implied in this communion.

endless, will perhaps deserve to be considered; as well as the effect it is likely to have. Besides, an history would be more proper for this, which, as I have materials for by me, so I am persuaded might not be a work either uncurious, or unuseful, to many even of the learned, if I shall have leisure and opportunity to set about it. If I delight not in such inquiries, it is not because I have reason to be afraid of them. And if I ascribe somewhat to secret evidences, it is not meant thereby to detract at all from the more public, or to render frustraneous the argument that an adversary may bring.

This therefore may satisfy you, if all that I have hitherto written be not enough, that I am not altogether incapable of being benefited by Reason, as some do imagine, though I may assert the operations of the Divine Spirit, and their succession, beyond what is generally held by Protestants. If I do amiss herein, correct me from Scripture, and the most primitive and catholic tradition. By these I am ready to be determined, whenever you please. And I am earnestly pressed to desire now your further consideration of that, which you, dear Sir, did begin. For your encouragement wherein, I must declare to you, that by illumination, so far as it respects reason, and at which you appear so scrupulous, I mean no more than what our English Litany means in its suffrages for the clergy; and what even St. Paul himself has given a standard of prayer for, in his famous postulation, Eph. i. 17, 18. I am, honoured Sir, your very obliged and affectionate friend,

Francis Lee.

Hogsdon, Aug. 27, 1702.

Sir,—I had an earnest desire to have waited on you, when you were last in London, but was hindered by not knowing it soon enough. I am at present reading your Discourse upon the Holy Seed: I thank you for teaching me several excellent things in it. But I am afraid, that some may draw thence consequences not very favourable to Christianity. But you can better see into the difficulties of your hypothesis, than I can pretend to, who have only a more distant view of it. And your zeal for the truth will doubtless prompt you, to see that your dogma be well guarded against a set of men, that may possibly give a different turn to your principles in relation to immortality.

I begin now to despair, that you will not let me have your thoughts upon what you drew from me with no small importunity. However, I beseech you to believe, Errare possum, hæreticus esse nolo. And that my chiefest study is to be found a living and sound member of the Catholic Church. Which I doubt not of, by the assistance of my Lord's Spirit, in which I will subscribe myself your brother and servant, though unknown to you,

Francis Lee.

After what has already been given, in illustration of Lee's genius and mystical erudition, this POSTSCRIPT will hardly be complete without the superaddition of the discourses with which he prefaced the two first volumes of Lead's work of the "Fountain of Gardens," published by him A. D. 1697. We therefore now insert them, with a further specimen of his sanctified poetic talent, (if space allow,) taken from his own printed copy in the writer's possession, corrected and improved by his own hand. These prefaces, in connection with what has been already given, will doubtless to some readers, be of much greater acceptance than the writings of the individual which he thereby introduced to the world in such highly eulogistic terms: who, herself, judging from certain passages of the work in question, (pp. 327, 8.; p. 143, etc.) and her preface to the "Theologia Mystica," would seem to have been as enamoured a woman-devotee of Pordage, in his theosophic contemplations, conceptions, and devotions, as Lee of them both.

The Fountain of Gardens is by no means an unsuitable title to this work, as with Lee's embellishments, it may be considered a kind of garden of spiritual recreations, for such as are conversant with transcendental exotics and nomenclatures; though still but a pleasure garden, and that for a few privileged savans. The letters of Bromley and Pordage at the end of the first volume, are solid and just in sentiment: and the only thing that seems to be wanting to them, is a resolution of the natural question, What is the shortest, simple, most direct road to the blessed state, therein described; an answer to which might have been profitably inserted if given in Scripture ideas and

And as the baptism of such a person contains all in it that relates to his salvation, either on the part of Christ, or on his own part, and therefore cannot without great ignorance be called a single instance or act of obedience: so it is with the sacrament, it is all that to the pious communicant, both on the part of Christ, and on his own part, that baptism is to the true converted heathen; and he is made an actual partaker of all the benefits of Christ by it, as the convert is made so by baptism; and therefore it is the same absurdity to call it a single act, or instance of obedience.

And as it would be vain and groundless to say, that it was inconsistent with the main design of the gospel, to make such baptism the actual partaking of all the benefits of Christ; so it is equally, if not more so, to say the same thing of communion; because every pious and holy disposition is to be supposed to be in a higher state, in the pious communicant, than in the pious desirer of baptism; and therefore, it cannot without much absurdity be supposed, that the Sacrament is not as beneficial to the pious communicant, as baptism is to the pious convert.

For if Christ has appointed this institution, to assure us, that he is there, both as the atonement for our sins, and a principle of life to us, and we come to it with such pious dispositions as absurdity to say, that we find him not there as our atonement, nor receive him as a principle of life to us, nor are made partakers of these benefits of him.

If we stand before this atonement without such dispositions as correspond to it; we are as absent from the sacrament of Christ, as they are that refuse to come to it; if we eat that which is before us in the sacrament, without such faith and purity as qualify us to receive the flesh and blood of Christ, we are only eating that, which might have been the bread of life to our souls.

But if we, according to the condition of our humanity, are that which these two essential parts of the sacrament require us to be, then we may and ought as firmly to believe, that we are by this sacrament made actual partakers of all the benefits of Christ, as that we are saved through Christ, and not by ourselves." [N.B.]

devoid of peculiar mystic phraseology. As to the Letter preceding them (which is by Lee,) addressed to a Physician, on Gerlach Peterson's published Letter (which had been translated by Lee,) it is evidently much below the standard of Christian experience; and as it was written only two years previous to his present Discourses, it confirms what is above supposed, concerning the author's being but a recent convert to Lead and Portage. Which circumstance will partly account for his enthusiastic eulogies of their writings, and his receiving their performances, so much of them as respects the philosophy of the Divine Wisdom, and Eternal Nature, and the unmanifested depths of the Divine Mind, as immediate revelations to them by God,* rather than as conceptions and deductions of their own peculiarly complexed minds, from Behmen's ground and declarations.

The Preface (by Lee) to the First Vol. of the "Fountain of Gardens" is as here follows:—"There having been a promise made in the Preface to the Ark of Faith, that the Diary of this Author should follow, the First Volume of the same is now accordingly published for an universal good. For the author, or the instrument rather, made use of by the Divine Wisdom, is known to be of so universal a spirit, that nothing less hereby can be designed. And howsoever what is herein delivered, as well as the manner of the delivery itself, may come to be opposed, either on this hand or on that, I think I can say, that I am more than morally assured, that the All-wise God hath hereby ends to bring about, which the most acute and utilituous eye of the greatest rationalist shall never be able to dive into: and that all will serve but to a fuller breaking out of the Truth, and the Divine Light; that true light which enlightens every one that comes into the world,

* Along with Dodwell's papers, among Lee's MSS., the writer found the following letter from Edw. Stephens to Lee, dated 8th September, 1702. Whether its contents, coupled with the repeated exhortations of Dodwell, and his numerous old sober devout friends, might not have had some influence in inducing the breaking up of the Philadelphian Society, in the year following; or whether Lee might not have begun to perceive nothing extraordinary in the times and seasons, notwithstanding the high flights, expectations, and prophecies of Mrs. Lead, and some of her associates, and so his views began to change in some degree, whereupon that result ensued,—are points that cannot now be ascertained. However, as we learn from Lee's history, and the date of his published works under the patronage or name of his dear friends Hickes and Nelson, as well as from some papers hereafter inserted, the unabateable ardour of his noble and divine soul did not leave him to sit down, in ease, or despair, but put him upon pursuits and employments adapted for more universal benefit. He was, truly, "in labours more abundant" for the edification of souls; and to promote the cultivation of the highest philosophical science, according to the most perfect discoveries, vouchsafed of God to mankind. For the pleasure of the reader, we propose to give a few more extracts from his papers; whereby, with what is above furnished, a general notion may be formed of this most estimable character, and most ingenious, learned and devout man.

The letter of Stephens to him, proceeds thus:—"Mr. Lee,—I received your letter, with the enclosed, but last night, and have hardly leisure at present to peruse them, the hand being small and not very legible; much less return any long answer, if I would: but I think it needless. It is now above a year since I took notice of what concerned me in the Transactions, and though I immediately thereupon made my remarks upon it, yet I never troubled myself farther about it. Whereby you may perceive how little I was concerned for myself in that matter. And I assure you now, you cannot be more ready to crave my pardon, than I am free to give it. For I reckon that no man can hurt me, but he more hurts himself. And the hurt, which I am principally concerned for, is what is done to a good cause; and so far as that, you are concerned for yourself to make restitution. There is one thing in these papers, wherein I must desire so much satisfaction, as to be informed of the particulars wherein I am thought to have used too great severity, to the prejudice of a good cause. For to be plain, I much suspect their sincerity, who censure it, and that it is nothing at the bottom but formality and a vain affectation, no better than that of the Ruler of the Synagogue. (Luke xiii. 14.) And, indeed, I observe so much such affectation, ostentation, and self-recommendation in what I have seen in print of your Society, as alone would make me suspect what the concurrence of other observation assures me of, that it is so far from being any true Christian spiritual society, that it is no better than a new sprout of an old sect of enthusiasts, set up under a new specious name. About three weeks since, I wrote one morning a discourse, to convince some persons how far short they were of a right understanding of the spiritual life. And when afterwards we came to our morning service, the first lesson for the day was Ezekiel xiii., when, after a reproof of the false prophets, he is commanded to prophecy against the false prophetesses, the daughters of his people, who prophecy out of their own hearts: whereupon, when we had done, I added what I think might be proper for your consideration; but I have not time at present to transcribe it. I can only tell you now, in answer to your questions, that it is not only possible, but usual, for God to permit souls, as sincere as you imagine, when they presume to follow their own imaginations out of the ordinary way of humility which he hath prescribed, to eat the fruit of their own doings, for correction of such as are corrigible, and in judgment upon the rest for example and warning to others: and admonish and advise as a friend, and in the name of God, to consider better what you do; have a care how you proceed farther in this Society; and apply yourself speedily to the proper means of recovering out of the snare of the subtle enemy. I do heartily wish you well, and should very willingly take any pains to serve you; but at present I am otherwise engaged. If you resolve to come hither, let me know the day two or three days before, lest I should unhappily be absent. Your affectionate, faithful friend, Edw. Stephens.

The following was part of Dodwell's Letter to Lee, of 27th Feb. 1700, which perhaps ought not to be omitted:—"I have now long expected your answer to my first letter upon the argument, but could never have the favour of one, though I have again importuned you by a second letter, with new evidence on the particular case of your mother in law: no not, though you promised Mr. Cherry that you would return an answer. I hear that when you have been urged to it by others, you put me off to your Theosophical Transactions: I wonder how you can do so. I have seen them, and can find so little pretence for your having answered me in them, that I do not find so much as the materials insisted on by me considered in them; my arguments are, that private spirits cannot be proved genuine, but by their dependence on those gifts of the Spirit which are so far as it is not resisted, and according to the degree of purity in the vessel for the reception and reflection of its rays.

This is an age that thinks itself to excel all that have ever went before it, in the discovery and improvement of truths: and it cannot be denied, but that of these late years, mechanical knowledge hath been brought up to a very great height, which hath had both its good and bad effects in the world. But notwithstanding all the fancied or real light, in matters either physical or theological, which the present age doth so much boast of; it may perhaps not unfitly enough be said of those that make the chiefest cry, that the veil is still before their eyes. And let these imagine what they please, and pride themselves in the penetration of their sight. They must all sooner or later be convinced, that it will be impossible, without the immediate hand of Christ, to rend away the veil, or to penetrate through it into the sanctuary of God, or of Nature; without the great High Priest, bearing the oracle of truth upon his breast, do make a way for them to enter in, and do both open their eyes and ears, that seeing they may see, and hearing they may hear, whatever is written by his finger, or spoken by his mouth. Let not the blind think they see, or the deaf believe they hear; but especially let both take heed not to be offended at those little ones (as the Jews were of old) whose eyes or ears have been opened by the word and power of JESUS.

And that there may be some such even in this day, wherein materialism and sadducism do certainly no less (if not much more) eminently, than in the first day of Christ's appearance in a low corporeal form, reign and triumph, will not seem perhaps so very strange or incredible, as to given to governors of the Church, on account of their station, for governing that whole body which is connected by the unity of the Spirit: withal that the style used by Dr. Portage and your mother in law, (which even you have not the command of, nor do I think it the least disparagement to you that you have it not), is very well accountable from other originals, distinct from that of the Divine Spirit, from pagan and Rosicrucian philosophy, from Magic, from popish Mystical Divinity, from Familism, Behmism, from the disorders of brain that have befallen persons of very contradictory and false communions, and who could have no claim to that Spirit which was given by our Saviour's baptism. In what Theosophical Transaction can you pretend to have considered these things? Yet you still go on, as I hear, to propagate the contagion in your College of St. John's. This may oblige me, if you will not favour your old friend with an answer, to challenge one, at least for the sake of the public. And you will have reason to excuse it, when you consider it as done for the sake of your own soul, as well as of the proselytes whom you may involve in the same dangers. Give me, dear Sir, the joy of subscribing myself, as I could formerly, your most heartily affectionate Brother, Henry Dodwell.—Shottisbrook, Feb 27th, 1700." Lee's address, "at Mrs. Lead's, Hogsdan (Hoxton) Square." This Letter, as will have been perceived, was embraced in Lee's replies.

But although the Philadelphian Society scheme was dissolved in 1703, Lee did not abandon his opinion of Lead's understanding of the Divine mysteries, and of her mode of obtaining the apprehension thereof, as being assuredly the right way, viz. by constant prayer, deep introversion of spirit, and silent waiting before God, (the soul being in a high degree of regeneration,) until the idea in its birth and development, arose in her mind, and so the truth became apprehended. For however plainly and clearly deep truth may be described, (as it is done in Behmen, in a manner that for simplicity and fullness may be termed miraculous,) the theosophical student can only obtain the apprehension of the sense, by the eternal innate idea of the truth rising as a vegetation in the mind, when only he first understands it. By the theosophical student, is implied one who has made some considerable progress in the divine life; for as truth is the most inward thing of all, nothing less than the immediate powers of the Spirit of God could touch the centre of the idea, and awaken it into life.—If Lead had solely meant by her 'visions and revelations' this circumstance of the apprehension of the deep points of Behmen's philosophy, (which also applies to Portage,) then the writer would fully approve of the term, though by no means of the Muggletonian fanatical parabolic garb in which she invests them: for the knowledge of a deep point of metaphysical truth, is a real revelation or mental vision. But if therein be intentionally embraced any prima facie unscriptural new doctrines, then he would reject her assumptions. And how possible is it for even a most devout woman, by reason of the present disordered imperfect state, to deceive herself, in taking her conceptions, imperceptibly combined as they are with the truth in her imagination, to be equally of one origin.

It has occurred to the writer as a strange circumstance, that so few, if any discourses upon Behmen, have ever thought whether it were not possible to assist the student in obtaining the apprehension of deep truth. In answer to the question, 'How am I to obtain a similar correct apprehension to your own?' they reply, 'I cannot give it you, neither could an angel; it must be born in you.' This appears to the writer a very unsuitable answer from a philosopher, who knows that, (whether in spiritual or material nature,) like causes produce like effects. According to which, it would follow, that the respondent ought to answer the enquirer, (supposing the point in question to be a truth;) by declaring the mode in which he arrived at the apprehension, thereby, as it were, seizing the idea in the bottom of the mind of the enquirer, and perceptibly tracing it through all intricacies and mazes, until, so to speak, it reach the surface, and so become visible, manifest, self-evident! Though, therefore, he could not give the enquirer the understanding of a deep truth, he might most materially assist him to apprehend it, and much shorten the time otherwise required for obtaining that mental perception. [Here reflect upon pp. 199, 200.] And what a pity that the whole of Behmen, if his philosophical writings are, as they are, a perfect chain of truth, the first link of which reaches to the first conceivable motion of the Unity of God, antecedent to Natural being, through all, to the end of revelation and conceitability, what a pity that all is not laid open by such as have obtained the apprehension, one of this, another of that mystery, in the manner here indicated. That is, in addition to what FREHER has done.

We will give an example of what is here supposed. And what better topic for the purpose, than Virgin Sophia, the Virgin, the Eternal Virgin, the Wisdom, the Virgin Wisdom, the Looking-glass of Wisdom, God's Wonder-Eye, etc.: what more suitable than the Virgin Wisdom, which may at first have appeared as fantastic a term and conceit to theosophists, as it does to the ordinary popular and scholastic theology. We will endeavour to describe the way, by which we were led many it may at first appear to be, when what is now here published, as well as what hath been already published of this nature through the same hand, shall come to be thoroughly examined, and scanned into, by any impartial inquirer. Yet indeed such are justly to be esteemed worthy of all commendation, that shall not from any evil propension, but purely from an holy jealousy for the honour of God, and out of a true tenderness and veneration for the sacred Scriptures, (which undoubtedly do contain his revealed will to man,) withhold giving their assent hereto; if they yet oppose not, what they may not at present comprehend. Who, if they do indeed take heed to that most sure word of prophecy, and do suspend any positive determination in this matter while they have no other but this light, as of a candle or torch shining in a dark place, are in a good disposition to receive whatever further manifestations of himself the most wise God may please to communicate: and will be then fully satisfied, when the day shall dawn, and the day star arise in their own hearts. Which it will not fail to do, according as they shall be found true to what they have already received, and believing in the promises that are therein given for their sakes, from him who is the faithful witness, and that is the same now as he was yesterday, in the days of the patriarchs, the prophets, and the apostles; and will be the same for ever, the yea and the amen.

For in all ages of the world God hath had some special friends, though perhaps hidden for the most part from the world, because they were not of it; with whom in a more familiar and intimate manner he hath chosen to converse and manifest himself. In all ages God hath been known to be the God of the prophets: and for his honour some have been confident to say, that he never did any to the idea, imperfect as was our apprehension, and the train of thought by which it became more fully evolved.

The means were as simple as that by which Behmen, through his burnished silver platter, obtained his insight into the ground of Nature, both being in a fit state or preparativeness for the 'revelation.' And some degree of preparativeness is now presumed in the auditor,—some general acquaintance with Behmen's scope and writings. And yet, to understanding minds, all that will be here said, will appear 'only what they knew already;' being found in the utmost plenitude and variety in Behmen. But we hope, to the incipient theosophist, we shall prove of service, particularly if he read this aloud to another, and weigh it well over in his walks; and antecedently therewith, carefully peruse the first to the fifty-ninth verse of Behmen's Clavis; and the fifth and eleventh chapters of the Threefold Life. The means, in the first place, which gave rise to the idea, and to the subsequent train of reflexions, were the descent and approach of the writer's dear youthful wife to him, in his study, one fine, peaceful, Sabbath morning.

Thoughts:—The Virgin Wisdom. The Bride of God. The Archetype of all Ectypes. Love: its nature is to love, that is its essence, being, life. It wants an Object: the Unity, or rather Trinity of light and love has nothing but itself: it wills to know itself: that knowing itself is the first form of itself, it is its reflexion or image, its picture and looking glass, in which it sees itself; it is the science of itself, and, so to speak, the embodiment of its riches, its beauty, its purity, its glory; it is pure Wisdom, the wisdom of the Deity, of the unformed, inconceivable, nameless, supernatural Trinity: it is a form we have said, and that form is a Virgin, of no sex, but uniting all sexes and perfections, eternally a Virgin, the image of God, above all Nature; in eternal fellowship with the Trinity. The whole unformed Spirit of the Deity is eternally manifest in form, a virgin form; an eternal Virgin, yet all things generated (SEEN) in it, without touching or affecting its virginity: for it is the universal passive mother of Nature. The archetype of the Virgin Mary, and of St. Paul's 'woman,' or wife of 'the man.' And when a man beholds his beloved wife, with understanding eyes, (and hears the music of a sweet hymn tune played, and sung, by her,) he reads therein the philosophy of God's eternal Virgin Wisdom. But what language can describe the merits, beauty, perfections of Wisdom? The body of the Triune Spirit of the Deity, body being the manifestation of spirit. The Virgin: no man nor woman as such, nor any affinity with that idea, but a divine ALL-POSSESSING ALL; and only known by creatures as a Virgin. O wonders to contemplate! Now reflect upon the following quotation from Behmen:

"Thus we say, the Holy Ghost goeth forth from the Father and the Son, but whither doth he go? Into the substantiality, with the glance of the Majesty, wherein the Deity standeth revealed. This gate is called by me in all my writings, Ternarius Sanctus: for I mean the Number Three in the Substantiality, (viz., in the angelical world,) where the Three Persons have revealed themselves.

Now, therefore, we say very right, that the Son is the Word of the Father, which the Father speaketh. But now the deep mind asketh, Whither doth he speak it? Behold! the Word is the heart, and soundeth in the essences of the Father; and the heart speaketh it in the mouth of the Father, and in the mouth, the Holy Spirit of the Father comprehendeth it, in his centre, and so goeth with it forth, from the Father and the Son, into the substantiality, where it standeth with the glance of the majesty, as a Virgin of the Wisdom of God, in Ternario Sancto.

This, which is spoken forth, is an image of the Holy Number Three, and a Virgin but without substance, yet a similitude of God. In this Virgin, the Holy Ghost openeth the Great Wonders of God the Father, which are in his hidden seals.

Moreover, the Holy Ghost manifesteth the opened seals of the Heart of God in the glance of the Majesty, which stand in the light, and are called the Seven Spirits of God.

Thus the Image of the Wisdom of God standeth in substance among the seven burning spirits, which burn in the light of God, (for they are the Divine nature:) and it hath the seven stars (of the hidden seals, which stand in the anger of the Father in his centre) in its hand: for the Heart of God is the might of the Number Three, as the Apocalypse sheweth in the first chapter.

This WISDOM of God is an eternal VIRGIN, not a woman, but the chastity and purity without blemish, and is as an image of God: She is a representation of the Number Three; which generateth nothing, but in her stand the sour wonders which the Holy Ghost discovereth, and the Word of the Father createth, through the sour matrix, viz., the Fiat: and she is the wonderful Wisdom without number; in her hath the Holy Ghost discovered the Image of Angels, as also the Image of Man, which the Verbum Fiat hath created.

She is the Great secret Mystery in the counsel of God, and goeth into the first principle, viz., into the anger of the Father; and openeth the wonders in the hidden seals or forms of Nature in great thing in the economy of his Church, or in the kingdoms of the earth in order thereto, but that he hath always before revealed his secret unto his servants the prophets; and given express man-uductions, and rules, for the effecting of every such work, as particularly in the days of Moses, of the tabernacle with all its vessels; in those of Solomon, of the temple; in those of Ezra, of the restitution of that, and of the law; and in those of the Apostles, of the foundation of the spiritual kingdom of Christ: which is now in the fulness of time about to be revealed, at his second expected coming, in the power and glory of the Father, to judge both the quick and the dead, according to everlasting righteousness and equity, and to put down all enemies under his feet; that so he may not only for a thousand years, which are to him but as one day, but for ever sit upon his holy hill of Sion, governing all worlds with a sceptre of holiness, as the LORD of LORDS, and KING of KINGS.

Wherefore the Spirit of the Lord, which hath more or less in all ages thus moved (as in a particular treatise on this subject shortly to be published is at large proved) upon the face of the meek and deep silent waters, in the souls of such as have been first made clean through the washing of the Word; will certainly not fail to move upon them in this last age, in order to a new and glorious creation of new heavens and a new earth. And the inspiration of the Almighty, which giveth man understanding, may with some reason be hoped not to have been quite exhausted in the former ages, but that he will appear even unto us, as he did appear unto them; opening variously the springs of all spiritual, and even natural knowledge: and will thereby renew also those noble the wrath, and is comprehended by nothing, for she is an image without substance or generating: the Holy Ghost hath through her discovered the Third Principle, which the word Fiat hath made corporeal, out of both the matrixes, (out of both the mothers,) of the substantiality; and he hath discovered a limit to that substance in the centre of the Seven forms, where they shall go into their ether with the corporeal substance: and yet both the matrixes shall stand in the substantiality, (before the Virgin of the Wisdom, before the Number Three,) in the eternal figure to God's glory, and his works of wonder.

Therefore consider, O ye philosophers, how God created this world in six days: for each day's work is a creation of a Spirit in ternario sancto; and the seventh day is the rest of the Sabbath of God, in the Seventh Spirit of God, wherein the Virgin of the Wisdom of God standeth; and therein is no more any working of anxiety, but the eternal perfection of rest.

For the six spirits must shed forth their operations of what is in their seals; and are not known before till they have poured forth the virtue of their vials in the principle of this world, which men and creatures bring to substance and act, as a building to God's works of wonder.

And when this shall be accomplished, then the hidden Spirits of God (under the seals) enter again into the ether, viz., into their centre: and then the time of the seventh seal, in the substantiality, in the presence of God, beginneth, and the hidden mystery of the kingdom of God is accomplished: as is mentioned in the revelation of Jesus Christ, and as we have known in ternario sancto.

This Wisdom of God (which is the Virgin of Glory and beauteous ornament, and an Image of the number Three) is (in her figure and image,) like angels, and men, and she taketh her original in the centre on the Cross, like a blossom of a branch, out of the Spirit of God.

For she is the substantiality of the Spirit, which the Spirit of God putteth on as a garment, whereby he manifesteth himself, or else his form would not be known: for she is the Spirit's corporeity, and though she is not a corporeal palpable substance, like us men, yet she is substantial and visible, but the Spirit is not substantial.

For we men can, in eternity, see no more of the Spirit of God, but only the glance of the majesty: and His glorious power we feel in us, for it is our life, and conducteth us.

But we know the Virgin in all her heavenly similitudes or images; though she giveth a body to all fruits, she is not the corporeity of the fruit, but the ornament and lustre.

The corporeity goeth forth out of the substantiality, which is not the Spirit, but an incompetency in comparison of the Spirit, in which the Number Three dwelleth; and that substantiality is the Element of God, for there is a life therein, (but without understanding,) in which the Paradise of God consisteth, for the Seven Spirits of God work therein, and it is as a growing; and herein consist the great wonders of God, according to all essences infinitely.

For every form of the essences bringeth forth its fruit, which by the wrestling of the wheel [of nature], attaineth its highest ornament and power, and yet passeth away as being overcome again, and another riseth up which hath other essences: and so it is a holy sport, a joy or fruit of angels, a fulfilling of the will of every life.

Here again we need an angel's tongue: for the mind ever asketh how and where? for when the deep is spoken of, which is without comprehension, and immeasurable, the mind always understandeth some corporeal thing.

But when I speak of the Virgin of the Wisdom of God, I mean not a thing, that is in a place; as also when I speak of the Number Three; but I mean the whole deep of the Deity, without end and number.

But every Divine creature (as are the angels and human souls) [N.B.] hath the Virgin of the Wisdom of God, as an Image in the light of life; understand in the substantiality of the Spirit, wherein is the Number Three dwelling in itself.

For we comprehend (before us) the Number Three in the Image, viz., in the Virgin of the Wisdom of God: understand, without our person, we see only the majesty of the Deity, for the creature comprehendeth not the Number Three, in the appearance to the eye; but the Spirit of that soul (which standeth in the Divine centre) seeth it, but not perfectly.

For the Spirit of a soul is out of one form of Nature, and yet can bring forth in itself all forms of nature. Seeing then there is nothing total and perfect, but only the Number Three; therefore other [things] are several, as there are various sorts of angels.

And so the essences of the centre in God, with the angelical spirits, stand all in the wonder, and God is manifested in a creaturely form, by the angelical world; for they are all out of the being of God.

We speak thus only concerning the distinction of the great wonders in God. The spirits of works, and deeds of royal power, that he did in the days of our fathers, the holy prophets and apostles, and in the old time before them, even in the beginning of the creation of God; before man had corrupted his way, or had alienated himself from the image of the everlasting light, and the unspotted mirror of the power of God. While not having cut himself off from the pure streams flowing from the glory of the Almighty, he might, as his representative, oversee, and govern all the creatures of this globe, whether in the earth, or in the water under the earth, or in the air above it by virtue of that sovereign charter committed to him, Gen. i. 28.

Which charter having been forfeited, the Divine character expunged, the seals broken, all the ensigns of royalty defaced, the virgin image deflowered, and the angelical life and might exchanged for that contemptible weak form, which we now wear, that is subject to the curse of mortality and sin—is again renewed to us, much more strongly than at first, through the pure humanity of Christ, which is exalted above all the principalities and powers in the heavenly places; the express character of the Father afresh imprinted, as in the very forehead; a new and everlasting commission established, to go forth and act in the tri-une name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which is sealed with the heart of Jesus; all the royal ensigns are redelivered, the crown of immortality, the sceptre of righteousness, and the love imperial standard of JEHOVAH; the violated image is restored, the image of the beast ground to powder, and his number perfectly erased. So that the bestial and antichristian kingdom being hereby brought to an end, a new Æra of the kingdom of Christ doth thereupon commence; first in particular souls, then in the whole family of the first-born, after Angels are not generated out of the substantiality which is without understanding, but out of the centre of the seven forms (or spirits) of the eternal nature; out of each form a throne [angel,] and out of the throne his angels (or ministers): and hence it is that a whole dominion fell with Lucifer."

And in another place Behmen thus writes: "You must understand it thus: the eternal Virgin of Wisdom stood in paradise as a figure, in which all the wonders of God were known, and was in its figure an image or form in itself but without substance like to man; and in that insubstantial form or Virgin, God created the matrix of the earth, so that here was a visible, palpable image in substance; wherein heaven, earth, stars, and elements stood in substance; and all whatsoever liveth and moveth, was in this one Image! The matrix of the earth could not overpower it, much less could the outward elements do it, because it was higher in degree than them all: it had received the never fading substantiality with the Virgin: the virgin was not brought into the image, but the matrix of the earth was brought into the Virgin-like form or image: for the Virgin is eternally uncreated and ungenerated: it is the Wisdom of God, and an image of the Deity in lernario sancto, according the Number Three, and of all the eternal Wonders of the eternal centre of nature, and is known in the majesty in the wonders of God: for it is that which bringeth forth to light the hidden things of the deep of the Deity: thus, BELOVED MAN, see WHAT you ARE!!"

Might not then the way to the apprehension of deep philosophical truth, be much shortened, by lecturing upon Behmen, somewhat after the manner above attempted to be described; and would not this be more honouring to God, than (as has been the custom hitherto, e. g.: with Pordage and Lead, and others,) for individuals to call public attention to themselves, to their idiocratical confined conceptions and deductions, as some pretended new 'revelation'; instead of all bowing to Behmen, as mathematicians do to Euclid; both of which authors stand in a corresponding relation to the Holy Scriptures. Behmen must hereafter be the Euclid's Elements of philosophy: we say hereafter, because we embrace Law and Freher, as Behmen's precursor and demonstrator, from the date of the publication of the present Treatise.—And now to return to Lee: whose indefatigable efforts and incessant schemes in the cause of truth, of religion and heavenly wisdom we have alluded to. The following two papers are transcripts from his rough MSS., the latter of which is dated 1703; the first is headed,—

"PROPOSALS for the raising a STOCK to print BOOKS of MYSTICAL DIVINITY, PHILOSOPHY, and HISTORY. In order to the advancement of the most ancient and universal religion, as professed by Christ and his apostles, and of the most curious and solid learning, throughout all the ages and parts of the world." And it proceeds thus:—

"There being at present but very little encouragement in this kingdom for all books of such a nature, they being known but to very few, and coming into the hands of fewer, and there being like to be in the beginning a great expense, because many hands will be employed (both natives and foreigners), and many books successively published, of which no suitable return can be expected for some while; it is therefore proposed,

I.—That whosoever shall contribute towards a stock for such an end, shall be repaid his money deposited, in books, as they come forth, according to the number they subscribe for. And that the performance hereof shall be secured by such trustees, as some of the principal subscribers shall agree upon.

II.—That the books shall be printed carefully, on a fine paper, and with a very good letter.

III.—That the return which is made by the sale of the books, beyond the original stock, shall be made a bank for charitable uses, and services most agreeable to the carrying on of this design; and shall be in the regulation of the said trustees.

IV.—That from the said stock there shall be printed upwards of an hundred sheets the first year; and so on till the contributors and subscribers shall be fully satisfied.

V.—That every term there shall be published one or more books, papers and stitched tracts excepted.

VI.—That the ancient Christian Mystics, Macarius, Nilus, etc., shall be set forth in the English tongue very advantageously, with proper annotations.

VII.—That the best of the Heathen Mystics shall be set forth also after the same manner: with a just parallel betwixt them and the Christian, and a demonstration of the excellency of the latter.

VIII.—That whatever can be collected of the true ancient Jewish Cabala, shall be translated, and set forth in like manner, in Latin or English, or in both.

that in the great assembly of the after-born, and so on, till the whole mass be leavened and transmuted by the ferment of the Divine Nature, passing through the glorified body of Jesus, that is able to subdue everything unto itself. This verily is that kingdom, which is so much talked of, and so little everywhere understood, but still less pressed after; which is in this book, and in that also of the Revelation of Revelations (published now ten years ago,) so essentially and fundamentally declared, as nothing higher, nothing deeper can upon this subject be ever laid down, whether in time, or in eternity. [Notwithstanding this strong assertion, the deeply experienced spiritual man of this age, and, according to the implications of this Treatise, will be much disappointed in the perusal of these writings, at finding so much deep experience buried in such a huge mass of parabolicalism and idiocratic deformity. The Kingdom here alluded to is offered with its full glories through the indications of this Treatise; and what belongs to our day is not only the experimental apprehension thereof, but the setting it forth in the simplicity, clearness, and order of Law's talent, and of the Gospel by St. Paul; which will, by the blessing of God, be duly accomplished, through the instrumentality of a Theosophic college, with its several classes and degrees of experiences, up to the highest wranglerships of Divine Science.]

And because Solomon, (whose reign was as a faint sketch or type of the glorious reign of the true Jedidiah, or beloved of the Lord,) built himself a royal palace in Lebanon, which was a fruitful and a well-watered soil, and most beautiful for its situation, where he made gardens and orchards, planting in them trees of all the variety of most excellent fruits, also cedars and fir-trees for build-

IX.—That the Christian Mystics of the middle age, and the moderns which are out of print, being such as are of an established character, shall be faithfully and correctly reprinted.

X.—That our English Mystics of the former ages as many as can be found, whether in print or in manuscript, that are of value, shall be diligently revised, and methodised in convenient portable volumes: and so as they may come at a most easy rate to the buyers, considering the great dearthness of many of them at present.

XI.—That many originals, both of some that are lately deceased, and some that are yet alive, [herein were intended to be embraced the 'works of Dr. John Pordage' and Mrs. Lead,] containing many deep and hidden discoveries, shall be published, with some account of the authors, and many curious passages relating to them, and to the opening of the Archetypal and Angelical worlds.

XII.—That the most approved writers of Mystic Theology, in Italian, French, High Dutch, and Flemish, shall be translated, revised, and methodised after the same manner, in portable volumes.

XIII.—That the same care shall be taken in printing the best and most approved books of Mystical Philosophy, according to its various kinds, for a solid promotion of natural studies, and the benefit of mankind, and of this kingdom in particular.

XIV.—That the lives of the ancient Fathers of the Desert, and modern lives, with many most curious and profitable histories, both in divinity and philosophy, shall be set forth with all impartiality and love of truth.

XV.—That every month, or two months, some account shall be given of the progress herein made, and of all that relates to the promotion of this design, in this or in other kingdoms and states; by means of a settled correspondence erected in most parts of Europe.

XVI.—That twice every year, something of the same nature be published in Latin, for the benefit of foreigners, and the maintaining and cherishing our correspondence betwixt them.

XVII.—That a beginning shall be made with a new collection of some Mystics, Catholic and Protestant, printed this year, in French, at Amsterdam, under the name of Real Divinity, with a letter on the principles and characters of the chiefest mystical and spiritual writers of the last ages. Also with a particular account of those of this nation, both printed and manuscript; [this much required, and in some measure, accomplished by Lee himself, in the preface to the second volume of Kempis, commonly ascribed to Dr. Hickes;] and a Chronological Catalogue of Christian Mystics and witnesses of the kingdom of God, down from Christ's time to this day; together with some other additions."

Lee, finding no suitable encouragement to this noble design, in the unquenchable ardour of his zeal, still went on in other ways doing good to the world, as witness the publications of his, which followed the date of these papers, already referred to throughout this Treatise. His great piety and modesty, (ever the attendant graces of a truly fine genius) would not allow him to take any glory to himself in the admiration and praise of 'man,' and hence his numerous works came before the world, either anonymously, or under the ostensible authorship or patronage of Hickes and Nelson: as already referred to. But although he would receive no honour whilst living, God does not forget his faithful servants; and here (singular enough) at the distance of near a century and a half, we are appointed to raise a monument of honour (yea, one that shall endure while time endures), to this faithful and highly favoured servant of Christ, in common with other special kindred sons of wisdom: and what is still more singular, have been imperceptibly led, without any previous connection with Lee's writings, to renew, by this second Section, and this whole Treatise, the scheme which he himself proposes in these papers, though more suited to universal benefit. May we hope, then, the time is come for its practical commencement, and also for that of the following second paper, in reference to the raising up an evangelical Theosophical College or Society for the scientific cultivation of the divine life in the soul, to its highest perfection of holiness and supersensual wisdom. [That is, so to speak, for the horticultural rearing of heavenly plants and trees, that should afford sublimated paradisaical flowers and fruits; for why should there not be a growth in divine wisdom as in every other principle of life? why should there not be a blossom and fruit to that vegetation as in any other? Why should not a Christian believer and child of God rise into the manhood-wisdom of Christ, as well as into his holiness? Why should the wisdom of Christ be considered as severed from his life and virtue? Truly the only reason now will be, the imperfect lights, and received false principles among Christians.] The Second MS. is as follows:—

"A Model of A SOCIETY for REVIVING the spirit and life of CHRISTIANITY. With proposals for promoting Catholic Peace and Charity. Humbly offered to the consideration of all sober and serious Christians.

ing; with great water-works, pools of water, and fountains; with a fair tower also looking toward Damascus; and with a vineyard of red-wine, where he entertained his Shulamite Queen, and her honourable women: therefore, is the palace, or mansion-house of the great King, the true Solomon, or prince of peace, here parabolically represented to be raised up as in a new Lebanon, whereinto the tabernacle of the eternal Wisdom, coming down from God out of heaven, with all its furniture, is brought: and the children of the Lamb's bride are figured out to grow up by the sides of this house, as the branches of a fruitful vine, or as so many several lilies from one stock, or olive-plants from one root; according to the manifold proportion and diversity of the Divine seed cast into the ground of nature, by the great seedsman. Whence the expected kingdom of the Messiah in restored nature, which is called the Kingdom of God, and the Kingdom of Heaven, is according to the Spirit's mystical dialect, compared to a vineyard, to an olive-yard; to a garden of lilies, and to a corn-field: and is expressed by the various figurations of a new Eden; of a new Canaan; of new heavens and new earth; of fountains, and trees, and plants of all sorts; of canals, aqueducts, and rivers of pleasure; of tents, palaces, and temples; of a mountain, of a rock, and of a city: of Sion, Lebanon, and the hills of spices; of new found countries descended out of the heavens, or by the creating Word in the Divine Magia made to appear, as a new Sharon, and a new Havilah, and a Beulah; of Jerusalem, of Bethel, and of the Southland of eternity; of the pleasures and grandeur of a rich, powerful, and wise prince, such as Solomon; and of all the badges of royalty, and scenes of magnificent glory, that do, as in a shadow, precede, attend, or follow the marriage and reception

It is proposed,—That a Society, or societies, be formed out of a select number of faithful friends, being persons of a true Christian spirit, experienced in the ways of God, sincere lovers of peace and truth, without respect to person or party, and specially nowise addicted to disturb government, either in Church or State, or to speak evil of dignitaries. And that the formation of such a society or societies, having no other end but the revival of the genuine and primitive spirit of decayed Christianity, and the life of its most renowned professors in the purest ages of the church, be according to the model following:—

I.—That the members of this society do, as members hereof, distinguish themselves by no other name but that of CHRISTIANS.

II.—That they unite together purely for the reviving the life and spirit of primitive Christianity, and for promoting peace and union universally.

III.—That they meet once a week (if not oftener), and chiefly on the Lord's day; if it may be, without interfering either with the public duties of the day in the churches, or with family duties at home; unless some other time for this be found more convenient.

IV.—That the number of its members exceed not that of six or seven, both for the more liberty of Christian conversation, and for several other weighty reasons.

V.—That for the preservation of unity and order, every member hereof shall have his particular lot and service ascertained to him, besides the general, according as every one is fitted by God and Nature, for this or that.

VI.—That there be a fund of piety settled herein, according to such regulations and orders as shall be unanimously agreed on by the members, for charitable and pious ends best suiting so generous and Christian an Institution.

VII.—That this society be dedicated to GOD through CHRIST, that so he may ratify and say Amen to it, by his HOLY SPIRIT. And that the feast of the dedication hereof shall be annually kept, with a recollection of the old year's proceedings before, and with proper services and offices for the occasion.

Now, for as much as it has been found expedient, after mature deliberation and experience, that no society of this nature do contain above half-a-dozen members, or seven at the most; and that not any one be admitted into it without the full consent, and hearty good will of all: therefore that any serious Christians may not be debarred the benefit of this design, it is thought proper here to annex the specimen of an agreement for the forming of such a society; that so they may consider of it, and accordingly form themselves after some such manner, into a sacred fraternity and fellowship, with those whom they may bear a nearest relation to in spiritual matters, let their number be never so small. For, but three or four united fully into a society of this kind, having a good agreement in their tempers, and a near sympathy spiritually and naturally with each other, may be capable of doing far more than three or four hundred loosely combined, who shall be for carrying on the very same end: and may expect more of the grace and blessing of God, as they are carried on with greater unanimity and concord." [The paper thus proceeds:]

"A SPECIMEN OF AN AGREEMENT for the forming of a Society, or a RELIGIOUS CONFRATERNITY, in order to revive the Spirit and Life of Christianity.

In the name of God, Amen. We [N. N. or] resolve by the grace of God, out of a sense of the degeneracy of the generality of Christians at this day, and of our infirmities and temptations which beset us on every side,

I.—To unite together into a society for reviving the spirit and life of Christianity, under the conduct of the blessed Spirit of God, as it was in the beginning: and so by means of this union to endeavour, with our hearts and souls, the mutual promoting of real holiness in ourselves, in subordination to the power and gift of God; and the encouraging and strengthening each other in the rule and practice of true primitive Christianity, freely and impartially; not respecting any particular constitution, or custom, of any one society among Christians in these latter ages. [At first thought, a singular coincidence with the habits of Wesley and the first Methodists at Oxford, when beginning to practice Law's method and spirit of devotion to God, and our neighbour,—so the first blossoms of the universal renovation of the Gospel Spirit.]

II.—To meet together once upon every Lord's day. (unless some other day shall be more convenient for the members to come together in,) and at an hour that may neither hinder the public worship, nor interfere with the more private duties of the family, and closet; in order to carry on by all proper and suitable methods so excellent an end: and therefore to cultivate, maintain and advance a spiritual friendship and Society betwixt every one and all of us, severally and jointly, by of a royal bride. But this heavenly kingdom, this marriage-supper of the King, this inauguration and coronation of the Lamb, and of his bride, to the kingdoms of the earth, and to the lost dominion and sovereignty over the whole six day's work, is not to be expected but after very great and mighty preparations; many forerunning signs of the Son of Man coming to us in his Father's glory, and the six ascending steps to the throne of the great Solomon. All which are most difficult to pass: so that few, if any, have been able in many centuries [N.B.] to hold out to the last degree, or ascension-step to this throne. But they have fallen short of the Philadelphian crown, and of the high prerogatives thereof, viz. the being made pillars, and principal supporters, in the descending temple of the most high God; the bearing the name of JEHOVAH, by an essential communication of the properties, powers, and dignities of their eternal Father, opened to such in Jesus, and by a most real, intimate, and vital penetration of that most glorious wonderful name, burning in the bush of their humanity, and putting forth itself in imperial acts and deeds; their bearing the name of the new Jerusalem-mother, that free woman which is above, and demonstrating lively its inscription, by an utter defacing of that of the mother of Babylon, and of the beast upon which she rides; and by a majestic environing brightness as of the sun, a subduing the moon, with all that is sublunary and mutable, under their feet, and a wearing upon their heads a crown of twelve stars, wherein so many royal pre-eminences and ghostly powers are contained; the bearing the names of the foundations of this city, the names of the tribes of Israel, and the names of the apostles of the Lamb; and the bearing lastly the new name of JESUS, that no man knoweth but he himself, who with his discoursing, conferring and consulting together about the ways and means proper to accomplish this our design.

III. and IV.

V.—To consider the grounds of the decay of Christian piety; and of the mighty increase of anti-christianism, Atheism and Sadducism, with the remedy that ought to be applied to put a stop to this spreading contagion. Not only to lay to heart the rents and schisms of the whole Christian world in general, and of the reformation in particular, and more specially of that part of it in these three Kingdoms; but to be in a constant readiness to do whatever we can for cementing the same, according to our several places and stations in which it shall please God at any time to set us; and for restoring the most ancient and perfect model of Christianity.

VI.—To renounce every interest in the world that may be any wise inconsistent with this present undertaking, or be an hindrance to it by entangling or warping the affections; always supposing that this be no impediment to the necessary occasions of life, on this side or that: and therefore be greatly careful of accepting any charges, or offices, that may be apt to balance the mind, against the common interest and welfare of all mankind.

VII.—To contribute toward a fund of piety, for the promised end, and for all such pious and charitable uses as the Society shall judge fit, in cases both ordinary and extraordinary, and to agree with all such necessary regulations and orders in the management of it, and all the affairs of this Society, as they shall determine among themselves."

The following is a Letter addressed to Dr. Edward Hooker, in Lee's own hand-writing, (probably a copy):—

"Peace be with you: and blessing, and mercy from the mercy-seat of the Lord Jesus Christ in heavenly places. Amen.—Sir,—Though I would not do anything in the least to discompose you in your near preparations for a blessed eternity, yet since it has pleased Divine providence to put into my hands some writings for which you have declared the highest esteem, as well as for the author thereof, your friend, with much regret for the will of the deceased being not fulfilled herein; I think myself obliged to propose to you a few questions concerning them, which none perhaps in the world but yourself, can answer me in. And, therefore, notwithstanding that I am a stranger to your person, I must take this boldness with you, for the honour of God, for the interest and propagation of truth, and for justice to the dead, to entreat your resolution hereof, so far as you are able. Which, if you please to grant me, and to allow about an hour's time for declaring your answer, distinctly and severally to what is here propounded, I trust that it shall not be accounted to you for loss: and shall heartily pray that God may bring you into the great light of his everlasting kingdom, being first thoroughly purified in the blood of the Lamb. Amen.

The Questions are these:—

I.—From what copy was Dr. Pordage's Mystica Theologia printed; I having one much larger under the Doctor's own hand?

II.—Was that general Scheme, prefixed, of his own invention, or of another's; I having also two schemes in the original MS. both which are different from the printed one?

III.—Were all the Three Courts of the angelical world ever described by the said Doctor? for I find not any description either of the second or third court, as there is of the first, in the MSS. which I have in my possession. Have you any copy of the Angelical World that can supply this defect?

IV.—Do you know whether the Doctor did ever write anything concerning the Fire-world, or the severe world, and its inhabitants?

V.—Did you ever hear him discourse concerning it? If you did, pray what might be his sense hereof?

VI.—Did he ever write anything concerning the Fireless world, or the merciful world; it being not so much as mentioned in either of the schemes, or the general introduction, which I have?

VII.—That being created, according to the order of the printed scheme, after this four-elementary world; can you inform me what he means by it?

VIII.—Was the Treatise of Eternal Nature put into the same order in which it is printed by the Doctor himself, or by his son S. Pordage, or by any other?

IX.—Did you ever read a treatise of his, concerning Christ's birth in us, and ours in him?

X.—Did you ever see another of the History and Mystery of Christ, in six parts; I having only the first: which is about the incarnation?

XI.—Do you know who it was, to whom the Doctor gave his MSS. to be reviewed, who has written severe animadversions upon them?

own finger hath written it on their vestures, and on their thighs, that so in all things they may be made like unto him their Head life, by the all-powerful working of his Spirit, with which they are sealed.

There are but few found, who have so much as an ear to hear what the Spirit saith to this church of Philadelphia, the first-fruits of the Lamb : or even but to receive the promises of the holy and true one, who is now at this instant with the key of David, opening gradually this blessed state in a few chosen names ; so that none shall ever shut it more. And he is shutting up in such the dark abyss, and wrathful depraved nature ; so that it can never be again opened. But still fewer are they, who have not only an ear to hear, but also an heart and hands to act whatever the Spirit saith : and who dare to adventure on, to the laying hold of such a weighty crown, as is that of the first-born. And even of those that do so adventure forward for this most high prize, some do stop, having attained to the first degree, others rest in the second, and others in the third, as thinking that they are already got to the sixth, and so want nothing but to be taken presently to sit with their Lord in his throne. Some are willing at the end even of the first day's work of regeneration, or spiritual creation, to enter into their Sabbath : and without having passed the works of the other five days, to sit contented with the first productions of Divine Light upon the soul. Some who have beheld one, or two, or perhaps three signs of the coming of the Son of Man, have not had patience longer to wait for all the signs : but have thence peremptorily concluded that he was come to them, and that his kingdom was in them, before a redemption has been wrought out

XII.—Have you any of his MSS. or Letters, by you ; or do you know any one that has ? Can you remember what became of the copper-plate of his effigies, etc. ?” “ Francis Lec.”

On another slip, in his hand-writing, is found the following :—

I.—The Seven Spirits of God are so many eternal Divine emanations, whereby his Essence is manifested, as well in the Archetypal as in all created worlds.

II.—Their subsistence and circumcession is in the Holy Ghost ; which is as their body, wherein they are all united as One.

III.—They are Seven and One : and their Unity is the original of all harmony in the world ; even in all worlds whatever.

IV.—This Septenary of Divine Spirit emanated from the very essence of God ; and subsisting in it, may fitly be termed the Divine Harmony.

V.—This Divine Harmony is to be known both in the Archetypal world, as before nature ; and in the ectypal world, as in nature.

VI.—In the Archetypal world it is the eternal Sabbath, or the sabbath of the Still Eternity ; wherein God takes up his rest within his own Eternal Habitation of light.

VII.—In the ectypal world, it is properly the Sabbath of Nature.”

We also present the following MS., entitled “ Short Reflections upon the first original and secondary universal matter : ”—

I.—The invisible God has brought forth out of himself, in the beginning, a visible matter that was capable to receive all ideas and forms : to which we may fitly give the name of a subtle spiritual matter, that does penetrate all other more gross matters.

II.—In this first original matter were all qualities, elements, and properties virtually comprehended, in the highest degree : for as much as God out of the same has created in the six days' creation of this our universe all globes and visible creatures ; and this indeed in such a glorious order, that the infinite wisdom of the Creator is hence clearly laid open before the reasonable creature.

III.—This original matter did fill up and occupy, before the creation of this world, the whole place from the heavenly waters above down to the centre of the earth. In which place there now is the created heaven and earth, the Almighty God having in the six days of the Creation, divided distributed, and diffused this first matter into all those globes and several creatures.

IV.—Now, like as this first matter was pure and luminous ; so were the creatures and forms that were created out of the same also, every one in their kind, luminous and perfect : but because the increase and support of the creatures must follow out of the original matter, out of which they were created, and that the same in the place of this world already was reduced into specified forms ; therefore the eternal Creator wrought out, and effected, by the co-operation of the earthly and heavenly created influences a second, in all things agreeing with the first, upon the same manner as in the present earthly defiled world, a vegetable that grows out of a grain is altogether like to the same whence it did grow forth, and as in the animal kingdom, out of the seed is again generated such a seed as that was whence the living creature came forth. And after this manner, all creatures materially are resolved into the matter whence they were produced as into their quintessence, for the bringing forth their likeness.

V.—To this second matter are also given many names, and for that we rely the most upon the Holy Scripture ; among other it is called by the patriarch Jacob the blessedness from heaven, with the blessedness out of the deep, the which otherwise is called the fatness of the earth and the dew of the heaven.

VI.—By this second matter the material creatures were maintained in their property and perfection, till the curse through the sin came into the world ; by which the will of the Man did then make partakers of the curse all other sublunary creatures and subsistences. Therefore also now this second matter is no more to be obtained pure, but mixed with filthinesses as this our sublunary globe.

VII.—But this curse consists properly herein, first of all that the Creator has transported the earth out of its situation more remote from the sun, as the true centre of the universe, so that the sun cannot with his meek and gentle fire-water-rays so directly and overflowingly enlighten the earth, and operate upon and into it, as he did before ; of which the earth's remoteness and distance are a mighty hindrance. In the next place, the earth in and for itself is, by reason of the inherent curse, no more the former subject as it was, not capable and pure as before ; so that now the sun, according to the several dispositions of the defiled subject, and earthly lump, doth produce out of it more terrestrial and intemperate fruits and nourishments, which is not done by from the lapsed nature ; or before the very head of the serpent has been bruised in them, and slain by the Virgin seed of the Wisdom of God, in the meek second Holy Principle of Light and Love : which by the inspired penmen of old, is expressed by that most soft, and yet most victorious name, JAH. Hallelu-JAH.

For the prevention, therefore, of all such miscarriages, and for the undeceiving of those who think it a light thing to be a king's son, or a king's daughter, it hath seemed good to the most wise God and Father of our Spirits to raise up, according to the necessity of this present day, an instrument by him fitted, through many fires and waters, and through all manner of temptations, both in the heights above, and in the depths beneath, and immediately instructed at Wisdom's Oracle, for so great a work, as the education of the king's children, and the leading them up step by step to their Father's throne, that they may be kings and priests upon the earth unto God, and unto the Lamb for ever ; and may from the righteous Virgin Earth spring up as plants of mighty renown in a well-watered Paradise, and as Olive branches, continually empty the golden oil out of themselves, and drop their fatness, for maintenance of a perpetual light in the Sanctuary, that was before darkened.—

This will easily be seen to be the drift of these writings, by any one that is but a little skilled in their dialect. And it is no contemptible providence of the All-seeing Eye of Eternity, that this book, after having laid so many years as in the dust, should now come to be brought forth into the Light, in such a critical juncture of time, and in this very year, which is full of great expectations fault of the sun, but only through the failing of the earth ; and this is also the reason why the earth shall be again reposed in its former place and situation before the thousand years. Read Isa. xiii. 13, where it expressly is written ; as well as Joel, ii. 10, Isa. ii. 21, Hag. ii. 6. 2^d, and Matt. xxiv. 29, although these places are not altogether so express.

VIII.—Now, this curse extends itself not over the whole creation of the six days' university, but only over the sublunary globe of this earth. Therefore the sun after the curse, as well as before, remains in and for himself a large and spacious ocean of the first original matter ; who, as the heart in the man, is placed in the centre of the whole world's university of the six days, that he might give life and strength to all creatures.

IX.—Although now the globe of the earth, because of the curse of sin upon it, is driven far back from its refreshing centre that must enliven and enlighten it, and is also become eccentric and sublunary, as we do alas ! enough feel ; so cannot the sun with his sweet and powerful beams, make the earth participate in the same manner as he did before the fall, by reason of his great remoteness, nor bring forth out of the corrupt lump pure fruits ; nevertheless he doth not cease to operate upon the earth with his remote rays, and to enlighten it as well as he can, that so the animals, vegetables, and minerals may out of them take their increase and nourishment. Accordingly as all the created armies of the stars do in like manner cast their beams on the earth by reflection of the firmament ; which firmament is a firm body, beneath the heavenly waters, that does separate the waters above the heaven from the under-firmamentary, or under-heavenly waters.

X.—All these powers together are drawn and drunk in by the earth, as water by a mushroom. As then the rays of the sun and stars do carry with them, and convey into the earth a salt, that is full of spirit, of little holes and pores (and consequently apt to receive the influences) for impregnation of the earth.

XI.—The heavenly rays, or influences, do penetrate even to the very present centre of the earth, where they are again by the central fire repelled to the surface ; that so the animals, vegetables, and minerals may obtain their nutriment." [and so forth, to § XVIII.] Thus the MS.

The next paper we propose to give, (as indicative of the high science of this individual,) is headed, "An Hundred Queries upon the Mosaic Cabala," which it would appear he had drawn up as an exercise upon the first and second chapters of Genesis, either for himself or some other deep-searching Christian philosophical student ; which are these :—

I.—Wherefore is this word Elohim used in this first chapter of Genesis, and how shall it be properly interpreted ? Because it is set in the plural number, why is it constructed with a singular ? What also is the reason that these two names, Jehovah and Elohim, are found together in the second chapter, after the accomplishing of the seventh day, and not before ?

II.—Wherefore was the earth created before the sun ? and why doth it now (with all its creatures) desire and thirst after the sun's power or virtue, notwithstanding it could at that time, as the sun was not existing, bring forth all its growths, with its seeds, which it can do now no more ?

III.—Since there was yet neither summer nor winter, nor spring time nor harvest, what is to be accounted of those queries that desire to know in what time of the year the earth was created.

IV.—Wherefore must the sun have been created, there having been such a power in the earth already, that it could bring forth all things without the sun ? Hath the sun then taken its power out of the earth ? And if so, why doth now the earth take it out of the sun ? Because this power, to beget from itself, and to fructify, did originally lie in the earth, (which must be done by the mediation of the sun,) whither is this power gone ; and how is it come from the earth to be now in the sun ?

V.—This power first having been in the earth, where was at that time the place of the earth, which doth now turn itself about the sun ? How could it turn then about the sun, when the sun was not yet created ? What was this thing which at that time the earth was longing for ? What was there then for a sun ? How is it to be understood that the sun, which is created later, hath now more power in it than the earth, which had not only the same power as the sun hath now, but hath had also more ? If the sun were a child of the earth, how hath this child deprived his mother of her life ? But if the fountain of light did spring alike through the earth, and in the place of the sun also, which light was now the greater of the twin ? What was it particularly for a light, which the earth had ? Was it visible or invisible ? Out of what fountain did it spring, because every light which may be seen by outward eyes, cometh now from the light of the sun ? Wherefore doth this light open itself no more through the earth, as it did before ?

on this hand, and on that. To which nothing is given me in particular to say, but only this word of caution to the greedy expectants and waiters for some outward visible revolution in church or state: Let such be sober in their hopes, and take good heed to themselves of their observations, or calculations: and let them not lay too great a stress upon any external deliverance how great soever, or upon the rise or fall of any earthly monarch, potentate, or state: neither let them seek for the Kingdom of Christ in their own will, nor according to certain preconceived notions and images, nor binding it down to any sect or party in the (so called) Christian world: for they shall find it nowhere but in the triumphant resignation of Jesus Christ. When, therefore, they shall be certain that they have drunk of the very same cup which he did drink, that they have passed through the straight and wrestling gate of death, that they are entirely passed from all their own, into the liberty of the Divine Will, and have broken down every image and boundary, that man, as man, hath set up; then let them know that the Kingdom of Christ is near to them, and upon its very breaking forth in much glory, majesty, and power. And when they themselves are thus got without the walls of the great city, Babylon; then, and not before, let them expect the descent of the New Jerusalem out of heaven. For most assuredly, to none but Virgin souls; to the true Nazarites, that for the hope of Israel do wait in the inward temple, day and night, with their lamp-spirits ever burning, that so they may be ready to go forth at their bridegroom's call, to meet him; to the lilies of the valley, who, though they neither reap or spin for themselves, are yet arrayed more gloriously than Solomon, in the immaculate robe of the Lord their righteousness; yea, to none but the undefiled doves, that are in him made all beautiful

VI.—What is the Haschamaim? What is the letter \aleph , and what signified the letter ψ ? Wherefore is this word compounded out of the ψ which is fire, and \aleph which signified water? In what subject or matter may the nature of the spirit of the fiery waters be known? With what covering are they now covered and hid? Where may they now be found in the mystical earth, and in the natural earth? Are they yet together in the centre or not? Are they one thing with the earth, or are they different from it? Wherefore is the firmament afterwards called by this name Haschamaim?

VII.—Wherefore is here, in the first chapter, the earth called Haaretz? when in the second, after the finishing of the seventh day, the earth is called Haadamah, whereof no mention was made in the first chapter. What is the reason thereof? Is Haadamah created with Haaretz together, or was it created before Haaretz?

VIII.—What is tohu? What is bohu? How far doth this tohu extend itself? And wherefore is this tohu not attributed to the heavens also? Were the heavens full or replenished? Did not this tohu extend itself even so far as the heavens did extend themselves? And how may it then be said the heavens were created? If now everywhere was tohu, where the earth was, where was the place of the earth?

IX.—But if the heavens were not void or tohu, where have they been before they were created visibly? Were they in the same place, whereinto they came thereafter as they became created and manifested? Did they not fill this place full wherein they had been before like as nothing? Hath not then the earth filled full also this place, wherein it before was as nothing? How far did reach this full filling, or this plenitude of the heavens and the earth, in opposition to vacuity and nothing? If the heavens are not pure before God, what is their impurity? From whence cometh that choseh?

X.—Wherefore is the creation repeated or rehearsed, Gen. ii. 4.? And wherefore is the creation of the third day repeated, Gen. ii., 4, 9?

XI.—Wherefore is there made no mention of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, in Gen. i. 11? What was for an earth out of which this tree was created? And on which day was it created?

XII.—Wherefore in Gen. i. is there no mention made of the metals, and nevertheless there is made mention of gold, Gen. ii. 11.? Wherefore is there in Gen. ii., made mention only of the third and of the sixth day? And why of the fowls, and not at all of the fishes, nor of the creeping things?

XIII.—Wherefore is it, in Gen. i. 26, said, that the man is created after the image of God, and in the second chapter, that he is created out of Haadamah; and that Nischmath Chajim is breathed into him? Wherefore in Gen. ii. 19., is set this word Haadamah, and in Gen. i. 24, this word Haaretz?

XIV.—Wherefore in Gen. ii. 19, is the creation of the beasts repeated, which was yet before in the first chapter made mention of?

XV.—Wherefore were the fishes not brought before Adam to be called by him, as the beasts of the earth and the fowls of the air?

XVI.—Wherefore is this word Jezar used concerning the man, Gen. ii. 19, and v. 7.? And why is another word, viz., Tudshe, used Gen. i. 11.

XVII.—What is this word Zela? Why, is it, in Gen. ii. 21, interpreted a rib, signifying properly a power?

XVIII.—Wherefore Gen. ii. 9, is used this word Jizmach concerning the production of trees, when Gen. i. 12, is only used this word toze?

XIX.—What is this word abhid, Gen. ii. 6? Is it well interpreted to till the ground? Wherefore is the earth here called Haadamah, and not Haaretz? And wherefore is this same word Haadamah not to be found, Gen. ii. 8?

XX.—Wherefore did the tempting tree not grow before the second creation came?

XXI.—What is this word Eden? Is it not the tempting ground, as a lust, whereby the man could become entangled?

XXII.—Wherefore came the mist not sooner than Gen. ii. 6? And what is this to say, that it went up, or that it is gone out from the Haaretz; and that it hath watered, or given to drink the whole form of the Haadamah?

XXIII.—Wherefore followeth immediately hereupon, the second creation, and the tempting tree, and the tempting earth, and Adam's being put into the garden, and the tree of life, (viz. such a power whereon Adam should hold him fast,) and the commandment?

XXIV.—For what longed or thirsted Haadamah, that it must satisfy its thirst from Haaretz? What is this ascending or going up? What is the mist? What is Shekah?

and fair, and that having washed themselves seven times in the pool of his blood, are thereby set apart, and redeemed from the earth, to be his companions,—will this beloved city come down. Of the truth of which, every one must necessarily be convinced, that doth but consider seriously the process that this author hath been led in, according as the same from these ensuing memoirs may be gathered, in order to the drawing down the powers of the heavenly worlds, and the unsealing the fountain of the Holy Ghost, and the book of the resurrection. Neither can this Jerusalem glory be discerned by any others, or after any other method than is herein laid down from the opener of that principle, let them look never so long about, crying, Lo here, in the East! or, Lo there, in the West. For this high promotion of Wisdom's children cometh neither from the East, nor from the South. But the Lord cometh from TEMAN, where the glorious Virgin principle is unlocked; whence the warm, holy, supernal South-wind doth blow upon the Gardens of Lebanon, and cause the spices to flow out; whither the patriarch Abraham always directed his travels; and where Jacob saw the ladder of heaven, and the gate thereof. The key of which gate is there presented by the hand of Divine Wisdom to all her children, to whom she crieth aloud, standing at the entry of the celestial city, and proclaimeth the joyful JUBILEE; inviting them to return now from their captivity, and presently to come forth from the tottering Babel, which is founded upon the sands, and to enter with her key into this city, which hath foundations. For this, she standeth in the top of the heavenly places, and putteth forth her voice to them at the coming in at the doors: for this she meet-

XXV.—What was this essence wherewith Haadamah was clothed, ere this mist from Haaretz did put another form upon it?

XXVI.—Wherefore had it not rained upon Haaretz, that now there must come a mist to water, or to give drink to the Haadamah? Or why is it that this mist must overwhelm or cover the same with its grossness?

XXVII.—Wherefore saith Moses only thus briefly, there went up a mist from Haaretz, and covered Haadamah? Wherefore saith he not, that Jehovah, or Elohim, commanded this mist to go up? Hath this mist generated, or brought forth itself, after all things were created? Was this mist not also within the idea of the Creator, because there is made no mention of it, neither in the first nor in the second chapter?

XXVIII.—Wherefore followeth this mist immediately after the repetition of the creation? Which is the true and proper interpretation of the fourth and fifth verses of Gen. ii.? How is Haadamah become covered by this mist? And why is it there said, The face of Haadamah was covered by it? What is this face or faces of Haadamah? From whence came this mist, and whither went it? Was Haadamah within Haaretz?

XXIX.—What was this mist, that so immediately after it the tempting tree came forth out of Haadamah? Was Haadamah not pure, before this mist came? Was Haaretz not pure? Did the tempting tree grow out of this mist?

XXX.—Wherefore maketh Moses mention immediately after this mist, of some bondage, or tilling of Haadamah; the man being before settled to be a governor or lord over all things?

XXXI.—Was there not come a twofold quality into Haadamah, after this mist was gone up from Haaretz, because there did grow a twofold fruit from the earth, in opposition against each other, viz., a tree of knowledge and lust or longing, a tree of life or power? Was the serpent also brought forth out of this mist?

XXXII.—How came the longing for this mist into Haaretz, and how came it from Haaretz into Haadamah? Why was Haaretz wanting a rain, having before brought forth all things without rain?

XXXIII.—Did Adam also mind, or settle his imagination into this mist or grossness, that there did fall a deep sleep, or an impotency and languor upon him? What is a mist? Is it not a covering of the clearness, an obscuring of the light, and often also venomous? Is it not an image of the dark world? A darkening of the sun? A cloud, and often also black and unhealthful?

XXXIV.—How should Adam have behaved himself concerning this mist, and concerning all those things in which this mist was? Should he not have retired himself to the tree of life?

XXXV.—How came it to pass, that his feeblest power, which did go out from him, did behold the same tree, wherein thus powerfully this mist of death was lying, and that he regarded and minded it? Was he not (when he consisted yet in his fulness, and when he had yet liberty to take what he would) touched or infected by this same mist, and so enfeebled, because his imagination did leave the tree of life?

XXXVI.—What was the very ground, or source of this mist? Was it not the desiring or lust? Was it necessary that Adam must be tempted by this desire, or lust, also? What was that thing which stirred up some other desire or lust in him, besides those whereto he was of God created? Wherefore could he not overcome this lust in his strife and temptation?

XXXVII.—Wherefore did not Adam eat of the tree of life in the midst of the garden, before he went to the tempting tree; being this tempting tree was forbidden unto him, and the tree of life not? Wherefore could he not come more to the tree of life, after he had eaten of the tempting tree? Was not this tree of life the Divine Power out of the Son, or the Word of the Lord, which became thereafter typified by the rod of Aaron?

XXXVIII.—Was this mist in the tree of life, and in the other trees also? Or was only the tempting tree of lust tinged and infected by it?

XXXIX.—What was this thing, which did so vehemently draw the most feeble part in Adam, viz., his imagination, that he looked backwards after the forbidden fruit of knowledge? Why abode he not with his will under God's will, yea, under the will and obedience of the Word?

XL.—Why arose his hearkening out of his looking backwards, and why further his desire out of his hearkening?

XLI.—Could he not have overturned and vanquished this looking backwards after the earthly lust and knowledge, by the power of the tree of life? And can he not do it yet now, by a strong, earnest looking forwards and towards the tree of life, viz., the true brazen serpent lifted up upon a pole, as a character of the curse? Will not the power of the tree of life willingly help him in this eth them in every path, layeth hold on them that, having tried them with her laws, they may enter in hereby, and feast at the table which she hath furnished for them. But, alas! I see, that the most even of those that have been enrolled under her discipline, will be not a little afraid to lay hold on this key of the kingdom, when it is reached out to them: and will shrink from it, beholding how large it is, and that it is made full of all solid gold; even as this very author did at its first presentment, as thinking it impossible for any ever to bear the weight of it. Besides this, there is a mercurial serpent which twineth himself about it, whose life can be destroyed no otherwise but by the royal antidote of the unicorn's horn. [See Note, pp. 183—5.]

Let not any therefore think it a light thing, or easily attainable, to bear the key of the government on their shoulders. But let them examine thoroughly the several progresses and steps of this author, in order to its attainment; that are recorded for the space of about six years, in this present volume. Of which it must be confessed that much has been lost; so that the links of Wisdom's chain may often seem to be broken. But as the greatest architect, statuary, and painter of these last ages, is said to have become so excellent, merely by his observations drawn from a most imperfect maimed statue, or bust, being the work of a most exquisite and masterly hand: so it is not at all to be despaired, but that there may be found also in this day some of rare and excellent abilities of spirit, who, notwithstanding any imperfections or maimings of this spiritual register, or any defects in its exterior habit of language or style, may by the assistance of their supreme tutor draw forth, even from the disjointed parts of this work, such an excellency of knowledge and skill strife? Is there not now set before him a greater and more fixed glory, which he may expect after that he hath held out his trials, and hath overcome?

XLII.—Must not all the angels have been proved and tried also? Wherefore did the fairest of them not keep his stand? What was the thing which he looked for?

XLIII.—How could Adam have prevented, and how may he yet now prevent, that he may not be caught or entangled by this lust and mist of the tempting source on this tempting earth, by his longing and looking for other things, except the Word of the Lord?

XLIV.—What is this other source which is shewed him by God, to be an opposition and antidote against this tempting source? Or can there be found any other way to be delivered from this strong tempting source of his lust and self-desiring, which is entered into all things, except only by a fixed denying of his own will, and laying it down under the will of God?

XLV.—What meaneth this saying, Gen. ii. 18, not good? For was it not said, Gen. i. 31, all things were very good?

XLVI.—Wherefore, in Gen. ii., is no mention made of this word, be fruitful and multiply? Being this same was said, Gen. i. 22, to the fishes and fowls; and 28, to the man also? Wherefore is this same not (v. 11) neither to the beasts, nor to the men, after their fall, till, Gen. ix., it is said again unto Noah?

XLVII.—Wherefore are the beasts not given unto Adam to be his food, Gen. i. 29., like as they are given unto Noah?

XLVIII.—How is this first chapter of Genesis to be reconciled with the other Scriptures, viz. with Job, Proverbs, Psalms, and Wisdom?

XLIX.—Wherefore is there no mention made of the meteors, but only of this mist? Gen. i. and ii.

L.—How can the waters above the firmament be the clouds, since necessarily they must have either fallen down in drops of rain or hail, by reason of the cold region of the air, and the efficacy of the moon: or at least they must have remained there congealed?

LI.—Since the earth was everywhere full of waters, had then the sun at that time no efficacy to make dry, and to draw up the waters, like as it hath now?

LII.—How could the herbs and trees then live; because now without water, all these things must presently die?

LIII.—Wherefore is there no mention of the place, towards which the river Euphrates doth flow?

LIV.—Where was Adam ere he was introduced into the garden of Eden? If this garden be the very Paradise, how could the serpent and the devil enter into it?

LV.—What is this to say, that after this word, not good, followeth immediately the creation of the beasts out of Haadamah, and that these were brought before man? Had Adam looked after the beasts? Because these followeth immediately, they are brought before him, and this word Esen Kenegdo, (a help meet over against him,) twice becomes repeated. Whence was Adam in want of a help meet? And what is this emphatical word Kenegdo, to show us? Had Adam minded the bestial lust and multiplication?

LVI.—Wherefore did Adam and Eva cover their privy parts, having sinned by their mouth?

LVII.—Was Eva already within Adam, when the commandment was given unto him?

LVIII.—What manner of form would Adam have retained, if he had not eaten of the forbidden fruit?

LIX.—How could Eva sin, the commandment being given before she was?

LX.—What is this to say, Gen. iii., They could hear the voice of God, walking in the garden, and that in the cool of the day? What is the cool or cooling? What anger was there kindled, that it must be cooled?

LXI.—How was the human nature in Adam become a whore? And how was he become great with child? And with what? Who was his midwife, to bring forth this birth? Which would have been the best for Adam, to behold the beasts, or to withdraw his eyes from them? Was this a temptation to him or not? What were these for names which Adam gave them? What signifieth this giving of names, powers, or puissances?

LXII.—What was this for an help meet, which Adam looked for? And what did cause him to look for it?

LXIII.—How many degrees hath his fall? How is he successively fallen deeper and deeper from one degree into another? And how is he now to return again?

LXIV.—Would God have had Adam be advanced unto greater glory, then why could he not in all true learning and solid wisdom; that they may be found ten times better, and more skilful, than all the magicians, and men of fame, that are in the universities throughout all Europe. For when Wisdom's key is obtained, and her book unsealed in any, according to the process here described; then may all the depths [N.B.] of philosophy, as well as of divinity, and all the hidden treasury of Wisdom, in all worthy arts and sciences, be successively broken up. And thus, as from one foot of the Rhodian Coloss, (which is to this day preserved,) every one that is but skilled in the proportions of the human body, can exactly calculate what the whole should be, and know thence how to frame one accordingly: so every one to whom God has given some good degree of understanding in the symmetry and proportions of the spiritual body, will, notwithstanding any intervening breaches, or abrupt transitions, be able hence to frame some suitable idea of the whole design and oeconomy of God, in the manifestation of his kingdom to separated and virginized souls. [N.B.]

Now the manifestation of this divine kingdom is various in several persons, and in the same person at several times. Whence this variety in the descent of the heavenly and ghostly powers, (whether in this principle, or in another,) and of the joys of the world to come, is here not unfitly symbolized out by a garden, or paradise; as it was by the king thereof, himself, in his truly gracious answer to the penitent thief. And yet more expressively is this flourishing state of the lamb's elect bride cyphered to us by a fountain of gardens, or paradises, planted with all trees of frankincense, myrrh, and aloes, and with all the chief spices; out of which the royal ointment is prepared hold out his proving? How long time was Adam proved, was it not forty days? Were the angels tried also?

LXV.—What was that drink sucked in by Haadamah, that made it lust for the mist from Haaretz? How is Haaretz become waterish, which before could be and consist without rain? How came the mist into it? How came the mist out of Haaretz into Haadamah, and so further into Adam? Why is it thereafter called Tardamah, a deep sleep, or grossness? What is dam, or blood? How came the grossness in this spirit, that now raiseth up the life in men?

LXVI.—How would it have been, if Adam had holden out his trying, as the good angels did, who are not fallen? And how will it be, if man yet now hold out his trial?

LXVII.—After how many manners may this first and second chapter be explicated?

LXVIII.—By how many vails or coverings is every word covered, all which first must be rent, or taken away, ere we can behold the true signature of it? How far is the knowledge of the Hebrew language able to help us thereto? How far doth this language reach? And when ceaseth the understanding which may be given by it unto us?

LXIX.—What difference is there between the sensual, intellectual, and magical understanding of the words? [Now, in the next ten queries, to consider GREGORY LOPEZ, and some few others, who have had the fulness of the Spirit's senses.]

LXX.—By what kind of languages, and from what sort of men, may we now, at this present age, be understood? How far reacheth our common language by its expressions, and whereto may it not reach?

LXXI.—What is that sensibility beyond all languages, whereby the fellow sensibility alone is able or sufficient, without any speech, to communicate our understanding unto another?

LXXII.—Of what use are the outward letters? How much of everything can we declare or utter by our speaking thereof?

LXXIII.—How may we reconcile all the different interpretations, or how may we bring them into one only understanding and harmony?

LXXIV.—How may we find out the very ground of contrariety in every disharmony? And how may we separate it, to bring that which is good into the harmony again?

LXXV.—What light and opening doth there arise out of the concordance of all the harmonies? Causesthere the multiplicity any hindrance, or is it profitable?

LXXVI.—What is this that causeth the disharmony, and the contrary senses in the intellectual life? How may the multiplicity of the concurring harmonies bring again into concordance that which is not concurring?

LXXVII.—How may we find inwardly, by waiting, the divine power of the harmony of all harmonies drawing nigh to us, which openeth more in one moment, than all the studies and labours ever might reach to, though they were employed for the life-time of a thousand men?

LXXVIII.—May there any other way be found, except denying every lust and desire, whereby man is to be brought into this light, and fixed in it, either in this lifetime or after it?

LXXIX.—Would it be ill done, if one should forsake all the curiosity that is in desiring after knowledge in this life? And if he should only be careful for the renewing of his heart, by passing willingly through sufferings and purifications; till the time of God's mercy might appear, which is alone able to help him after all his waiting and striving? Wherein would be the inconvenience of this?

LXXX.—Are the fig leaves able to cover the corrupt and fallen reason, and the shame of disobedience, and of the looking and longing, which is for any other thing but only for God?

LXXXI.—Could the great gifts, given unto Lucifer, preserve him in true humility, wherein only everlasting happiness doth consist?

LXXXII.—Shall not the pure spirit after death become troubled by these things, whereinto he is entered here, and become entangled therein with his lust? Shall not the soul after death, if not purified, and having not killed all its lusts and desires, experience this self-same thing, which Adam experienced in the tempting garden? Shall not the soul fall into great sufferings by reason of its unwillingness, if it hath not a fixed ground to sink down willingly into death?

LXXXIII.—What is the Cherubimical sword, which is to cut off all our own reasoning and ownhood?

LXXXIV.—How may we come again from all the things of our own into nothingness? From ownhood into universality? From the figure into power? From the separateness of the tinctures into the one element? From materiality into the divine transfiguration? From difference into for the consecration of such priestly kings, as are to reign upon the earth in the Lamb's nature, and name. Which shall make all the wild beasts of the forest to fly into dens and lurking holes, and every venomous creature to hide itself from the great Attic Jomin, in his representatives, and from the fiery stream issuing out of his mouth; by which the spirit of Antichrist, that huge Leviathan, shall be utterly destroyed.

So will the kingdom of Christ manifest itself, by a gradual, but total overthrow of that of him, who has usurped all the kingdoms of the earth; until all that which he has caused to be as a wilderness by the blast of his poisonous breath, be again renewed, and made to be as the garden of God, filled with wells of living water, and streams from the upper Lebanon: a garden giving forth all the variety of flowers and fruits of life, according to the seasons, and according to every one's essential ground, and internal soil: a garden in which there is not any mixed tree, existing from the root of the outward elements, containing good and evil, truth and falsehood, light and darkness; but all whose trees are trees of life, all whose plants are plants of righteousness, all perfectly good and true, all-beautiful and lustrous.

How various the manifestation of this Lebanon-kingdom will be, no pen can describe, no tongue can express. That is various indeed: but the manifester all the while is but one; and the essential Word of God, which is the worker of all these things, is most uniform. The manuductions, illuminations, and inspirations are very different, but still there is but one way, one light, and one spirit; one Lord, and one God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of us all; who in these unity? From our own will, or unwillingness, into the one will? From grossness into subtlety and divine corporality?

LXXXV.—How may we distinguish that which is divine in us, from that which is earthly? That which is of the human reason from that which is of the divine power? That which is natural from that which is supernatural? That which is gift, only given us by mercy, from that which is a gift, not only given unto us, but also by death and regeneration fixed and made our own, for to abide ours for evermore?

LXXXVI.—What are those gifts which are only transitory, or transmigrating, and must become tried again and again? And what are these gifts which are abiding in us for evermore, and which by the strife and in the strife, and in all trials whatever, are fixed and abiding?

LXXXVII.—Whither come or go those persons that in the temptation held not fast on the power of Jesus, but make themselves to be entangled by the same source or ground, whereby the devil, by reason of his false heart, was caught?

LXXXVIII.—May this tempting source effect anything, or be of any effort to those who are of a pure heart and integrity of conscience?

LXXXIX.—How may those, who have received the pure sap out of the tree of life, abide conquering all the venom of temptations, and remain immutable as the gold in the fire?

XC.—Is this tempting source bad to them who shall have received power from the tree of life? or must it be only subservient to their greater glory, and clearer manifestation of the Divine Lights-power which is in them?

XCI.—Could not Adam have eaten also of the tempting tree without any danger, if he had but had power first out of the tree of life? and how more glorious would he have become thereby?

XCII.—Can the tempting tree cause any hurt or annoy to the man that hath a perfect power of Jesus Christ wherewith to overcome? or must it not rather be only subservient to him for a greater glory?

XCIII.—Did not God shut up Paradise, and all the glory thereof, for this same end, that so Adam might not become tempted yet stronger, if he were to be here more glorious?

XCIV.—Was it not God's great mercy and pity, that he did set man, who was not found faithful in the least things, on a way of humility, for to learn thereby obedience, that so he might help him up and restore him; there having been otherways no possibility for it, if a higher power or station here were given unto him?

XCV.—Would not Adam's fall have been deeper than the fall of the devils, if the day were not become cooled by God's mercy, that so Adam could hear his voice?

XCVI.—Wherefore is now Adam settled in this life under lowliness, under the commandments, and under the burden and cross of Christ? Is not for this one only end all his might taken away from him, that he may not fly on high like Lucifer? And is it not then only God's mercy to give no knife to his hand whereby he would kill himself?

XCVII.—When man in his desire putteth to wrong use that might which is yet left to him, and when he stealeth the things that are God's, and abuseth them, and cometh so into perdition or undoing, to whose charge is his undoing to be laid?

XCVIII.—After what manner must we now be tried and prepared, that we may use our gifts, in all purity, to our happiness; humbling ourselves, and not attempting to fly on high by them?

XCIX.—Was not this the devil's fall, that he would be like as God? And doth not the man this same thing yet also? Hath he who is the tree of life taught us so to do? Hath he not appropriated all things to their very ground, and hath he not himself denied all things, yea, even the things which he himself had right and access to? Why should not we then hearken unto him, more than to our own lust?

C.—After what manner must we now, by continual exercising and striving, set ourselves against our nature, and all the lusts thereof, and so continue or go on, till we may get victory from the power of the tree of life, such a grace, which by God's mercy is to abide in us substantially, and which either in or after this life, is to keep us in all our trials, and to protect us and preserve us from the venom and attracting power of perdition, and which is to give us strength or power to reign over it, according to that degree by which temptation or trial will fall upon us? Which trial surely will come upon us, because all whatsoever shall abide in God eternally, must pass through trials, either in this life's time or after it. But in this life will it be the better and more easy, and after it will it be infinitely more hard and grievous.

To him that understandeth aright, and findeth in himself these queries, not only this first and last days is about to appear yet more fully to us by his Son, setting him openly upon his holy hill. Thus he who is the ABYSSAL UNITY of all beings, clotheth himself as with several names, rideth forth in several powers, weareth on his head several crowns, and glanceth from his eyes several lights. And yet there is but one crown, one power, and one name, as there is but one light ; which diffuseth itself in all the variety of colours. Which unity and variety of light is well to be heeded in the reading of this book, and of all other spiritual treatises whatever, of what rank or degree soever they be. For God sometimes appears in the darkness, and yet in that darkness there is light : again he appears in the light, and yet darkness may be mixed with this light, till the perfect day do spring from on high. Thus he appears to some at a distance, as in a great and strong wind ; to others in an earthquake : in both which forms he eminently manifested himself through some, about the beginning of the last century. Then after this, approaching still nearer, he appears to a third sort in the fire : as at this very day he powerfully doth to some, that are known to Wisdom's discipleship. And lastly he demonstrates his presence to some, as to this his chosen vessel, in a still small voice, and in a sweet, gentle, lambent flame. Sometimes God manifests himself to the eye or ear of the receptive heart, according to the several properties, operations, and influxes of this or that name, which he puts on : of this or that attribute, which he communicates ; of this or that sphere, in which the living wheels of the creatures before the throne of God do move. Thus was he manifested to the unregenerate spirit of Balaam, according to the efficacy of the name Shaddai ; who saw the vision of him in this similitude or vesture, falling into a trance : and this is the second chapter of Genesis, but also the whole Scripture, and whole nature will be opened, and he shall not want to seek anything without himself in any book or any man." Such the Queries.

We give the answer to the first of these Queries, viz. :—" This name, Elohim, is of all the Divine names alone made use of in the Cosmopœia, or Genesis of the World, by Moses, as expressing in it a sort of plurality or fecundity : and by it is to be understood, as the eastern sages declare, the glorious creator or executor, as containing in himself ideally the world to be created ; or, as God one and many, or one and all,—with regard to that divine omniform power, which is one and the same in all the manifold productions thereof. And this therefore being always expressed in the plural number, is yet constructed with a verb singular, to signify the Unity both in God and Nature, under all the multifarious effects and phenomena ; and that as all things do orderly spring up from a centre into multiplicity, by the going forth of Elohim into manifestation, so likewise all things are by him to be reduced through the variety back into an Unity. But when the heavens and the earth were perfected in the full harmony of all beings, and Elohim had on the seventh day, finished all his work, as the executor of the Incomprehensible substance or abyssal ineffible Deity, by blessing and sanctifying the day of his rest ; then was the great and venerable Name, which is beyond all expression, as peculiarly respecting the Divine essence, or essence of essences, added to that of Elohim. And thereupon mention is made of the generations both of heaven and earth, as immediately succeeding their creation. Which is well to be observed."

The answer to the second Query runs thus :—" The creation of the earth is excellently represented to us as prior to that of the sun, that we might not be ignorant that the light which is concentrated in the sun, is the very light which was before concentrated in the earth : and that there must have been a certain igneous and luminous substance in the earth, from the impregnation of the spirit of Elohim irradiating those waters wherein it lay immersed for some time ; which substance was perfectly of a solar nature. . . ."

We append, as a close to this Note, the following prayers and devotional commemorations, having regard to the author's friends Hickes and Nelson : the deep, fervent, orthodox piety, natural tone, and classical beauty of which compositions, may not be deemed unworthy of the compilers of our beautiful Church Service, any more than of the author of the " Feasts and Fasts," or of " Hickes's Devotions," or of " Hickes's Kempis," or " Nelson's Christian Exercise," &c. And thus will conclude our annotatory elucidations of the profundity and versatility of pious erudition of the highly gifted Lee :—who was, manifestly, in the generation next preceding Law, one of the great 'preparers of the way' for the renovation of the Gospel spirit, and evangelical prophet proclaimers of the latter days' glory under the full light of theosophical truth ; as described in some of its experimental diversities in the above Preface to Lead and the accompanying poems, and generally hinted at throughout the present Treatise.—The first of these papers being a commemoration of Nelson, commences and proceeds thus :—

GAM-ZO !—A Commemoration. Jan 16, R. N., of blessed memory, my familiar friend and brother. The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance. Psalms : xli. xlii. cxli. cxvi. Lessons : Wisdom, iv. 10.—to v. 17. John, v. 29, 30.

O ye spirits and souls of the righteous, bless ye the Lord. Praise him and magnify him for ever. Praise him, O my soul, with these, and magnify him for ever and ever.

O my brother * * * bless thou the Lord, praise him and magnify him for ever. Yea, magnify him, O * * * for ever and ever. Halleluiah !

Holy ! holy ! holy ! Lord God Almighty, who wast, and art, and art to come ! glory be to thee in all thy saints : and praise be given to thee by all the souls redeemed from the earth, whom thou hast called up into the courts of the heavenly sanctuary. But more especially let glory and praise be given unto thy name in and by thy servant our dear brother R. (surnamed after the flesh, N.), whom thou didst here adorn with thy grace in an eminent manner, and whom thou hast now called hence, that where his heart was, there he now also may be. Thy will, O Father, is done in him : and because his soul pleased thee, therefore didst thou remove him in peace from the evil to come, and hast glorified thy name both in his life and in his death, which is precious in thy sight, and in the sight of thy angels.

Thou gavest him unto me for a friend, and for a companion in my pilgrimage : and my soul cleaved unto him, because I found thine image in him, and rejoiced in it. Thou gavest, and thou hast taken : and blessed be thy name both in him and in me, even in thy poor servant left behind, and unworthy of the least of all thy benefits, and therefore unworthy of such a friend.

And now that thou hast taken him, O Lord ; and having loosened the bands of the vile and corruptible body, which weighed down the soul which was musing upon thee, and the joy of thy lowest sort of true divine prophecy. Then was he manifested unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of El-Shaddai: which is a much higher degree than the former; as that whereby is expressed, not only the paternal property in the absolute sovereignty of his will, but also the meek love-principle co-joined with it in a federal rite. After this he was manifested under the law, at sundry times, and in divers manners, by the most essential, and great name of the covenant, Jehovah; but still according to the variety of the vessel, and its fitness to receive the emanations thereof, either in a high or low degree. Then lastly he was made known, under the gospel, to the apostles, to the evangelists, to the prophets, and to other ranks mentioned in the apostolical epistles by the name of Jesus: which name doth unseal and open that of Jehovah; whence the miraculous powers did so abound in the early days of the church, while there was faith in this name. But still it is the same One Holy and True God that revealed himself both to the vile son of Beor, and to the most heroic father of the faithful, though not by the same name. And he is nevertheless One, and having appeared after manner, and in that name, to the prophets of old, and then speaking after another manner, and by another name to their successors the prophets, Neither would he be the less so, should he even speak to us, after another manner than he hath yet spoken either to the prophets, or to the apostles: or should he make himself known to us by a name, whereby he was not known to them. He is still the same, let the vessel be never so different, and is equally to be adored and believed, whether he takes up an honourable or dishonourable vessel, learned or ignorant, noble or plebeian; whether the instrument be a priest or Levite, Israelite or presence, hast set him at liberty, to fly with the wings of the dove to the place where thine honour resteth; I render thee most humble and hearty thanks for the riches of thy grace conferred on this thy servant, in the days of his flesh, and for all the consolations which thou hast at any time given me [or thy * * *] through his means. All love, all glory, be to thee, in whom our brotherly friendship was founded, and in whom it hath been carried on from the beginning, and never therefore is to be dissolved. Blessed be the fountain of love eternal: blessed by us for ever, world without end.

I praise thee, I bless thee, I magnify thee, for all the good which thou hast done through this thy chosen servant and instrument, and the last victory wherewith thou hast crowned him. All love, all glory be to thee!

And I admire the wisdom of thy providence, in separating him after such a peculiar manner as thou didst, in honouring him with the true honour which cometh from thee, and in richly qualifying him for that lot and post to which thou hadst ordained him.

And as I render thee adoration and praise for thy many and great benefits conveyed through this vessel of thy grace elect and precious, unto multitudes of all ranks in this kingdom, and elsewhere: so I meekly beseech thee, that all they who have received the same, or have been partakers of thy mercy thus communicated by him, may be assisted through thy Spirit, duly and rightly to honour thee for these thy gifts, and to follow the steps of thy dear Son in all virtuous and Godly living; so as he, together with us, may have joy in thee, beholding the fruits of his labours, and may perceive the increase thereof rise up even to an hundred-fold.

Now forasmuch as there is no multiplication, either in nature or grace, without a previous mortification and solution, or without the grain that is sown do first die, I acknowledge it to be thy goodness, O Lord, that thou madest him pass through the gate of mortification, melting down as it were his will, by a radical solution thereof, and quickening and resuscitating him by the light of thy presence.

Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon all faithful souls, and more particularly upon all who have been confessors amongst us for truth and righteousness, especially this our dear brother, thy servant and the delight of my soul, and let the cry both of him and of all the other souls lying under the heavenly altar with the seal of faith, together with the prayers of all the dead Israelites, from the faithful Abraham down to this day, come up before thee and be accepted; that thy long expected kingdom may come speedily, and that thy glory may dwell upon the earth, and both mercy and truth may here meet together, while justice and peace do kiss each other, according to the heavenly patterns.

And in order to this, let a double portion of that Spirit, which lately rested on the head of this thy servant, beloved and faithful, fall now upon some or other, who shall be found fit by thee to succeed him in the same ministration. And do thou prepare and qualify many others also to be herein assistant and ministring, that so his righteous soul may rejoice to see thy work go prosperously on, notwithstanding all the rage and malice of evil spirits; may exult in thee his Saviour, beholding the mighty increase of the fruits of his toil and sweat; and that charity again recovering herself, and faith being found, his peace may abound more exceedingly.

Remember, O Lord, yea, remember the days of his sorrow in the flesh, and the temptations wherewith he was tempted, and all the evils which he wrestled against, by confessing thy name, thy great and glorious name; and bearing a noble testimony in a most corrupt generation for the cause of righteousness, and for the glory of thy kingdom upon the earth. And let not the secret mourning of his soul, for the high crimes and sins of this nation, and of all the orders thereof, be forgotten of thee. But have thou regard to all the supplications and intercessions which he here poured forth in thy Spirit at any time, but more especially in his last hours, for the state of the world and the Church at this day: that so a new generation may rise up, which may declare thy glory and praise; and that thy work, O God, may be now received amongst us, and thy word go forth as in the beginning.

But for as much as the heavens are not pure in thy sight, O Lord, and the very heavenly sanctuary itself had therefore need to be purified with the sprinkling of the most holy blood of our great High Priest himself; and as the very greatest of thy saints thou canst justly charge with folly, while they lived in the mortal body; look thou upon him, even as thou hast done upon them, because his chief delight was towards thee, though he could not serve thee as he would, for the infirmity of his flesh; which was his burden.

And if it be appointed that he should rest yet for a little season, until he be perfected with his fellow-servants and brethren, yet let him be so thoroughly washed in the blood of the Lamb, as to appear in the congregation of thy saints without any spot: and let a white robe be given unto him proselyte, male or female, young or old. Some has he called from the plough, others from gathering of sycamore-trees, and others from their drag-nets; whom he has set over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out and to plant, to throw down and to build up, by the mighty power of his Spirit, according to its various operation and manifestation. It matters not what the subject is, into which the divine influences are received, and through which they pass: even though it should be an heathen, as in the case of Jethro; or a brute beast, as in that of Balaam. The gradation, nevertheless, of these influences may be computed according to the situation, and according to the proximity and remoteness of the subject which is to receive them, from the source, or centre of Divine light, and according to the several channels and ducts that they must first pass through, before they are therein received. But the all-wise God is never wanting in the preparation of such vessels as may be suitable for the reception of such degrees of his light, as he designs to communicate. And this beautiful variety is in the writings of the Old Testament, and also in those of the New most remarkable. For it is one degree of inspiration that Moses had, and another that Isaiah had, and a third that Daniel had. Neither is the inspiration of the writer of the Chronicles the same with either of these three; and yet both the one and the other are all from the true inspiring breath of God. The like may also be observed in the New Testament. But to treat of this would require a large discourse. What has been here already said, will suffice for the wise in with the candidates of the first resurrection, that in the beauty of holiness, he may wait in the courts of thy heavenly temple, till the sound of the seventh angel shall awake his dust.

In the mean time, now that he is called to rest, let his works follow him, even all the works which thy good Spirit hath wrought in him: and as with the unrighteous mammon he hath made himself many friends; both of those who went before, and of those who are left behind him, let not only the former be ministering spirits about him, to receive and entertain him in the everlasting habitations by thee prepared; but let also all the rest in their course be gathered unto him, for the continual increase of his joy, and for completing the crown, wherewith he is to be crowned in the day of retribution.

Until then, let thy right hand cover him, and let the light of thy countenance, and thy glory from betwixt the cherubims be lifted up on him; O lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon him, that with the holy patriarchs and apostles, and with all the souls of the righteous in their chambers, he may worship thee according to his heart, even according to thy heart, in all the beauties and splendours of holiness, and may praise thee among the living, who art the God not of the dead but of the living. It is the living, the living that praise thee; and I know that he liveth, because thou livest in whom his life was hidden, but which shall be manifested in that day before all the world. O that our souls might be bound together in the bundle of life eternal; and that in our lot there be no parting; that so I also with him, and with all the living who live evermore, may praise thee the living God, as I do at this time, in full unity of heart and soul, casting myself before thy footstool, and saying Holy, Holy, Holy, etc."

The next paper is thus:—"For Dr. Hickes.—Whereas our dear father and brother in God, N. N.—who departed this troublesome life in a good old age, upon the 15th. of December, in 1715, in the communion of the Catholic Church, with the sign and seal of the faith, once delivered by the apostles, in the sure and certain hope of the resurrection of the body, and of the life of the world to come, after a pilgrimage in this valley of mortality of years, and the end of the fourth week of years, wherein he was an eminent sufferer for the sake of righteousness and truth, and an encourager of others not to be ashamed of the doctrine of the cross, or of the truths of God;—according to the accustomed practice of the purest ages of the Church, did communicate in confidence his designs to some, whom he perfectly knew to be agreeing with him herein, that he might, both in the body and out of the body, have the prayers of his true Christian friends offered up in the most precious atonement of the Lamb of God, and in the unity of the one holy catholic Spirit, together with all faithful souls, whether in the flesh or out of the flesh; recommending him in faith to the great High Priest in the Heavenly tabernacle, who maketh intercession both for him, and for us, and for all that look unto him as the way, the truth, and the life."

To which is added:—"For Dr. Hickes whilst sick.—O Almighty God and most merciful Father, who art the health of thy servants, and a strong tower in the day of trouble to all that put their trust in thy name, look down now from thy heavenly sanctuary; behold, visit, and relieve thy ancient servant our spiritual superior and father under thee, at this time grieved with sickness, and afflicted with great bodily pain, whose soul is also oppressed with many heavy weights, both public and private, and whose righteous spirit is vexed day by day, with the iniquity of an ungodly and rebellious generation: incline thine ear unto him, and hear all his prayers, and deliver him mightily for thy mercy's sake. O thou that hast upheld him ever since he was born, against the raging of Satan and of the people, on every side, and hast made him valiant in the cause of righteousness, and in the defence of thy truth and honour; quicken him now at last with the abundance of thy grace, and give unto his fainting soul the wings of an eagle, that he may mount up, and his heart and mouth be filled with thy praise. Deliver him, we beseech thee, from all fear of death and of his ghostly enemy; take out the sting of death; repel all the fiery darts of the accuser; pour into his wounds the most precious balsam of life, even of thine own life; be thou his stronghold, whereunto he may in this evil day resort; let him be made strong in thy righteousness, in his infirmity, let the mightiness of thy power appear, to rid and deliver him. O cast him not away in the time of his age, neither forsake thou him now that his strength faileth him; but haste thou to help him, according to thy accustomed goodness and mercy; and put into his hands the banner of salvation, that he may not go hence till he shall have declared the great things that thou hast done for him, and shall have shewed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power and the victory of thy truth to all them that are yet for to come; and that when thou callest, he may readily and cheerfully go forth in the strength of thee his Lord and his redeemer, and being thoroughly purified by these refinings, which thou graciously sendest him here, may be without spot and blemish presented unto thee, through thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord, and his and our only Mediator and Advocate. Amen."

The following prayer is without title:—"Almighty God, Father of Mercies, and God of all Consolation, who dost after sundry manners correct those whom thou dost love, and chastise every one heart; that they may understand the voice of the Lord their bridegroom, when he shall call to them in the cool of the day, and present himself walking in the garden; that they may not seek to hide themselves from him, but may walk therein, leaning upon his breast, and refresh themselves with its flowers and fruits, that do there present themselves to be plucked.

[What the christian world does indeed want, (and which has not yet ever been supplied because there have been so few individuals who have courageously pursued christianity, so as to become true universal proficient in the science,) is a volume or two, or half a dozen volumes of high experiences, expressed in the simplicity of Gospel ideas, and with the logical definite clearness of Law. Yea, what is required, is a variety of experiences of every age and growth of the spiritual life, by a number of fundamentally educated christian students, (and this progression divided as much as the nature of things will allow, into four or five graduations, after the manner of the 'Grammar of Wisdom,') so as to place within reach of every college, school and family, a series of practical instructions for the systematic cultivation of the spiritual life, up to the highest degrees of holiness and illumination, even to the reinvestiture of the soul with the omnipotent powers of faith. Had Lead been so trained in her spiritual course, according to the principles, order, and discipline of Law's practical treatises, and under the action of Bramwell's ministration of Methodism, (that is in the orthodox scriptural method,) she would, indeed, have been a most refugent meteor in the whom thou dost receive, we beseech thee look down in pity and compassion at this time upon thy poor afflicted servant, now desiring our prayers, against whom evil angels have been permitted by thee to send a fire, and whom thy hand hath touched in all that he hath: behold now, therefore, from heaven, visit and relieve this man of sorrow, with his desolate family; yea, after the multitude of thy mercies, look upon him and them; turn again, and be gracious unto them; be favourable unto them, O be favourable unto them, good Lord; forgive them all their sins, and let not Satan approach to hurt them; comfort them with thy salvation, both outward and inward; give them faith and sure confidence in thee, that so submitting themselves wholly to thy will, this short affliction may be to their exceeding profit, and may help them forward in the right way which leadeth to life and joy everlasting, through the merits of thy most dearly beloved Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

O God, who despiseth not the sighing of such as are of a contrite heart, neither rejecteth the tears and desires of those that mourn before thee; favourably accept, we pray thee, the supplications which we now offer unto thee, for thy poor troubled and afflicted servant, whom thou hast called to pass through a most sharp and fiery trial, and hast in thy righteousness stripped of all things in this world that he might nakedly depend upon thee, with whom is the fulness of all things both in heaven and earth: hear our prayers for him in this adversity and tribulation which oppresseth him; bow down thine ear to his cry; consider his necessity; send him help from thy holy place: support and comfort his distressed family; stretch out thy right hand to succour and deliver them; and all that are sufferers together with him; carry them through all difficulties, as upon thy arms; O make thy face to shine again upon them; and so break to pieces all the designs of the destroyer, who spitteth out fire and indignation against thy servants, as they putting their trust in thy name, and bowing their wills to the wisdom of thy providence, may be hurt by no manner of evils, and being delivered out of this their trouble and anguish, and established upon a rock, may joyfully give thanks to thee, O God, in thy holy church, and glorify thee in their lives, and in their death, through the mediation of Jesus Christ, thy Son our Lord. Amen."

With the same MSS. was the following letter, which in the true order, ought perhaps to have been placed at the commencement of the present series of devotional papers. It is headed:—

"To Mr. Nelson in his last sickness. —GAM-ZO!—My dear friend, and the gift of God to me! O how doth my spirit embrace your spirit in the spirit of our Beloved! O my friend, in the highest root of friendship, my heart floweth at this time to you, as in and from the heart of our dearest Jesus: whose love therefore, constraineth me to write to you, whom he hath set his mark upon; and hath called now to the foot of his cross, and me together with you. This also is good. Thus day, my friend, I heard it sounded in the lesson, Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick. Thus, thus prayeth my soul. And oh, that I could but now hear the voice of our Jesus, sounding also this gracious answer, this sickness is not unto death. Be comforted, be comforted, dear sir: for as you have been a comforter to many under God, so much comfort remaineth for you both here and hereafter, when your warfare shall be accomplished. All then will undoubtedly be for the glory of God, what lieth so much at your heart. I was once near to the gates of death, when I cried to the Lord, and he sent his word to heal me, bringing before me in a manner extraordinary, that most sweet and powerful passage, Ps. cxviii. 18, 19, 20. May he that then spoke to me, speak in like manner to your heart! And though even the very sentence of death, should be gone out against you, according to the inferior dispensation of God in nature, yet there may still a surplussage of years be added to you for the perfecting that which is behind, and for the filling up the measure of all that good which God hath put into your heart to do. This I may be certain of, that all this is for your greater purification, and that the Son of God will be glorified in you by it, even as you desire that he should be glorified. You are now, therefore, called to make a sacrifice of all to him: and if at any time you have been too much pleased with the good that you have been made an instrument of, by grace, or with the applause that you may have received for it by men of good will, or may unwarily have taken any part of the glory thereof to yourself, and now you are to cast all at the feet of Jesus, that so he alone may have the glory. This I doubt not but you do: and whatever you thus part with, you shall receive again an hundred-fold. God knoweth what he may have further to do with you, and with us all: the clouds are at present very thick; but I no more doubt of the sun's breaking through them all, than I can, of what we saw and felt together, when I was with you last in your chariot in the park, the which I then looked upon as a faint emblem of what you might in faith expect and hope for. May the cherishing and breathful beams of that holy intellectual sun, which is your light and life, descend upon you more and more vigorously: and may you find healing thereby to your whole man, through that faith which is most powerful, and is of his operation. To whom, dear sir, I always commit you, with most affectionate sympathy of heart, resting in hope, Yours, in that friendship and service which hath no end. Francis Lee. Nov. 19, 1714. TO THE BEST OF FRIENDS." [From the MOST AFFECTIONATE OF FRIENDS?]

religious world. But being without such a solid groundwork of instruction and practical demonstration, as to the grand aim and design of the gospel, and of Behmen's revelation, her mind, like that of her "companion and fellow-labourer," Pordage, became subject to be turned as to an end, to the non-essentials of visions and revelations; the result of which is, that however profound may have been her experience, her works can only be received by enlightened christians of the present day, as a medley of unprofitable, yea, hurtful, and yet, in some points, most interesting curiosities.

With regard to the above demanded standard treatises of square minded experiences, and systematic directions, we might again enquire, why Christianity, as a positive and progressive science, should not have its formulæ of elementary rules, and exercises of acquisition, and tests of advancement, all exactly laid down, as in the case of other sciences; why indeed, should not the science and practice of Christ-like perfection, be professedly taught, as a part of education, at least to those who desire such an accomplishment? which was the object of a Theosophic College.

Now though such an institution has been proposed, it is not thereby implied that a set method of cultivating piety, even to a high degree of perfection, is not in existence. For it may be said, and said truly in a general sense, that Methodism, for instance, (to say nothing of its ministerial trainings, either ancient or modern,) is so constituted, as to present an exercise to draw forth the spiritual life in very numerous evangelical developments,—by its simple original services and preachings; by its wonderful code of experimental and seraphic hymns, with their appropriate tunes; by its prayer meetings, (after the evening services on the Lord's day, and during the week, but particularly at five and six o'clock every morning—a most efficient means to holy living, to get the soul baptized with the fire, and power, and full composure of the Spirit, thus early each morning; and then to preserve the life in full glow during the day, by watchfulness, and continual recurrence to the closet;) by its class meetings, its band meetings, and, not least, its love feasts; by its demands upon the personal activity of all its members, in some evangelical way; and by its systematically-taught pecuniary liberality to the bodies and souls of our neighbour; in fine, by its professing to make religion the business of all its members, and all other things to subserve that end. By all these particular exercises and principles, Methodism may be said to present a general system of eliciting the Christian life, in numerous practical developments; (notwithstanding scarcely one in a hundred of its modern tutors or class leaders either know or teach further than the common elements of the spiritual arithmetic, and not one in ten thousand the higher branches of the spiritual mathematics): and if any persons doubt that, we only say, let them go and try it faithfully for six months, and then give their judgment. But the object of the institution here contemplated, is, as observed, to prove Christianity in all its universality and fulness of divine life light and power, by a number of variously constituted individuals; and thence to deduce a system of rules, or rather a 'Grammar,' and 'Exercises,' for the cultivation of the divine life in the soul, to be improved upon by experience.

This appears to be the practical question for us, then, in reference to what has just been stated in the above Preface, that is, the production of a system for the universal training of the spiritual man, (whatever may be his individual character and complexion,) with the strictness and certainty of scholastic discipline, according to a standard form of piety, and high divine science, in the latter particular corresponding to the discoveries and information afforded through the indications of this Treatise.—To proceed with the continuation of the Preface.]

As for the removal of that great millstone, which is thrown in the way, That God hath ceased to reveal himself to man since the days of the apostles, and that all pretensions to the same are but illusions, and at best but the dreams and fancies of a natural enthusiasm, I am not very solicitous; as well knowing that the same God, who hath already appeared in a most wonderful manner to give his testimony to souls concerning what hath been hitherto published from the same spirit and instrument, will not be wanting now to give his seal to this, or to what hereafter may come to be published: and even in a more ample and fuller manner to vindicate his honour, than he hath been yet known to have done since the primitive days of faith. But howsoever the Wisdom of God may, with respect to these particular writings, show itself at present, this millstone must shortly be cast into the sea. Otherwise the kingdom of God, which we daily ought to pray for, can never come: and it is little better but a mockery of his name to solicit him for the calling of the Jews, and the fulness of the Gentiles, and for unity, peace, and concord to all nations;* till this beam be removed from before the eye of our spirits. For which end there hath been, some-while since a treatise writ [by yourself?] to prove not only the possibility and the expediency, but

* We insert the poem originally accompanying the above introductory preface, (that is, so much of it as may be deemed needful,) as a note, and in this place, rather than in the body of the work. It is entitled, "SOLOMON'S PORCH; or, the BEAUTIFUL GATE OF WISDOM'S TEMPLE. A POEM, INTRODUCTORY to the PHILADELPHIAN AGE."

When sinful man first left the blissful seat,
Outcast, forlorn; from all that's good or great,
From virgin-purity, and virgin-love
Banish'd, and doom'd round the curs'd earth to rove,

In bestial image vile; the fiend within Possession took, without the beast was seen.
God's temple wasted lay: his image bright
Thick veil'd in black Egyptian shades of night.
That glorious Shechinah which erst did shine
In his clear soul; the once all beauteous shrine,

The seat and mansion of th' eternal Trine;
How is it fled! its finest gold how dim!
Its stones poured out, its precious Urim
Oracular no more, all clouded lies;
Where demons now their oracles disguise.

From heights of bliss to deeper woes he fell,
Still falling, sinking still down tow'rd's the abyss of hell.

This couldst thou not behold, Almighty Love,
But in compassions dear, thy tender bowels move:

Pity and mercy move. The heavenly bride
Sophia, torn from her new lover's side,
Her bridegroom could not thus forego. Her eyes
In pearly dews distilling, as he dies
One parting glance she threw: fast hold it took,
And stop'd him sinking: caus'd him back to look

Repentant. Deeper then, the heavenly ray, Wing'd with love's fires, more piercing, makes its way:
God's light and love conjoin'd; ere long to dwell even the absolute necessity of divine revelation, both private and public, as in the ancient times, so no less in the present time, [N.B.] toward the restitution and winding up of all things; which the author of it undertakes to evince from plain and evident principles, not disputed by the very deists; and having done with them, to clear up many passages throughout the prophets, and throughout the whole New Testament, which are impossible, as he holds, to be accounted for by any other principles. But how successful such a new and surprising attempt may be, is entirely submitted to the disposal of the infinitely wise God, when he shall order it to come forth, for his honour alone, Within him, in the blest Immanuel.

Till then content in tabernacles low,
And temples made with hands, some gleams of God to show.

They travel hand in hand through every age;
In poor disguise and humble pilgrimage:
With only types of rest at every greater stage.
One glorious king, the Virgin did descry,
Enamour'd, courted, entertained her high:
She stay'd awhile; all blessings round her fly.
He would have had his deities enshrin'd
With earth's magnificence in one combin'd.
A glorious temple-structure rends the sky:
The world's amazement: little in her eye.
Departing yet, this favour high we deign,
Said she, be thine a type of our returning reign.
This house a draught in miniature shall be
Of an eternal temple rais'd by me.

This revolution finish'd, on they go,
Now downwards, back again to scenes of woe,
Through deaths still conquering death; where e'er they can

Pierce deeper; and take faster hold of man.
Till in the virgin meek she found abode
More chaste; and lodg'd in her the infant God.
Here, by the o'er-shadowings of the heavenly Dove,

She unlocks the centre of eternal Love.
Here light and love, but scattered in the earth
Till now, unite their beams, and to a birth
Proceeding, one blest human offspring crown With Godhead-power; whose kingdom's vast renown

Through infamy, anguish and death must rise;
A bleeding victor, a triumphant sacrifice.
Here a true living temple they enjoy'd;
Delighted, rested in, which though destroy'd
In outward frame, the grave could not withhold From rising glorious; brighter far, ten thousand-fold.

Hail Sion's joy, her precious corner stone,
The heavenly Salem's true foundation,
The God, the Man, the Virgin all in One!
The builders thee refus'd; but thou the head
Supreme, and we're thy happy members made:
Strictly compacted into one; the whole
One body in thee, one heart, one life, one soul.
Ere long, in th' next great revolution,
When the fair Virgin pilgrim's stage is done,
Her travails ended, and her garland won;
A temple-glory of living stones to rise;
Whose base shall fill the earth; whose head the skies.

Love yet can't triumph here, without its mate,
Till light and beauty too become incorporate.

Thus still disguis'd, to this great stage they speed,
Contented still to suffer, grieve, and bleed:
Bleed in their members dear. Through all they move

Up hill, to triumphs hasting. Now the Dove
Assistant powerful joins; in each pure soul, O'ershadowing, Christ to form. Spite of controul

From demon's malice, or fierce tyrant's hate,
God's image, light, and life, they here create:
Still spreading, tincturing deep; till all's divine;

And Christ in ev'ry feature, ev'ry line, Appearing, shall e'en here through soul and body shine.

In vain hell's obstacles and bars oppose:
Each seal the conquerors as they pass disclose.
The last now opening, when the Spirit's day
Its powers uninterrupted shall display.
See! see! the Virgin sends a previous ray.

From thy dark cell now, great BOHEMIUS,
~~and thy~~ Bohemius arise;
Tutor to sages, mad to th' worldly wise.
Wisdom's first distant phosphor, to whose sight
Internal nature's ground, all naked bright Unveils, all worlds appear, heavens spread their light.

Early, thou risest glorious: but in clouds Thick set, not sent to the vulgar, nor the learned crowds

Of reason's orb, too low: none thee descry;
None but the well-purg'd mystic eagle eye
Of some few anchorite elected magi.
Here all past sages veil and disappear.
E'en Malebranche bends beneath his weighty character;

To thee resign'd: and 'tis but just, for he Draws all from one small rivulet of thee: [of how many others shall this be said!]
Fountain of science, art, and mystery.
Where Slaggyrite, Hermes, Plato, all combine, Descartes in ev'ry page, and Boyle in ev'ry line.

And yet alone, by eminence, the Divine.
By whom advis'd, the firstling flocks small band Prepare, well trim their lamps, and ready stand.

'Midst whom for pious zeal and forward care,
Great Porridge, with thy generous file appear.
Adventurous worthies, set in th' forlorn hope
With hell's outrageous malice first to cope.
Furious the outrage storms, all methods tries,
Ev'n by false magic dark incrypt
To crush the royal infant spirit's rise.

But on they charge undaunted, strive, and pray,

Believe, watch, bleed, and travel; force a way
For entrance, and foretaste the glorious day.
As the dark breaks loose, still the light world's displayed,

By the Virgin's magic wand the cursed fiends are laid:

Pure spirit breathes: new senses open fly;
They see; and all with joint assent,

Hail, great BOHEMIUS! cry.
All's true; we bear thee record: hail to thee!
Fountain of science, art, and mystery.

At last, great Hero, throw off thy undress:
Speak, condescend familiar. Now, no less,
A cherub-seraph, tow'ring, flaming high Is sent thy veil to rend, thy Gordian knot to untie: [FREHER?]

Commander sole of all the graceful charms
That flow in language, passion, harmony,
Attempted just. In sum, second to thee.
The wondrous Taylor now revolves again
Ardent, seraphic, and with tenfold fires:
Thunder, and fire, and love compose the name,
How should it then not breathe harmonious powers,

Or want empyreal flame.

and for no other aim whatever. And unless he gives this order, and by his blessed Spirit do accompany it, let it never see the day. And whatever disagreeable to his glory, or inconsistent with his truth, may have at any time been sent abroad of such a nature, let it moulder away in perpetual obscurity, and let it not be remembered by him, when he maketh inquisition, or even known among men. But whatever is consistent with his eternal truth, and makes for his glory upon the earth in this latter day, let that break forth with mighty and irresistible power, to the confusion of all flesh.

Through whose clear style in each transparent line,
Thy rough-cut, well-set, polish'd diamonds shine;
Each page out-streaming light, and kindling love divine.

[Will some true son of heavenly wisdom and harmony, of Pope-like genius, fill up this space with the characters of Gichtel, Law, Newton, Lee, etc., or re-arrange the whole order after Behmen, according to their respective philosophical merits?]

All bars remov'd at last, heaven's dawn appears,
The Virgin blushes round the hemispheres.
Shedding celestial rosy tincture pure,
From Sharon's spicy beds; of radiant hue:
Mix'd with her own fair lilies silver dew.

The morning star, true Venus, high aspires,
Darting on ev'ry side, unblam'd and free,
Her gracious glittering, lambent, amorous fires.

Bright morning-star of God's eternal day!
For this we shout aloud, we sing, we pray
Amen, hosanna, hallelujah!

Ah, dear, divine Urania, now be kind,
Speak thou, and leave the wretched man behind.

THE GLORIOUS ERA now, now, now begins.
Now, now the great angelic trumpet sings:
And now in ev'ry blast,

Love's everlasting gospel rings.

The glad triumphant sounds
Through vales, o'er hills rebound;
Glory to the eternal King of Kings.

Glory to the eternal King of Kings:
The glorious era now, now, now begins.

O may through me the mighty trumpet sound;
And spread its fame the woods and plains,
The isles and seas around.

Let sportful echoes play,
And dancing all the way,

Swell and intune the trembling sounds anew:
All well-tun'd voices raise
To great ELCHAJAH'S praise;

Peace through all lands, dear love to man, to God his honour due.

O may through me the mighty trumpet sound,
And spread his fame the woods, and hills, and plains,

The isles and seas around.

Proclaim aloud the mighty jubilee,
That sets the sin-bound captives free:
Proclaim, proclaim the mighty jubilee.

Let all the heavenly nine
Wreath arm in arm entwined;

All in one high love-labour'd song agree:
Let muse and grace combin'd
With harmony divine,

In sweetest consent, perfect unity
Melodious voices join.

Proclaim, proclaim the mighty jubilee,
That sets all sin-bound captives free;
Proclaim, proclaim aloud the mighty jubilee.

Hail morning star of God's eternal day:
For this we shout aloud, we sing, we pray,
Amen, hosannah, hallelujah.

O bless the dawn, salute the morning star,
Thrice bless the happy womb that bare
Sophia's darling child,
Lustrous, all-charming, mild;
Bless, bless, and kiss the daughter fair,
And for the nuptial bowers prepare
Of God's eternal Bride;
Bless, bless the happy lovers by her side.

Arise, ye lovers true.

Arise, arise, ye wondrous few;
Apparitors divine; ordain'd, fore-sent,
Heaven's beauteous Virgin queen
To attend and usher in:
The mother to adore, the bride to complement:
Blest Virgin, Mother, Bride, in One:
Thrice sacred band of love, and mystic union!
Arise, arise, ye wondrous few,
Arise, ye lovers true.

Long in inglorious ease obscur'd ye lie,
Despis'd, neglected; yet neglecting, too,
Nor caring what the impious trifling world
Could either say or do.

O'erlook'd by man, yet lov'd, and favour'd high
In heaven's regard, and God's auspicious eye.
Whom neither high preferment's charm can
move,

Ambition fire, or beauty prompt to love;
And yet to love most true.

Out of the everlasting Virgin's womb,
Sons of the morn already born anew:
Born into time.

And wing'd at will to ascend the ethereal clime,
Angelic men, imbodied Seraphim.
All captives to the blest Sophia's charms;

Through wisdom's mazes bright,
Wandering in tracks of light,

By her still guided and exempt from harms:
Still kept

From mazy errors tangling step,
From paths untrue

By her fair silver-twin'd mercurial clue.

Dear captives to the bright Sophia's charms;

And yet more loudly to proclaim

Transcendent love's and beauty's fame,
Long wrap'd in the divine Urania's arms.

Wrap'd in the dear divine Urania's arms,
Plund'ring her sweets, and rifling all her charms.

Ye wond'rous few, arise,
God's heralds true; throw off your mortal guise,

Now lift your sweet, loud, speaking, trumpets high,

Now let your jocund levets fill the sky;
Tell, tell the drowsy world their God is nigh.

Now let eternal song unbounded flow
With torrent deep, serene, majestic, slow;

Disdaining art's control
Like heaven's full spangled canopy,

Most nice, and yet most free,
Rang'd by dame Nature's artful liberty.

Let ev'ry point a star, each line

In constellation shine;

Each living world a soul:

In thousand differing ways,

Varying to God new praise:

Compare throughout with original

Wherefore I do bow my knees continually before the God of my fathers; that he would give me who write, and thee who readest this, wisdom that sitteth by his throne: and reject us not from among his children, the children of his kingdom, and of his right-hand; but seal us against the great day of temptation, which is coming upon the face of the whole earth, with the spirit of truth, the Spirit of Jehovah, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and might, and of a sound judgment; which is the testimony of JESUS. That so by the inspiration of this his Holy Spirit, we being preserved against all the illusions of the false prophet, and the subtily of the

Now, now let your inspir'd seraphic strains
In mighty numbers roll.

Proclaim, proclaim the gracious jubilee:
And set the sin-bound captives free;
Proclaim, proclaim the gracious jubilee.

*O may through me the mighty trumpet sound;
And spread, etc.*

And ye fair virgin-daughters of the morn;
Sion's first blossoms; from New Salem born:
High paradisaical nymphs appear,
The Virgin queen's attendant graces dear:

Haste, haste, away,
And join your powers unanimously to proclaim
The wondrous year;
The great, the good, the now-revolving day:
Full period-circle bright, of endless fame.

*Ye paradisaical nymphs appear;
The Virgin queen's attendant graces dear:
Sion's first blossoms; from New Salem born:
Rise ye fair virgin-daughters of the morn.*

Arise and shine,
Illustrious troop of heroines divine;
Celestial Amazons; untaught to yield,
With heaven-aspiring ardours, sprightly vigour fill'd.

In this, the Virgin's day, most forward; bent,
Zealous their very heroes to prevent.
In terrible-majestic-gay parade,
Hell's fierce imbatel'd legions first t' invade:
With orient beams of light,
Scattering the misty gloom of night,
And chasing every black infernal shade.

Arise and shine,
Illustrious heroines;
Cherubic phalanx bright of Amazons divine:
Arise, arise and shine.

Yet tho' deep skilled in spirit's war-like arts,
Nature has fram'd, love arm'd ye, too too free
Far deeper wounds, to give; and nobler darts
To fix in pure and captivated hearts.
In whose high-tinctur'd forms harmonious move

The fiery quick serpentine energy,
Charm'd by the mildness of the peaceful dove,
Inviting still to love.
Contraries here agree
In strictest unity,

Each other to improve;
The fierce and powerful sting, the lofty spire
Co-mingling to exalt the amorous fire.
You, at whose presence mortal beauty must Abscond, and in confusion kiss the dust.

Beauties too flaming bright
To be endur'd by human sight;
Which but unveil'd would quench the inferior light.

The glances of whose eyes are lucid beams,
In-drawn from the all-radiant One,
Divine, Super-celestial Sun:
Where his full streams,
Pointed in central union,
Himself produce in lustrous image fair
Of his belov'd Eternal Son.
Hence darting ev'ry way
In each reflecting, subdivided ray,
The little loves entranc'd

With innocent and wanton dance,
Thousand enshrin'd celestial cupids play.

From whose coralline lip
Angels their spicy draughts of neolar sip;
Quick darting the divine love-flaming kiss,
In free enormous bliss.
In whose fair cheeks the tinctures pure combine:

The matchless diamonds sparkle paler bright;
And in their orbs of light
Enchase the glittering ruby's sanguine flame;
In radiant blush of modesty divine,
Exempt from mortal shame.

Here, re-aspiring from their humble vale
To meet the inclining vigorous scented male,
In their dewy, fruitful bed,
Their Sharon rose the virgin lilies wed.
Whom, as with strict embrace inwrap'd
They lock within their flowery lap,
A stock of graces numberless proceed;
A spring of lesser beauties breed.

The clear translucent forms all shade disdain,
Disclosing freely to be seen,
The wonder-world within;
Each argent nerve, and ev'ry azure vein:
The beauteous love-eye burning in the heart;
From whence love's centres endless multiply,
As thick-set spangles of the sky,
Raising a sting of joy in ev'ry part.

In ev'ry point a Venus bright;
Each star a world of new delight,
Opening an unexhausted spring of bliss,
Each nymph herself a paradise.
So fine, so pliant the external mould,
That e'en therein the brighter soul,
With all its graces train,
Imprints itself distinct and plain,
And as in fabled streams,
Where silver currents roll
On orient pearl, and sands of gold;
Displays her rich inestimable gems.
Which free expos'd to view
In their untarnish'd native hue,
Reflex through bodies chrySTALLINE,
In their transparent mirror shine.

But deeper yet and more amazing fair
Outshines, outflames through her
[the soul],
Express, the only Son's refulgent character.

Now, now, ye paradisaical nymphs appear;
The Virgin queen's attendant graces dear.
Arise, arise and shine,
Illustrious brigade
Of heroines divine;

In terrible-majestic-gay parade:
With orient beams of light
Scatter the misty gloom of night;
And banish every black infernal shade.

Arise and shine,
Illustrious heroines.
Cherubic phalanx, bright of Amazons divine,
Arise, arise and shine.

Haste, haste away,
And let your well-trim'd flowing tresses fair,
Waving in wanton ringlets, gild the air;
Out-beaming, sun-like, with pellucid ray:

twisting serpently spirit, for the day of his appearance ; may perfectly love him, walking with him as Enoch, or as John, in this paradisaical garden, the entrance whereto, that has been shut up, is setting open : and may worthily magnify His holy name, even as in heaven it is magnified by the high principalities and thrones, and by the harpers upon the sea of glass.

To which burning sea of LOVE these secret spicy walks will lead thee ; while the holy angels and perfected saints will accompany thee all the way, reaching out to thee such fragrant immortal flowers, and such refreshing, transforming, and transubstantiating fruits, as do spring forth from

And as they loosely move,
Fan'd by fresh odorous gales of love,
With heaven's warm, gentle-breathing zephyr's play.

Haste to proclaim
The great, the good, the now-revolving day ;
Amen, hosanna, hallelujah.

Haste to proclaim
The period-circle full ; of endless fame :
The great, the good, the now-revolving day :
For this we shout aloud, we sing, we pray,
Amen, amen ; hosanna, hallelujah.

Heroes, fall back again,
Lead up the virgin train,
And hand in hand, as love-pair'd twins advance
In sacred well-pac'd mystic dance,
Tracing on holy ground,
Circling Jehovah's altar round, Where ay love-inceance burns, goodness and grace abound,
Whence living coals out-fly,
Generate and multiply,
Seraphic ardors ev'ry way to impart
To each bright-flaming and love-melting heart.

The quick celestial fires Straight their sweet-warbling tongues inspire,
While ev'ry voice and ev'ry trumpet sings,
Glory to the returning King of Kings ;
Love's golden era now, now, now begins,
Now, now, in ev'ry breath, in ev'ry sound
The universe around,
Love's everlasting gospel rings.
Glory to the returning King of Kings ;
Love's glorious era now, now, now begins.

Fresh springing still the' inspir'd harmonious vein,
Tunes up to higher key and loftier strain ;
In more enchanting lays,
Varying new hymns of praise,
Jointly the' ascending voice and soul to raise :
E'en till they both aspire,
And join with the seraphic quire ;
And under God's bright eye
In influence serene they lie,
Dissolv'd in rapturous hallelujahs.

As that sweet little chorister that flies,
And singing mounts the skies ;
Till all his breath and song be spent,
Then down he falls, in sweeter languishment ;
So do angelic souls in sounds aspire :
They mount and sing
Upon the dove's bright wing ;
That gently fans and feeds th' ethereal fire ;
All emulous to win the steep ascent,
The mighty mountains seven ;
Those lily-deck'd, and rosy-flow'ring hills, Form'd by th' all-bounteous hand of heaven,
Its darling sons with mere delight to fill ;
Till in melodious ravishment,
Their powers, their voice, their very soul be spent :

The light
Becomes too blazing bright :
The bliss
Unsufferable is.

Then down with speed they take their humble flight,

In adoration deep : yet but retire
To' embrace more near, and be exalted higher.
Now, love's last, sweetest mystic death to try,
Rap'd in sublime extatic joys expire ;
Entranc'd and silent lie.

Thus in soft languent slumbers sweet, true sleep,

That rests in God's abyssal deep ;
The rest in visionary dreams they see ;
They taste, they feel,
What is unknown, immense, unspeakable.

~~Proclaim, proclaim, proclaim~~
Proclaim, proclaim, etc.

O, may through me, etc. [Note, p. 88. etc.]

Too long, too long the wretched world
Lies waste, in wild confusion hurl'd,
Unhing'd in ev'ry part ; each property
Struggling, disrang'd in fiercest enmity.

The whole creation groans ;
And labouring with perpetual toil,
In man's rebellion vile,
Her own hard fate hemoans.

But now shall nature's jar,
Cease her intestine war :
Now, shall the long six working days of strife,
Attain their line and to their crown arrive :

At last set free
In peaceful rest of Sabbath true,
Heaven and earth created new,
To celebrate an endless jubilee.

Concord divine now meets in ev'ry part.
And love subdues and reigns in ev'ry heart.

O'er all,
In sum or individual,
Triumphant harmony, triumphant love,
In sweetest unity,
Combin'd together move.

E'en from the zenith high
Of the clear boundless empyrean sky,
The throne of God ;
Down to earth's inmost central deep abode,
All is consent and perfect amity :

All in proportion due,
In weight and number true :
In moods and measures of the spheres,
That never enter'd mortal ears.

E'en from the zenith high,
The' all-radiant throne of God,
Down to earth's inmost, central deep abode ;
Nothing but love—but love and harmony.
Where every voice and every trumpet sings,
Glory to the eternal King of Kings,
Love's golden era, etc.

Now harmless through the sky,
Let the sweet, whisking, treble lightnings fly :
Full base from shore to shore,
Shall in deep thunders roar,
Not death, not horror now, but melody.
Now, Mighty Bard, sing out thy sonnet free,
Nor doubt it true shall be.

Come thou and join
Thy loud prophetic voice with mine.
" Ring out ye chrystal spheres,
" Now bless our human ears :
For ye have power to touch our senses so :

the very root of the Deity. Here, therefore, I would gladly leave thee. If thou art not already entered, Wisdom calls unto thee hereinto to enter, and to pass quickly the sword of the cherub; which she will assist thee to break. But if thou art entered, then here abide, and walk, till thou art brought to the shore of that sea, by this experimental traveller described, which will waft thee over to the New Jerusalem. Where, I with thee, and with all those that follow the Lamb, do long to sing, Glory to God in the highest, etc., and to publish the glad tidings of the kingdom of our God and Saviour; flying in the midst of the heavens upon the wing of the Dove-spirit, and proclaiming with a loud shout, FEAR GOD; AND GIVE GLORY TO HIM; FOR THE HOUR OF HIS JUDGMENT IS COME. Rev. xiv. 7.—TIMOTHEUS.—January 1st. 1697.—Thus the preface

"Now shall your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And the deep base of heaven's great orb shall blow.

*From the bright zenith high
Of the clear, boundless empyrean sky;
From the all-radiant throne of God,
Down to earth's inmost central deep abode,
Nothing but pure consent and unity:
All in proportion due,
In weight and number true,
All universal love and harmony.*

This globe terrene no longer turn'd askance,
Hitch'd in her poles shall now direct advance,
And through the liquid ether dance,
And on her axle spin,
In an harmonious round,
Breathing substantial, dense, embodied sound.
Then shall surcease the ungrateful din
Of jarring spheres and clashing orbs around;
While this wonder-machine,
Engine of harmony divine,
Shall through the echoing welkin play;
And everywhere
Its melting air,
In clear triumphant sounds convey;
Into each obvious rolling sphere
Mingling her ringing atmosphere.
Which as it springs
Still more transparent, bright, and sounding clear,

At first divides in lesser rings,
Compacted close, in voice acute and shrill,
More to the surface near.
Then wider waves indented, till
The circles swell, the sounds begin to fill.
Still wid'n'ing more and more;
Till with deep gamut roar
In full-mouth'd peals orb within orb resound.

Here in epitome
Shall the vast heavenly spheres collected be;
And down through them transmit their harmony.
Each sphere, each star shall now dispense,
With passage free in direct line;
And full aspect benign,
Its various powers and proper influence.
Which in her hollow womb,
This globe shall deep entomb;
Where, from her central working urn
They shall arise, and into body turn:
And shoot from centre to circumference.
Her caverns dark, must now enlightened be,
Unfetter'd, free;
As one transparent, vast, self-moving wheel
Of liquid crystal; open to reveal
Her rich innumerable stores,
Her various wonders great, and her own acting powers.
These upward move, and on the surface play,
Adorn'd allauteous, bright, amazing, gay:
And there,
Themselves in radiant flowers, fruits, metals,
gems, display:

All living, breathing, sounding free
Into the all-uniting element,
The one capacious air;
Blowing from ev'ry pipe a different harmony,
Still from the lower circlets upward sent.
"Thus every grateful note to heaven repays
"The melody it lent.

Thus from earth's inmost central-deep abode,
E'en to the zenith high
Of the clear, boundless, empyrean sky,
To the all-radiant throne of God;
All is consent and perfect unity;
All in proportion due,
In weight and number true:
In ev'ry motion, ev'ry sound
The universe around,
All is triumphant love and harmony;
Through all the heavenly Dove
Breathes her eternal Love;
Collecting ev'ry various tone,
All acts, all powers, all hearts in one,
Center'd in beatific union.

Proclaim, proclaim the mighty jubilee,
That sets each world of captives free.
Proclaim, proclaim the mighty jubilee.
Let all the heavenly nine
Wreath arm in arm entwined;
All in one high love-labour'd song agree:
Let muse and grace combin'd
With harmony divine,
In sweetest consent, perfect unity
Melodious voices join.
Proclaim, proclaim the mighty jubilee,
That sets each world of captives free;
Proclaim, proclaim aloud the mighty jubilee.

O may through me the awakening trumpet sound,
And spread its fame the woods, and isles, and seas,

And heaven and earth around.
Let sportful echoes play,
And dancing all the way,
Swell and intune the trembling sounds anew:
All well-tuned voices raise
To great ELCHAJAH'S praise,
Peace to all worlds, dear love to man, to God his honour due.
O may through me the mighty trumpet sound;
And spread its fame the woods, and isles, and
seas,

And heaven and earth around.
While ev'ry voice and ev'ry trumpet sings,
THE GLORIOUS ERA now, now, now begins.
Now, now the angelic trump his message brings:
And now in ev'ry blast,
Love's everlasting gospel rings.
The glad triumphant sounds
Through spheres and worlds rebound,
Glory to the returning King of Kings.
Glory to the returning King of Kings:
The glorious era now, now, now begins.
For this we shout aloud, we sing, we pray,
Amen, Hosannah, HALLELUJAH.

The poem here takes a fresh wing and direction; but we have not room for further sublimities and annunciations of this soaring evangelical prophet of the latter days' glory.

to the first volume of the "Fountain of Gardens:" which, on further consideration, we find will suffice for our present purpose, without the insertion of the preface* to the second volume.—With respect to the most interesting subject, alluded to by Lee, p. 213, and by Law, at the head of p. 94, of the distinction between God in nature and God above nature; or in other words, concerning Nature (our universal mother) in her eternal birth, and standing relation to the super-natural Divine Being, it will be found to be embraced under the next following head and selection of extracts.

FREHER.

Having, doubtless, excited in the mind of the reader a just curiosity to see something of what Freher has written,—of whose discourses Law, as observed, had the full benefit, which therefore will require to be perused by the candidate, to enable him to apprehend the elementary formation of Law's mind, in its theosophic development; and as the present section is to be regarded as indicative of the highest philosophical, mystical, and theological science extant in this country, at the commencement of the last century; we propose to devote the remaining portion of this POSTSCRIPT, to a few illustrations of the genius and talent of Freher.

We have already incidentally described the character of Freher's works. It will therefore be merely needful to repeat, in this place, that they contain a systematic exhibition and demonstration of the truths and principles of Behmen's philosophy; the author, as he proceeds, inviting or anticipating objections to particular points of his subject, either as not clearly apprehensible to the honest enquirer, or seemingly inconsistent with received orthodox truth, or with other portions of Behmen's writings; which he fails not to clear up before continuing his discourses, having only at heart the interests of truth, and the setting it forth in its full natural light.

It will be out of question, by any extracts which could here be inserted, to afford an adequate conception of the universality and profundity of Freher's philosophical science: the only object that can be attempted, will be to present a few glimpses thereof; and this, also, in the hope of inducing a demand for the publication of his entire works, according to the advertisement to be annexed to this treatise. For an example, therefore, or illustration of the merits of Freher's writings, as most appropriate for insertion on the present occasion, we have, amid the difficulty of selection, fixed upon two or three of the above-mentioned Discourses, in answer to the above-mentioned offered or supposed entertainable objections, and as containing a summary of his preceding elucidations of the subjects in question.

The first of these extracts, which treats briefly "Of GOD considered without NATURE or CREATURE," may be considered as a kind of introduction to the rest, and is as follows:—

I.—It is a deep-grounded central axiom of immovable and unquestionable truth, firm and solid throughout all principles, and most worthy of being exactly pondered, as in the very beginning of all these writings, so also chiefly in the beginning of this first head thereof, that no eye can see beyond its own sphere, or world, wherein it is born, or wherein it doth exist, and hath its only essence, and all its seeing faculty. THREE PRINC. ii. 1—4, etc.; vii. 1, 2, etc. BAPTISM, i. 14. SIGN. RER. iii. 6, 7, 8. EPISTLES, v. 2, 3, etc.; xxxii. 3—8.

II.—According, then, to this fundamental position, it is an absolute impossibility for all created intellectual eyes to look essentially into that Abyss which is beyond eternal nature; or to apprehend distinctly, and to declare positively, in an affirmative way, what God is without all nature and creature. Truly, if we would say, that either men or angels were able to do it, our saying would bear the self-same absurd and contradicting nonsense, as if we did say, that this or that can act without or beyond its own sphere of activity.

III.—For every created eye or intellect is a particular thing, having a distinct existence from other things; being posterior to, and standing, as to all its faculties within the sphere of eternal

* These Prefaces and Poems, with the other extracts and manuactions interspersed throughout the present work, may afford some conception of the glorious results, in regard to the knowledge and experience of the science of evangelical truth, and high Paul-like qualifications for the missionary work, which would ensue from the establishment of a Theosophic College. Though, as of the actual applicability and effects of the discovery of steam power, it is impossible to conceive or declare before hand, what may be the fruits of a due and extensive cultivation of the seed of the divine life in all its varieties of developments, of an ardent ingenious prosecution of evangelical perfection, even by some fifty emulative students, (already masters of ordinary human science,) under the generalship of experienced directors, famous for Bramwell-Kemp-like devotion, wisdom and sanctity, and Behmen-Freher-Law-like graduation in theosophical science; the whole confraternity living strictly by rule, and tending to one sole end, the full realization and practical exhibition of the light and love prerogatives, and faith powers of the Christian life! Even the simple conception of those results, so certain and easy of accomplishment, is confounding, yea, overwhelming!

† Strictly speaking, there is neither male nor female in a perfect state of being: all is virginal. But the feminine term is here used according to the popular apprehension. Freher also touches upon this point, in his Three Tables, showing why in some instances the feminine pronoun is applied to Virgin Sophia.

nature. Whereas, without eternal nature, there is and must be an eternal nothing, in comparison to all created things in nature: and an eternal chaos, or temperature; or an eternal oneness, in comparison to that divisibility and innumerable multiplicity that is in nature. In which eternal nothing, temperature, and oneness no creature can exist, nor ever be brought forth; seeing it is self-evident that something and nothing, distinction and temperature, multiplicity and oneness, cannot stand together in one and the same sphere, but do imply the very highest, and most irreconcilable contradiction. THREE PRIN. i. 21, 22. PREDEST. ii. 56—63.

IV.—But, nevertheless, the created intellect, both in men and angels, considering things a posteriori as they are in nature, and knowing they came into natural existency from such a deeper original or foundation-essence, as is itself ALL things in a most eminent sense, must needs on one side own all things to have been in that same original fountain, before eternal nature; because they came forth from out thereof; and must also on the other side disown any thing to have been therein so, as it is now in its created existency, after eternal nature: or else we would say, that it hath been a creature before it was created.

V.—This we are able to apprehend; but to declare, further, distinctly and positively, What this original or foundation-essence is in itself, and how all things have been therein before eternal nature, will be much more impossible for us, than to apprehend distinctly, and to declare positively, what and how we have been in the loins of our father Adam. FORTY QUES. i. 341, 347.

VI.—All what we can conceive and say thereof is this: that we all, when yet in the loins of Adam, have been nothing, lying in one only chaos, without all distinction from each other: which in a sense, and with respect to what we are now, is very true. And yet it is not without all limitation true, in an absolute transcendent sense. For we may see, that even from this same nothing the apostle can, and doth draw forth a most excellent and emphatical argument, to demonstrate thereby the great pre-eminence of the Melchisedech priesthood above the Levitical, saying that Levi, who received tithes after he was in existency, payed tithes in Abraham, when he was yet so nothing, as to be only in the loins of his father.

VII.—Though, therefore, our Author hath written most deeply and solidly, as of nature and creature; so also even of God himself without all nature and creature; yet we are not to think that he had, or could have had an essential prospect, or looking as it were a priori into that most incomprehensible Abyss of all abysses. For no illumination, though never so high, can afford such an one unto any created eye; but only a sight a posteriori, whereby, (in a comparative or negative way and manner,) he could and did express that first Original Being, out of nature, with natural words; being made able to find out the fittest expressions that could be found in outward nature. And of these, I think those three, mentioned before, are the most accommodate to every capacity.

VIII.—But this must yet especially be taken notice of, that these three expressions, (and chiefly that of oneness;) relate not only to the creatures, but also to all what God hath manifested through eternal nature, to be himself. Which will be so much as to say, that here in this place, where God is considered without all nature and creature, no distinct idea may be had, (and shall also not be desired to be had) of the Holy Trinity: no Father, Son, nor Holy Ghost; no Wisdom, no light, glory, majesty, goodness, holiness, are yet here brought forth into distinct manifestation. For though all these things have been verily there also, and must not be said to have had a beginning after, much less to be generated by eternal nature; yet they were as yet unknown, incomprehensible, and unmanifest. And this expression, They were then so, and are now so, doth not import that ever any change, turning or alteration was made, for all is eternal, and co-eternal, without any beginning or shadow of turning: but we, that live and understand in time, and are used to periodical distinctions, cannot express what we conceive thereof otherwise, but by a before and after: which yet doth signify nothing else, but our own distinct idea of one and the self-same eternal object. Which idea is another thing when we consider this eternal object abstractively, as it is in itself without all nature: for then it is to us, that are in nature, unknown, hid, and unintelligible; and is another again, when we consider it as manifested through the concurrence of eternal nature: for then we are able to have an apprehension or sight thereof, more or less, according to that degree, in which our eye is illuminated by the eternal light.—In respect now to that former consideration, we cannot express it better and nearer, than by saying, All these things were, (or rather are) an eternal incomprehensible nothing, when compared to that which we now, after their manifestation through eternal nature, can apprehend them to be: They are an eternal unintelligible oneness, in opposition to our distinct manifold ideas, we can now have of them: they are an eternal inconceivable temperature, in comparison to that distinction we can now conceive therein.—He, therefore, that hath but a due apprehension of these three expressions, may easily be freed from being disturbed by such seeming contradictions, as might appear in some of these places, where JACOB BEHMEN writes of God considered without Nature and Creature, and may also easily discern, what here and there is intermixed, relating to his eternal manifestation. Which places are these following: THREEFOLD LIFE. i. 33. FORTY QUEST. i. 24—48., 262—265. INCARN. Part II. i. 29. ii. 1—25.; iii. 1, 2, etc. PREDEST. i. throughout. CONTEMPL. DIV. i. 17—22. And so the writer proceeds, in successive chapters, to open out the orderly elucidation of the mystery, according to its birth and description in Behmen; the next following chapter being thus headed, “Of the Two Eternal Principles: of the Seven Properties of Nature: and of Darkness, Fire and Light.”

The next extract we propose to insert, is “A DISCOURSE concerning the true SIGNIFICANT SENSE of TEUTONICUS’s deepest, eternal, or ABYSSAL NOTHING: HOW this NOTHING brings forth itself into SOMETHING; in and through the PROCESS of ETERNAL NATURE. But more especially, how all his DIFFERENT DESCRIPTIONS of the DIVINE BEING, in UNITY and TRINITY, before or without, and then as in or after ETERNAL NATURE, may be found standing without all contradiction in a most HARMONIOUS CONCORDANCE.”

“Preface or introduction.—It is unquestionable that TEUTONICUS, in almost all his books considereth the Divine Eternal Being distinctly; sometimes (1.) as all unmanifest, as abyssal in the deepest sense, much different from that wherein the dark world is called abyssal, both in his own writings and in the holy Scriptures, as transcending all created capacities, and utterly excluded from any possibility of being an object either of a human, or of an angelical understanding; and as it was, still is, and will be for ever and ever, above, without, beyond, and before eternal Nature; notwithstanding that this nature is, in a sense declared formerly, co-eternal unto that Divine Being, so that all priority, or successiveness, is totally excluded. And sometimes, again (2.) he considereth this Divine Being, as manifested in and through eternal nature, as byssal, or as that which from the former unformed, beginningless and endless Abyss, hath introduced itself into a ground, or byss; into perceptibility, or into beginning and end; as capable only now of being understood and enjoyed, in a measure and degree, by understanding creatures, created for that purpose; and as it was, still is, and will be for ever and ever, in and with eternal nature. Notwithstanding that this nature was always, is still, and shall be for ever, distinct from, and in no wise to be confounded with that Divine Being.

So then, therefore, (3.) it is unquestionable also, and obvious in all the books of Teutonicus, that he useth several various expressions, and maketh most different descriptions of the Divine Being, which are not applicable promiscuously unto both these considerations, but must be referred either unto that former, or unto this latter in due distinction.

Though it cannot be denied, but that he useth also many times the same words, both of the one and of the other, and this chiefly because of the insufficiency of our capacities and speeches, which both are after and under eternal nature, and cannot either reach unto, or be furnished with words able and sufficient to express that which is beyond and before it. Such expressions, therefore, as are used both in that former, and in this latter consideration, must, in the sense, be distinctly taken and regulated according to what he so frequently and plainly hath premonished, and laid as a foundation for a further superstructure. For this foundation, if observed, cannot but presently direct the reader to that distinction, always to be had in the sense, though it cannot always be had in outward words; and thus in every expression which is dubious or common (as to the outward sound) unto both considerations: but if neglected, much confusion and seeming contradictions cannot be avoided.

The first result from these three fundamental unquestionable assertions, justly here to be taken notice of in the beginning, is this: When Teutonicus considereth of the Divine Being as before, or without all nature and creature, the generation of eternal nature, in its seven properties, is not implied in that consideration, neither tacitly nor explicitly, and must not be conceived as if the mention thereof were only left out for brevity's sake. But this generation of eternal nature in all its properties, is utterly and absolutely excluded therefrom, and must be conceived as quite posterior to this first consideration; yet so, that this posteriority be not referred to the thing itself, but only to our narrow capacity and confined understanding.

If, in the first consideration of the Divine Being, the generation of eternal nature in its properties should be looked upon as tacitly implied, all the distinction between the first and second consideration, is wholly done away; which yet was laid down, as the first foundation, most plainly and clearly, in more than twelve or fifteen places. And besides this, many hundred noble expressions are rendered senseless, nay, the whole superstructure of all his building is thereby overthrown. Prayed, how can God be considered as without and before all nature, if the generation of nature is said to be only left out in the written words, but is to be conceived in the mind as already done? Or how could Teutonicus have said: so far is God considered without all nature and creature? Truly, that so far can bear no other sense but this, unto (or till it cometh to) the generation of the properties of nature, is God considered without all nature.

But here two objections may be made. The first is this: since there is neither before nor after, in the consideration of God and eternal nature, we cannot but think that these two expressions, before and without nature, must be all equivalent. And since now God is considered by Behmen only as in the second principle of light and love, wherein he is distinct from, and superior to his dwelling place, he could rightly have said, that God is considered without nature, notwithstanding that in this consideration the whole generation of nature is tacitly implied, though not always distinctly mentioned.

It is answered, first, as to the priority, it was granted already, that we ought not to say of any before or after, with relation to the thing itself, but that we must say so with respect to our apprehension: which is to conceive all these things orderly, since we are not able to apprehend them as they are in themselves, all at once. And secondly, as to the two expressions, before and without, though they are, upon one account, commonly and rightly joined together, are yet, upon another, not at all equivalent, but greatly different from each other in their sense and relation.

For when I say, God is considered as before eternal nature, this nature is always utterly excluded, and must be conceived as absolutely posterior to that consideration, which the natural and common sense of that word doth show sufficiently. But when I say, God is considered without nature, as Behmen doth sometimes, the whole eternal nature is not always utterly excluded, but only the left, or inferior restless part of nature, which is frequently by Behmen called nature, absolutely, without addition, and in a stricter sense excluding the other, right, superior, transmuted part: which, as in opposition unto that former, is not by Behmen called nature, but most significantly the end of nature, or the fulfilling, or satisfying of nature, or also the holy or the tintured nature.

So now it is true indeed, that when he thus considered God, as in that second superior transmuted principle of light and love, the generation of the first principle in all its foregoing properties, is verily implied, and must be conceived as already done. But what can this signify or make against our position? All this consideration of God, is not a consideration of God as abyssal and unmanifest, and unintelligible; but as intelligible by creatures, as byssal and manifested in and through eternal nature; and may be called without nature also,—not that the generation of nature is utterly excluded, or were to be looked upon as posterior, but only because it is done through the inferior and restless, in the superior harmonized part of nature; and is so verily without (but not before) that lower disharmonized part of nature, which properly and strictly is called nature.

But further it is absolutely false, that Behmen considereth God only so. For though he hath the same expressions that are in this objection mentioned, viz., that God is considered only in the second principle of light; yet it is clear as the day at noon, that this only is, by himself, limited and confined to eternal nature, and especially to the three tinctured and harmonized properties thereof. So that it is to say, that God, as manifested in eternal nature, is considered only in the second principle. And so this only doth not at all import that there is not a deeper and more central consideration of God, since it is notorious, that he considereth God also as unmanifest, in that abyss wherein there is neither darkness nor light, etc.; that is before eternal nature.

The second objection is this: If, in that consideration of the Divine Being, which Behmen calleth before and without nature, we do not look upon the generation as tacitly implied, Behmen shall be found full of contradictions; but if we do, all what he saith thereof is plain. Answer:—The quite contrary to this is true. For, as it cannot be denied, that there is something deeper, more central, and unintelligible than eternal nature is; which something is the very same eternal or Abyssal Nothing, which the Divine Being is before eternal Nature: if it be either wholly taken away, or not observed as it ought to be; or if it is mixed and confounded with what should be conceived as posterior to it, no marvel that there appear in Behmen contradictory expressions. So, then, this mentioned erroneous position cannot be a proper means to reconcile such contradictions; and though it may make a plainer prospect of one superior part of Behmen's building, yet it cannot give a plain and full view of the whole structure, nor show the coherence between the foundation and that which is built upon it. But let everything, and every expression thereof, be placed and looked upon as in its own proper station, as it is either more distant from, or nearer unto the centre, or as it is even that deepest and most individual centre itself, and all will be free from contradictions.

When two opposite winds do meet each other, in the same height of our atmosphere, there must needs be opposition and strife; for each of them is resisted by the other, and neither can go its own way, till the weaker be driven back, or swallowed up by the stronger. But let the one blow from east to west, in such or such a height as, for instance, of a certain mountain, and then the other one may go freely forth his own quite contrary way from west to east, in a region above it. This is known to be so, many times in this our macrocosm, and is truly a fine emblem, able to give us a good direction, in our constructions we put upon these deep spiritual matters, to imitate these orders and regulated courses of nature. And this the more, because we have before us a plain pattern of this our enlightened author, who constantly did so himself, throughout the whole progress he made from the deepest and most central, unto the highest and most outward circumferential thing. Needs therefore, if these shall be understood what he hath so orderly and gradually declared, we must do the same thing, by looking upon everything in its own place wherein it standeth, and wherein it is by him expressed. So doing, every lower and more external expression will open a free and plain way unto every other that may be either more central, or the deepest centre itself; and we shall plainly find, that as eternal nature is in the second consideration to the Divine Being, plainly and necessarily implied, so from the first consideration thereof it is wholly and absolutely excluded: which, in the following discourse, shall be made out, I hope and trust, to the assistance of God sufficiently.

IN THE FIRST PLACE, then, I shall say something concerning the Abyssal Nothing, and declare the reason why this is so called by BEHMEN.

IN THE NEXT PLACE, I shall say something especially concerning the Trinity, showing (1.) from Behmen's own expressions, that a Trinity both before and after eternal nature (but with a great difference of sense), is inseparable from the Unity. (2.) What difference in the Trinity, thus considered in this twofold respect. And (3.) that, notwithstanding this difference, there are not two Trinities, but only one. IN THE THIRD PLACE, I shall go forth to the delineation of these four figures, showing (1.) that they do, if all four unitedly taken together, stand in a good conformity to that single figure, which Behmen himself made in the FOUR QUESTIONS; notwithstanding that their outward form might appear as quite another thing.

(2.) That the first and fourth are to be looked upon as only one; notwithstanding that in the fourth several things are added, which were wanting in the first. (3.) That the addition of those things in the fourth, is caused only by the second and third; which both, and even distinct from each other, must have been inserted between the first and the fourth. (4.) That nothing in Behmen's writings (as to this matter concerning the Divine manifestation), may be found, which could not be referred unto the one or other of these four. (5.) That nothing, as to all this matter is omitted, but everything is set in its due place and order (though this was impossible, that every particular should have been distinctly expressed by a peculiar character), and that by every one of them that are expressed, something of consideration was intended to be represented. This I say, as far as I can judge, will be the best method.

If there should be said anything making for the honour of God, declaring the truth, and being beneficial to the reader, all praise and glory shall be given unto Him alone, without whose assistance we can do nothing. Amen.

EX NIHILO NIHI FIT: This was a saying of that famous heathen philosopher, almost idolized by many learned among the people, called Christians. And though it was said by him as in opposition to the Christian doctrine, is yet true enough in some sense, limited unto that notion, which a corrupt natural reason, or earthly wisdom could have afforded him of that common expression of nothing. But yet it is not here received, either upon account of his authority, or in his heathenish sense, but in that of TEUTONICUS, who saith that very same in these formal words: out of nothing, nothing can come forth, but everything must have its root. And who giveth not only a far deeper declaration, but maketh also a far better use thereof, than by any natural philosopher could have been done.

If he then saith so plainly, that out of nothing nothing can come forth: and if he, notwithstanding this, calleth the Divine Being (out of which angels and men came forth as an offspring), an eternal nothing: it is as clear as anything can be, that there must be the greatest difference between that former, and this latter nothing.

Whenever Teutonicus says, Out of nothing nothing can come forth, it is certain that he taketh this nothing in that common sense, wherein there is said generally, that the whole creation is brought forth by the Creator out of nothing. If he now had said, that this Creator himself was in this same sense nothing before he created: could anything be more foolish or mad?

If it is thus foolish and abominable a thing to form such a negative idea, as mentioned, of that which was, or rather which is to be conceived, before eternal nature, this eternal nothing before nature must certainly be something. For if we do not conceive it as nothing, we must conceive it as something, there being no third notion either distinct from these, or partaking of them both. But we must of necessity take one, and deny the other. And since it is not nothing, according to Teutonicus's own plain words, it must needs be something.

But I would not here be misunderstood, as I easily might, if this dilemma should be extended beyond its sphere, and so beyond the sense and intent, wherein and for which it is here taken. For I know very well that, according to the principles of Teutonicus, in various senses, upon different accounts, and with several respects, that which is by him considered as before eternal nature, may be called both something and nothing, and may be said again to be neither nothing nor something. And truly he cannot be blamed for such variety, and seeming contradictory expressions.

He could not help it, and no man living upon earth shall be found, able to represent these things to the understanding of another, with such expressions as never should seem to cross and contradict each other. If the Spirit of God in the revelation could have said of one and the same thing, it was, and was not, and yet was, nay, could have added, that here is wisdom, etc., who can justly complain of Teutonicus? The understanding must supply that which is wanting in the expressions, which may be done in part, by duly considering that this matter, with its expressions of nothing and something, cannot be referred unto one only world, or universe, which would make no difference in the sense, but unto two extremely different from each other; which is therefore, and must be, the chief cause for which one and the same expression is true, with relation to the one, and false, or at least much altered in the sense, with reference to the other.

This, then, is an evident position of Teutonicus, that the Divine Being, considered as before eternal nature, is an eternal something, though he so frequently calleth it an eternal nothing, which will appear by the following particulars.

We may ask reasonably, what was before the creation of angels and of this world? And we may answer, God. Which will be enough for a common or superficial understanding; but more distinctly and theosophically we must answer with Teutonicus, God and eternal nature. Now, we cannot ask further, what was before God? But we may ask (in a sense limited as above), what was before eternal nature? meaning not, thereby, that there was any instant in which eternal nature was not, and after which it came to be what it is; but meaning only that there was, and still is, something deeper, or something more internal and central, which is eternal nature's root, ground, and original, since out of nothing, nothing can come forth. And asking what that was, and is, which like as now, so also from eternity, causeth eternal nature to be what it is, and gave it to have what it hath? We must, with Teutonicus, answer, that this is God, an eternal nothing, a still eternity, an eternal liberty, a resting quiet temperature, a serene light [habitation], saith the English interpreter, for want of a fitter expression; but in the true sense of the German word, there is not meant at all, a habitation, but such a soft and tender sweetness or delightfulness, (N.B.) as is perceptible, indeed, but very calm; and not so powerfully unfolded or displayed, as that it might be called a great overwhelming joy; which difference may be more easily understood in our mind, by experience, than it can be expressed by words):

An unintelligible softness, meekness, stillness, humility; an abyssal Being; a chaos, comprehending itself, or comprehensible by itself; a Wonderful Eye, wherein all the colours, powers, and virtues, lay together in such a mixture, as that they are indeed undiscernable, so that none can tell what it is; and make nevertheless a most terrible, awful prospect, confounding and consuming every sight that looks thereon. An eternal mirror of wonders; an abyssal powerfulness, all-sufficiency, omniscience, something which is and is not; (N.B.) which is, and dwells in itself, and is not manifest without itself; something which is nothing and all; a single eternal life or good; and a single will without desire, [without that desire which tends towards without, and is the beginning of nature, but not absolutely without any desire. For this eternal will without all nature desireth, and only desireth, to generate itself in Trinity, or to generate its co-eternal son; which desire, though not conveniently nor properly so called, tends not towards without, but keeps within, is free from nature, and hath no other object but only this generation, as might be shown from many places of this author.] A spiritual, substantial power, working in itself, (N.B.) a sensibility of love; a pleasant, loving taste; a delightful moving of the Holy Ghost, in the eternal wisdom; an eternal love, and only love generating and introducing itself in pure love into trinity; which trinity as yet is not distinguished according to what we can call a distinction in and after nature, and is not therefore a proper object of our understanding. JE-HO-VA: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; a threefold opening, and breathing out, working in itself, generating itself, finding and perceiving itself; a divine eternal unity, [answering, in a sense and manner, much rather to the O than to the number 1.] An infinite Triune Being, past all finding out, etc:

All these expressions may be found in Behmen, for an answer to that question, What was before eternal nature. And so we may now see, not only that he expresses it so variously, but also by expressions negative and positive. Nay, sometimes his expressions do so notoriously contradict each other, that it might seem as if they were designedly used to frighten away from these mysteries all ill-natured and unworthy readers, and to raise up an attention and inquiry after truth in such as had but so much of consideration and reasonable judgment as to think, that this author had anything of reality in him, and was not quite a mad and drunken babbler. For instance, when he saith in one place, that which is before eternal nature, is an eternal life and good: and in another, that the abyss hath no life and good; and in another, that there is light and clearness in the abyss, and that there is neither light nor darkness therein. Again, that before eternal nature is no finding, no perceiving, no knowing itself; no activity, no mobility, and yet that there is perceiving, knowing, loving, tasting, opening, generating, breathing out, working and moving, etc., before and without eternal nature. And again, when he saith plainly, (N.B.) that all the powers, colours, and virtues lay together in one (without distinction), and yet adds in the same place, that one power, colour, and virtue knoweth or perceiveth the other, in distinction; and that this is a manifold generating harmony, well tuned and concordant with every sound thereof. Or a speaking word, wherein all the languages, powers, colours, and virtues, do lay together, and with or by the speaking do unfold and introduce themselves into a sight or seeing eye.

These seeming contradictions shall be cleared up hereafter, they are here only presented to prove that Teutonicus doth not represent that which is before eternal nature, as a nothing, but as a something, or true substantial Being.

For since he speaketh thereof so variously, now in a negative, and then again in a positive way, it is undeniable, that he would not have us to conceive it, as non ens, or nothing, but as a real something.

It was necessary, also, for him to use these seemingly contradictory expressions, and to represent it both as nothing and something, neither this nor that alone could have served his ends.

If he had represented it as a something only, he would not have sufficiently declared the infinite distance between that abyssal centre, and all its outflow, lesser and greater circumferences. He would not have exalted it duly, above all what can be named, thought on, spoken of, or comprehended. He would have misled us dangerously, and given occasion for to conceive it only as the greatest and most particular something, when it is not such = something, as had any other something besides it, from which it could be distinguished, as a peculiar something by itself, but must be quite exempted from the number and order of something, and exalted far above it, as an universal ground, source or centre, out of which all somethings, with all their order, are originated.

Like as we see a fine resemblance thereof in a centre and its circumference. The circumference consists of innumerable little points, answering fifty unto so many particular somethings, placed by each other.

But the centre is only one individual point; as to its quantity not bigger than any of all the rest, but as to qualities the most considerable of all, and in a sense so big as all the circumferential points taken together; nay, upon another account, even infinitely bigger.

For upon this only, all the circumferential points do depend, having only from that one all that they are, and have; nay, there is none of them, though never so little, which hath not something answering thereto, and corresponding therewith, in the central point, as their original; seeing that even this also may be considered not only as = centre of its circumference, but also as a circumference of itself. Wherefore, then, we may conceive it as to qualities, so big as all the points together in the whole circumference. And when we consider that, from this only central point, without any addition thereto, diminution thereof, or any change of place and number, innumerable other circles, first lesser and then wider, even in infinitum, may be conceived coming forth, this one original central point may well be conceived as infinitely larger than all the circumferential points can be. Which all are confined to number, order, and place, and subject to various mutations of increase and decrease, when that central point alone is immutable in itself, free from all such imperfections, and hath nevertheless in itself more eminently all what there is in all of them, for all what is in them displayed, is in that concentrated.

Further, we may conceive a visible circumference wherein no centre doth visibly appear at all, and yet we are always sure there is, and must be, a fixed unalterable point, which made all the points in this circumference to stand in the order they do, and to have such a connexion with each other. And again, all the points in this circumference stand in divisibility, and multiplicity, as so many particular parts; so that each of them filleth but its own place, and is but that which it is within its own narrow compass, but nothing more; and none of them can be considered anyways as a whole, and when, taken even altogether, are but a whole circumference, wherein no centre is implied as a part thereof.

But the central point only is a single, indivisible universe and can be truly called a whole; since not only it can never be divided into two, but also never can admit a second or third besides it; and is moreover, in a sense and manner, both centre and circumference itself. So that it is, and abideth unalterably in the whole circumference an only perfect whole, and all fulfilling, all sufficient all.

Let now a due application of all this, and more the like, be made to that Abyssal Being, and we shall see, that like as a centre is no less, but more really something that any point of the circumference; and as it is nevertheless also really nothing at all to all the points thereof, because it doth not belong to their number and order, but is that which maketh them to have such a number and order, it is incomprehensible to them; but itself doth in a sense comprehend them all, and had them in itself, before they were set forth in number and order out of it; it is excluded from all the circumference, and keeps only its own central residence, where none of all the other points can approach unto. It is quite of another nature, condition, and properties; and so may be called on one side a real being in itself, but on the other quite a nothing unto them. So also that abyssal being before eternal nature, which is the only original of all things that are thereafter, may be called nothing most significantly, with respect to all that is originated therefrom, when yet it is a substantial being in itself. Wherefore then, if he had represented it only as something, by mere positive expressions, he would have taught us to conceive it, not as an abyssal, incomprehensible, (N.B.) Universal Centre, but as an outflow, particular something, which we might have looked upon as if it were belonging to the number and order of other particular somethings. And so he should thereby have led us to form thereof such or such images, as we could have thought the fittest and most appropriable thereto, when they all would be no better than idols of gold and silver.

But now, by telling us not only in one respect, by positive expressions, that it is a Being, but also by negative descriptions, that it is nothing to us, and unto all things that are posterior and exterior, he prevents (if we understand him) all such mistakes. For he will most earnestly call us to mind, that in our enquiry after that which is before eternal nature, we be very cautious, modest, and sober, not running out too far, and not thinking that we have, or can have, any ability to find out such pertinent notions, as might be answering thereunto, and might afford us words, fit to declare affirmatively what it is. But that we shall be sure that it utterly vanisheth away out of all our sight, thoughts, and ideas, so that by none of them it can be apprehended, imaged, or expressed. Nay, that even the nearest and best we can have thereof lawfully, must be denied again, and quite abstracted from all that sense which they can have or bear in this world. This is to say, it is nothing, and is the reason why he so frequently calleth it an eternal nothing.

But now again, on the other side, if he had represented it always and absolutely as nothing, by only negative expressions, without affirming anything, he had erred himself and misled others, and quite contradicted his own axiom, that out of nothing nothing can come forth.

HAVING THUS PROVED, I think sufficiently, from Behmen's manifold own expressions (1.) that the generation of eternal nature in all its properties, is not implied, but totally excluded from that first consideration of the Divine Being, which he useth to call, without all nature and creature. (2.) That this Divine Being without nature, is not to be conceived according to the usual absolute sense of this latter expression (nothing), but according to the most eminent sense of that former (being); which sense must be abstracted indeed from all conceivable beings, in and after nature. Yet not abstracted by way of a strict and direct opposition, which would lead us into that common notion of nothing, but by way of a great exaltation above it, in such an eminent manner, that we may say it is a being indeed, but a being only in and to itself, having no communion in properties or qualities with any other being; and belonging not to the number and order wherein all particular beings stand with a mutual relation to themselves. (3.) That consequently these two expressions, nothing and being, must needs be joined together in all our discourses and conceptions thereof, and that neither by this, nor by that alone, the whole truth can be declared in its fullness. And (4.) that this taking these two expressions in the sense here mentioned, is the only true middle way, leading safely through two most dangerous extremities, and making us to avoid on one side our forming images of that divine abyssal Being, which we are naturally so much inclined to conceive in forms and figures; and on the other to avoid dishonouring our only true eternal root, or central being, without which no creature could exist. And that, therefore, we must not place it in the circumference, which is belonging only unto things brought forth, in which circumference this divine abyssal being is nothing; but that we must place in its own central residence, wherein this eternal nothing is a true substantial being, not brought, but bringing forth all whatever may be called something, in and after eternal and temporal nature: where innumerable somethings do represent themselves to our eye and understanding, and are yet (only by reason of there being many) nothing else but small particulars, all confined to their own narrow compass; when that central nothing alone is a whole universe, and an individual, all filling and all sufficient all:

We must now consider, a little more distinctly, some of our Author's chiefest affirmative expressions, in order to approach thereby nearer to the most principal matter, which is the consideration of the Trinity, both before and after eternal nature. Some, I say, of his affirmative, not negative, expressions; setting this down as a considerable foundation of what is to follow, that his affirmative expressions must prevail in our consideration, and must be more looked into, observed and insisted upon, than his negative ones. Because by so doing, we shall find ourselves enabled to save all his negative expressions also, so that none of them shall be lost, or left as useless or insignificant.

When, on the contrary, if we regard chiefly his negative expressions, and insist upon them absolutely and universally, not minding in what particular respect they are used so and so, we can no way save his affirmative expressions, but lose and make them empty and insignificant, as if they were but a frivolous prating.

We will therefore choose out some of his affirmative expressions, as shall lead us the nearest way to a decision of these two principal points, inseparable from each other, and do concern (1.) the Divine Abyssal Being's finding, knowing, or perceiving itself; and (2.) its generating itself in Trinity before the generation of eternal nature.

(1.) Then I do recommend justly, to a serious consideration, that description of the wonderful eye of eternity, which we meet with in the Second Part of the BOOK OF THE INCARN. iii. 1, which is to be compared with the following places:—MYST. MAG. i. 7, 8; PREDEST. i. 4—9; FORTY QUEST. i. 14—21; CONTEMP. DIV. iii. 6, 7. [The references of this discourse are to the German original, from which our English translation differs in the arrangement of the paragraphs.]

All these places declare one and the same thing, viz., the Divine Being before and without eternal Nature.

This is evident, also, from his own declarations in the DIV. CONTEMPL. iii. 6., according to the German original. We cannot, saith he, say (N.B.) that herein a nature or creature is to be understood, but it is the eternal forming of the Divine word and will, where the Spirit of God (N.B.) in such an object, in the powers of wisdom, and by such formations of similitudes hath played with himself.

Now this denomination (of an eye) doth sufficiently show, that we are to conceive it in a sense as something, which is also still more evident from the attributes he ascribes to it. He says, that this EYE is like as (in the sight of a created understanding) a prospect of great wonders, wherein all colours, powers, and virtues (N.B.) appear as a most dreadful being, etc.

That no man indeed can discern distinctly this from that, and that nevertheless it may be looked upon, (N.B.) yet so that this eye as a terrible lightning is confounding and consuming all created sight:

That the wonders in this eye have no number, no ground, and no end; and that the soulish spirit only, which hath its original from thence, can be able to understand it. Further, that this is the moving, or the life of the Deity, an eternal seeing, an abyssal eye, wherein one colour, power, and virtue (N.B.) perceiveth the other in distinction:

That this is a most concordant generating harmony; that the eternal nothing without nature and creature introduceth itself into an eye, or an eternal seeing, for to find and contemplate itself:

That in the unnatural, uncreatural Deity, (i. e. without all nature and creature), there is but one will, which is called the one only God, willing in himself nothing else but to find and contemplate himself; and that herein (N.B.) the Trinity and the looking-glass of wisdom, or the eye of eternity is understood. That this eye is not to be compared to a circle, but to a globe, and that therein all beings were seen from eternity, without being, or before they had a being. That the spirit of eternity introduceth the eye of the soul therinto, or openeth unto the spirit a prospect thereof, and that only then it can be seen:

That in the abyss there is (N.B.) no finding, but that the finding is in this abyssal eye, wherein there is made manifest what the eternity is. [N.B. this paragraph, which by no means can be understood, if the different senses in which the abyss must be taken, is not regarded. The first will, considered only and purely as in and to itself, in the deepest abstraction from all what there can bear in this first world any other denomination, is the abyss in the deepest sense, and therein is no finding; but this eye is no more an abyss but a byss already, and there is finding, seeing, manifesting, to the former abyss, what the eternity is. So that there is in this first world both byss and abyss together in one sense: when in another, this whole first world, with its byss and abyss in conjunction, is an abyss with respect to the posterior world, wherein the generation of eternal nature is understood, concerning which distinction more will be said by and by.]

That this eye maketh beginning and end: [this expression is much to be observed, and is only made intelligible by the next preceding. The chiefest emphasis relating unto that former, lieth therein, that there is not said, that it hath, but that it maketh beginning and end.] That there is in this first world an opening; a moving, an outbreathing, a multiplication, a forming similitudes, etc., all which the author doth represent in a simile taken from the mind, will, senses, and thoughts of man. Which different things he placeth expressly and considerably before the magnetical impression (i.e. the first form of eternal nature) out of which afterwards joy and sorrow (the first and second principle) cometh forth.

(2.)—The second affirmative expression here to be taken notice of, is this, that Teutonicus calleth this eternal Eye the first world, whereof no creature knoweth anything. It is plain enough that a world is not an empty region, as that it could be conceived as a mere nothing in opposition to something; but that it is an universe, containing in itself all, without exception in one sense, and all, with limitation, in another: viz. all what it can be capable of, according to its own particular kind. So we find it both in the dark world, and in the holy light world, and in our four elementary world also.

(3.) He says, in more than a hundred places, that there is a Divine Being therein, a being of all beings, a foundation being, nay that this being is that first abyssal world itself, etc. And though he saith expressly that this world or being is ineffable and incomprehensible, yet it is deeper than any thought can reach; that it is without properties, without inclination to this or that, and that it hath no other being besides, before, or behind itself, which it could be discerned from, or touched and affected by, etc. Yet all this, and much more the like, cannot make this Divine Being a nothing in itself, but a nothing to all those exterior and posterior beings which are derived down from that, in and through the generation of eternal nature.

This he says himself in the plainest words: The Divine Being, before and without nature, is an eternal nothing; though we ought not to say a nothing, since this nothing is God, an eternal All. And again, This eternal being is a pure Nothing, unto all whatever there is posterior to itself. What can be plainer than these two expressions? Doth he not directly limit this denomination of nothing only to the creatures and to their understanding? And that he will not have them to call this abyssal being an eternal nothing with relation to himself, but permits them only to call it so with respect to themselves, and to all their narrow capacities; to the end that none presume to form such or such ideas and images thereof, etc.

Further, when Behmen saith, that in this first abyssal world there is the greatest stillness, meekness, quietness, etc., he not only distinguisheth plainly this first world from all other posterior worlds, wherein there is more or less, and in each according to its kind and order, some stirring, moving, working, comprehensibility, thickness, palpability, etc.; but he doth also grant expressly that even in this first world also, there are all these things now named, though not according to the sense these names can bear in any of the other worlds, but according to its own central station.

And though he saith plainly that of this first world, no creature knoweth anything; yet he limiteth this by saying again, that the spirit of soul, which is a creature, may be introduced thereto, and may be made able to see, that it is.

(4.) See especially the Book of PREDESTINATION, i. 4, 7, 20, 21, where we shall find this first Abyssal Being before and without eternal nature, is a substantial spiritual power, working in itself lovingly, etc.

(5.) What Teutonicus saith concerning especially the Trinity in this Abyssal world, see the Second Par. INCARNATION, ii. 4, 7; MYST. MAG. viii. 5, 10.

We find that in the Chaos (which is the first abyssal world), is the Trinity also, nay that there must be owned a Trinity therein, as soon as is granted a living, understanding Being. That as there is in this first world an eternal seeing, so also an eternal imagination and impregnation of the first will, and further, an eternal generation in the Three (commonly called persons), so distinct (N.B.) from each other, that none of them is that which the other is, but each only that which it is itself. That the first groundless will generateth in itself a grounded comprehensible will, co-eternal indeed to the first will, and having nevertheless in a sense, an eternal beginning. Which second grounded will is the first will's eternal something, or essentiality and perceptibility, through which that first will goeth out, and introduceth itself into an eternal contemplation of itself, which outgoing is the third (person), and is a moving life of the first and second.

That this Tri-une Being, in its outgoing and contemplation of itself, hath been so from all eternity, and hath been but one life, one will, without desire. That in this eternal generation, three things are to be understood. (1.) A groundless will; (2.) an eternal mind of that will; and (3.) an out-breathing, speaking forth, or out-going from the will and mind, (or, as he saith sometimes, from the will through the mind, which both is right and true,) which is the spirit of them both. That this Trinity before eternal nature cannot yet be called properly Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and is not yet an object of our understanding, but that the Trinity is only understood rightly in that exterior manifestation of this abyssal being, which is made in and through the generation of properties of eternal Nature, wherein all the understanding creatures stand, and beyond which therefore, none of them can reach.

CONCERNING these contradictory (viz., affirmative and negative) expressions of the first divine Abyssal Being, I shall further consider and explain these two things, (I.) how they are both true with respect to two different worlds. (II.) how they are both also true in one and the same abyssal world, with respect only to two different degrees or parts thereof.

I.—Concerning understanding, knowing, and perceiving itself; both these are affirmed and denied of the first abyssal being, by Teutonicus, and both are consistent with each other, with respect to two different worlds.

We heard above, that all what there is before and without the generation of eternal nature, is, by Behmen, called the first world. Upon this foundation, I do call the second world all that which followeth immediately upon the first, and this is the whole generation of eternal nature.

And this denomination of the second world, in such a distinction from the first, is to signify no more, and nothing else, but that this or that is so and so; not with respect to that which is before nature, in the chaos or abyss, but to that which is in the generation of eternal nature, and is even that generation itself, conceived in a general idea, and extended to all the several properties thereof, without descending to a particular notion of darkness, fire and light.

But it may be objected against this distinction of a first and second world, that Behmen expressly saith and confineth this finding and not finding to the abyss, or first world, without any mention of a second. Answer: This is granted. But then it must be granted also, that very frequently he speaks of the Divine Being's knowing and perceiving itself, with a manifest relation to that, which is not in the first world, but in the generation of eternal nature; declaring that only therein is generated that which creatures call understanding, knowing, feeling, etc.: so that here lieth a sufficient reason and ground for looking at his expressions with a different respect to two most different worlds.

Secondly, Behmen doth, indeed, speak only of the abyss, referring unto that only both his affirmative and negative expressions; but that this denomination of abyss is to be taken in two greatly different senses, which are carefully to be distinguished, according to what the matter, then considered, doth require. These two senses do both indeed belong to the first world; so that we cannot say, the abyss in one sense is in the first world, and in the other sense in the second; but that the abyss is in that first world only, and is that first world itself.

But yet these two senses do belong to that first world, with a great deal of difference. The one sense belongs so entirely to the first world, that it can in no sense be referred to the second. The other sense belongeth to that first world also, yet so that it implyeth a certain relation to the second world; which relation is all inseparable from that sense.

For abyss is with Behmen a relative expression, and cannot be conceived, according to his mind, without its correlate, which is byss, no more than father without a son. As now abyss is taken in a twofold sense, so it hath also a twofold relation, or byss, to be taken in a twofold sense, each of which must be conformable to that world whereof it is then spoken.

The whole second world, or the whole generation of eternal nature, in the seven chief properties thereof, is byss, though the principal reflection aims at the light world only, and terminates therein. And the abyss of this byss is the whole first world, or all what there is before, without any particular notice taken of what by Behmen is represented therein more distinctly, and is called the Divine Abyssal Being; and this is the one sense of this word abyss.

Which sense, because of the byss corresponding with this abyss, implyeth not one, but two different worlds, vastly different from each other.

But now, again, in that first world only, before eternal nature, there is, according to Behmen's own plain words, and large deduction, both abyss and byss together; for that Divine Abyssal Being is its own both abyss and byss.

Since, therefore, this twofold sense of the abyss is plainly founded in Behmen's writings, the reason for looking upon his contrary expressions, first, with respect to two different worlds, and secondly, with respect to the first abyssal world only, is also plain and solid.

For to come now to our first purpose, it will be most proper to represent but briefly several circumstantial things relating to those negative expressions, and to recommend them all together to a serious consideration; viz., who it was, that uttered these negative expressions, and unto what end he uttered them. Of what he speaketh; upon what account; in what manner, and to what end.

(1.) He that uttered these negative expressions was a creature, and, notwithstanding his extraordinary gifts, but a small particular of the innumerable products of eternal nature, calling himself but a little point or spark. Consequently then, he had all his understanding and knowledge from the Divine Being indeed; but so, as this is considered not before, but in, or after that eternal generation of the properties of eternal nature. Moreover, he was a man who, from his natural birth, was as simple and ignorant as any other, which he frequently confesseth; a man who not only owned to know nothing of himself, but who felt also, and understood experimentally, in a very high degree, himself to be nothing, in a sense quite different from that, nay, even (N.B.) opposite unto that, wherein he useth to say, the Divine Being, before the generation of the properties of nature, is an eternal nothing. But a man also, who, notwithstanding all his nothingness, was really permitted to have a prospect into that eternal nothing, and to see that it IS; though his sight must have been immediately confounded, so that he could not see, much less declare affirmatively, what or how it is. And such an one was it, that uttered these negative expressions.

(2.)—Unto creatures, all of the self-same nature and condition, as himself; which all therefore are capable, more or less, of understanding his mind and sense: yet so, that none of them can pretend to be sufficient of himself, for understanding him. And among these, he directs himself especially to the simple ones, calling himself a philosopher of the simple, and saying of them, that their simplicity is not to hinder, but much rather to further them, and make them more fit for understanding these deep things; which is to say chiefly and especially, more fit to be admitted, as he was, into the sight of eternal nature, and of that eternal nothing also, which is before it. Where they cannot but meet with that same entertainment which he met with, viz., to be dazzled and confounded, so as to be not able to see distinctly what or how it is, though they may see plainly that it is. Now, unto such he speaketh.

(3.) Of their deepest abyssal original; of that which dwelleth, and is what it is only in and to itself, without any relation or tendency towards anything without. Of that which desireth not to be understood by creatures, but only to be owned, and in a deep internal silence, awe, and reverence, to be adored, as the deepest and most internal centre of all whatever was, or is, or shall be hereafter; of that which is most different from the consideration of all the Divines therein, that they all conceive and describe an infinite, good, just, holy, gracious, etc. Spirit. Which is a consideration of God as manifested in and through eternal nature, unto creatures; when in this first consideration of his, God is not only without all creature, but all nature also; and is infinitely superior to all conceivable properties, and to all words or names, though they were to signify (N.B.) the greatest imaginable perfections.

If all the perfections we can conceive to be so, or use to express by such or such denominations, are much rather lies than truth, when attributed to the Divine Being, considered as manifested in eternal nature, and with relation to creatures, according to what is plainly said by many mystical writers: how much more must they all be lies, when attributed to that Divine Abyssal

Being, which by Behmen only, is considered as dwelling in itself, before and without all nature and creature?

Though both in this consideration and in that, they may be owned to be true, in a sense relating to the stammering creatures; for they are not said to be true in the one consideration, and false in the other, but, both in that former and in this latter, they may be tolerable, and owned to be true, in a sense wholly relating to creatures. And again, both in this and that they are false, in a sense relating unto that Divine Eternal Being itself; though much more false, when this is considered as before, than when it is as in or after eternal nature; seeing that all conceptions, words, and names, have each of them their own peculiar sense, originated in the generation of the properties of nature, and determined by particular understanding creatures. Wherefore, then, no such sense can be attributed unto, or spoken of that abyssal being before all nature and properties, so as to declare how or what it is, in and to itself. Of that abyssal central being he speaketh now

(4.) Upon that account, which was mentioned several times, and is of the greatest consequence, viz., that a creature, in a sense and manner, may be admitted into the sight thereof, so as to see that it is, though no creature can fix its eye upon it, nor bear the sight thereof, so as to see what and how it is. Which is, and must be so, of all necessity, not only because of the creature's weak and narrow constitution, but also because of that abyssal being's own nature; which cannot but be melting down, confounding, and consuming everything that is belonging unto another world.

If the creature itself could be brought (as to its own particular created existency) into this first abyssal world, it must immediately be dissolved and annihilated as to all its created being, and could not be preserved in its particular created existency.

But now the creature itself is not brought into that first world, but only the creature's sight, or as it were a ray of the creature's seeing or understanding faculty is admitted thereinto; or rather, a little opening of this abyssal depth is made in the spirit of the soul, through the which opening this spirit must needs be made sensible of something appearing in that central depth, and even appearing like as it were a most terrible lightning; because his ray of seeing or understanding is immediately confounded and swallowed up thereby, so far as it hath looked into that abyssal depth. And this terrible something he cannot express nearer, nor more significantly, than by calling it an eternal abyssal nothing, in consideration both of its own particular being, which is in a sense and manner, or as it were in part, annihilated thereby, and in comparison of so many millions of other particular beings, which all may be looked upon without danger, as so many proper objects of his understanding. But seeing the creature itself, as to its own existency, doth continue to be that same which it was before, and cannot be annihilated; its seeing faculty must continue also, forasmuch as it proceedeth forth from that created natural being.

This, therefore, may now justly be said both to have seen and not to have seen. It hath seen, because it was really touched, and made sensible of such an abyssal being's existency in itself, or its own central world: and it hath not seen, because it was immediately, as it were, killed, driven back, and confounded, so that it cannot say what it was, or how it was, but only that it was not this nor that, nor anything that could be named in all these worlds, which creatures can have any access unto.

For all what can be looked upon by understanding creatures, can also be declared more or less what, or how it is, and may have a name more or less convenient unto its nature and properties, whereby it is not only distinguished from all other somethings, but is also placed in the number and order of all those other somethings.

But of this abyssal being, all must be denied, whatever is affirmed of all other things in other worlds. It must absolutely be exempted from all and every number and order, and cannot be named by any proper name, whereby it were to be distinguished from other somethings; seeing that there is none besides itself in that first abyssal world.

And this is plainly to say, that it is nothing at all with respect to creatures, yet something in and to itself. And this makes it plain why Teutonicus must have spoken of that Divine Abyssal Being

(5.) In a human way or manner, like as a little stammering child, delivering, indeed great true, heavenly, deep, eternal things, but with an earthly tongue; having no other words but such as are of this low, four-elementary world; which are much more insufficient to represent that which cannot be looked upon, and is therefore beyond expression, than the colours of a painter are to represent lively such or such a visible object. That he speaketh thereof in such a manner, even when he declareth things much inferior to this, he freely confesseth.

In such a manner therefore, and with such expressions as he could have had in this world, he speaketh unto his fellow creatures

(6.) To this end and intent, that he may not only exalt (according to his duty) that Divine Abyssal Being, above all nature and creature, and set it in its own place, exempt from all the number and order of all posterior somethings; but also that he may, according to his command, inform his fellow creatures, as he did seriously, to be cautious in their enquiry, to watch over their own motions, to restrain their curiosity so natural unto them, and chiefly, to make no images of that first central or abyssal being, by representing it in such or such a particular similitude, without which we can conceive thereof nothing at all. Nay, to know also surely that, notwithstanding all his declarations, they cannot come to have any true, proper, affirmative conception thereof; which might be in a sense and manner excusable in the second consideration of God, as manifested in eternal nature; but is here in this first all intolerable, without any limitation, and which he never intended to prescribe to any, as shall appear by and by.

Let now all these six circumstances be duly considered, and it will plainly enough appear not only why Behmen called this Divine Abyssal Being an eternal Nothing, but also why he said there is no finding, knowing, and understanding therein.

If we understand the generation of eternal nature in its properties, we cannot but grant that all what we apprehend of such and all the like expressions, and whatever we are able to say thereof with any other words, are originated in eternal nature, together with all our being, knowing, understanding, etc. So that all this wholly depends upon that eternal generation, as a product, result, or consequence thereof, which by no means can be conceived as antecedent to the properties of eternal nature ; or if we would presume to conceive it so, we should presume to conceive a nature antecedent to eternal nature.

If there is before eternal nature an eternal chaos or temperature, wherein all things lie in stillness and equality, without order, number, measure, properties, qualification ; without being distinguished from each other, (according to our author's simile) like as fire, light, heat, smoke, air, water, etc., lay in a candle without distinction. And if all distinction relating unto and perceivable by creatures, hath its original in eternal nature, like as the distinction of leaves, branches, fruits, hath its original in temporal nature, so that they cannot be brought forth in distinction, except there be first performed an actual moving and concurrent operation of its properties, in every particular plant or tree ; how can there be, or be conceived, a finding, perceiving, knowing, etc., before eternal nature, where that which is supposed to be found, perceived, known, understood, seen, etc., is not yet distinguished from that which findeth, perceiveth, knoweth, understandeth, seeth, etc. And where that ray, which is to go forth from the one to the other, is not yet generated between them, but lieth still in its own nothingness ?

It is certainly true and plain, that all these expressions mentioned, bear a relation to the second world, and further also, a relation to the creatures, and to their understanding after this second world. It must therefore be true and plain also, that all these, and the like expressions, are justly to be denied of that first abyssal being or world, and that it cannot be strictly and significantly enough expressed and imprinted into the hearts of men, that there is in that first central world, no such thing at all, as by any creature, in any other circumferential world, can be understood, apprehended, or declared by words.

For so that first abyssal being is duly exalted above and totally excluded from all the capacity, of men and angels. They are all confined to their proper station in due humility : eternal nature is distinguished from and subordinated to that central being, which it had its eternal original of ; and this is declared to be always the same in itself, and absolutely incommunicable unto anything, but what is itself in its own abyssal world, which never any creature can approach unto, neither with its being, nor by its understanding.

All this is plain ; for every one that doth but so much as own an invisible spiritual world will readily grant, that things in this world, wherein we now live in such a blindness and ignorance, and even in that sense which they bear with relation to creatures, cannot be attributed unto that internal world. How much more, then, must he that owns Behmen's abyssal world, be ready to grant, that nothing of this external world, in that sense wherein it is taken therein, can be attributed to that first eternal one.

But now if any one should hence conclude, that Behmen, by denying so positively that perceiving, knowing, etc. is in the first abyssal world, or in the Divine Being before eternal nature, that therefore he has denied that same in all and every sense, absolutely, without any limitation in the very largest extent, he would certainly be mistaken, and guilty of having stretched out his words beyond his scope, and contrary to all his affirmative expressions.

Let it not seem contradictory, that above, and here again is said of affirmative expressions, when there was said expressly a little before, that Behmen never intended to prescribe his readers any true, proper, affirmative concept of that first abyssal world.

And again : let it not seem contradictory, that above is said, the creature is not capable of any other sense, perceiving, knowing, etc., but what is after and hath its original in the generation of eternal nature, when there now here is said, that knowing, perceiving, etc., is denied indeed of the abyssal being in that sense which hath any relation unto creatures, but that it is not denied in all and every sense. For this doth plainly suppose that there is another sense, which hath no relation unto creatures, and is nevertheless conceivable by creatures ; which with that former saying cannot be reconciled.

Answer 1st. As to the affirmative expressions, I say, they are called only so with respect to their verbal construction, wherein they stand opposite to this or that, and are called negative. And so it is true, indeed, in a very low, inconsiderable, and outward sense, that they make an appearance of a fixed and solid position or affirmation. But we are not to stick to that, if we intend to be more intimately acquainted with Behmen's sense. For it is certainly true, also, in a much deeper, and most considerable sense, that all those (so called) affirmative expressions, are turned by him into negative, and that he never had any design to prescribe unto, or to raise up in his readers, such an affirmative idea of the Divine Abyssal Being, as could be called so, in an eternal true reality.

And this doth appear plainly from so many limitations, cautions, restrictions, etc., obvious everywhere in all those places where he speaketh of that first abyssal world.

Whereby he sheweth sufficiently, that all his expressions are negative in their true internal sense, though many of them in their outward shape, and in a sense of this world, appear as affirmative, which neither he was, nor any other can be able to remedy.

Every affirmative saying doth attribute something particular unto that first abyssal world, which in this our outward world must be tolerated, since the creature cannot do otherwise. But the creature, if it hath any understanding from a higher principle, will of itself observe a due distinction between world and world, and will not presume to bring any particular thing or sense passable in the one, into the other, as if it were passable therein also ; but will see itself, that nothing that is affirmative in this world, wherein there is all particularity, division, and contrariety, can be affirmative in the first abyssal world, wherein there is a whole and total, undivided universality.

Affirmative expressions in this world may indeed be attributed to the second world, and may be tolerable, if their sense be refined and exalted above what they signify here below ; because there is a connexion between them, consisting therein, that they both are in and after nature. But as to the first abyssal world, no affirmative saying from this world can be admitted into that, though never so much refined and exalted ; because there is no coherence, no analogy, and no mutual answerableness between them, the one of them being in nature, and the other without nature.

Which immense distance makes all affirmative expressions in nature to be negative, or false, when applied to what is without nature. Every affirmative expression maketh an image or representation of a thing in such a form or figure, either finer and more spiritual, or grosser and more corporeal.

If then, of this first abyssal world, no image in nowise sense or manner shall be made (though in some sense or manner it must be made of the second world), no affirmative expression hath here any place, but must (since we cannot help using them in our speech and writings) be always restrained and confined; whereby then, in our mind, that same is made negative, which in outward words appears affirmative.

All affirmative expressions have a natural inseparable relation unto nature and creatures, and are all born in this low four-elementary world.

If then, all this world, and all nature and creature can show and give us nothing that could be applicable to the first abyssal world; and if no created understanding can be found able to reach unto that world, and to form from ten thousand affirmative expressions but so much as one true, positive idea thereof; all affirmative expressions, must be denied again, and are turned thereby into negative, let their outward appearance in a grammatical construction be what it will.

If we suffer them to make an affirmative idea in our mind, this idea will certainly be false, and contrary to Behmen's sense and intent.

But if we can come to have a right negative idea, this will be the best, the nearest unto truth, and the most conformable unto our creatural state and duty. For it is a negative idea which Behmen presseth upon his readers, even in the midst of all his affirmative sayings; and beyond a negative idea we cannot climb up higher.

But I would not here be mistaken; for I know and freely grant that of this first abyssal world, there is and must be had one general idea, which may be called (in a half and broken sense) affirmative, viz. that it is something in and to itself.

And by saying, that beyond a negative idea we cannot climb up any higher, I understand, according to Behmen's own direction, that of this first world we can only say that it is neither this nor that, etc.; but cannot go forward to a sure, determined position, declaring what or how it is. And though we could, or did, by the very best and most accommodable expressions, yet none of them would be without all relation to nature and creature, and to this outward world also. Wherefore then, they all must be denied again, and could leave nothing behind them, in our mind, but an obscure, and as it were, a broken shadow of an affirmative representation. Which I could make out further, from a consideration of all those attributes that are usually given to the Divine Being, considered as in and after eternal nature, if I were not apt to think it is already evinced sufficiently, that Behmen is all for negative ideas, and that there is not such a contradiction to be found, as was objected above, concerning his affirmative expressions. Let us now

Answer 2ndly, Unto that other part of the objection, viz. that knowing and perceiving is denied indeed of the abyssal being, in that sense which hath any relation to creatures, but that it is not denied in all and every sense.

This seems to suppose, that there is a certain sense conceivable by creatures, which hath no relation to creatures.

But herein is no contradiction nor difficulty at all. It is easily to be understood, that a creature cannot be capable of any other sense, but what hath a relation unto creatures, and what is posterior to eternal nature. But seeing that a creature can know and own, there is still another and deeper world beyond its reach, which is not therefore an object of its understanding; the creature can know also certainly, that this or that may be affirmed or denied of that world, in a human way or method, and by such a person as hath had a prospect thereof, as Behmen had.

And if the creature can know and own so much, it can certainly also know more, that all such words and expressions as are thus spoken thereof, must have a sense in them. If then, there is a sense in them, this sense must be as it were proportionable, not unto the second natural, but unto the first abyssal world, although it be expressed by natural words, inferior and posterior not only to the first, but also to the second world. And if so, the creature can also easily apprehend of itself, that this sense is not proportionable to its understanding, and that it is not expressed or included in words, for to be found out and understood, what or how it is in itself (which is deeper than any thought can reach), but that it is only mentioned or shadowed out by natural words, all taken a posteriori from things derived thence, to be known that it is, and to be owned that it is the deepest, central original of all the posterior worlds.

Teutonicus speaketh of the second world, viz., of eternal nature and its two eternal principles, all with words taken from temporal nature; giving, indeed, unto eternal invisible things, the same names which are given unto temporal and visible things; because these came forth from them, and are their visible representatives, and he had no other words to use, cautioning us at the same time, that we must observe a distinction in the sense, lest we should set cows and calves into heaven, and charge him undeservedly with gross absurdities. [N.B.]

So he speaketh also of the first abyssal world, with the same words he useth in the descriptions of the second world, which certainly he doth not, that we should make a confusion of these two worlds, so carefully by him distinguished, but he doth it only upon the same account as mentioned, which alone might be sufficient to show us, that we must observe a distinction in the sense, which he could not observe in words; and which we can easily observe, if we but mind which world it is he speaketh of, whether the second together with its temporal outbirth, wherein all things are displayed in distinction, or the first only, wherein all things are concentrated.

Whatever now is understood from his words, by any reader from the lowest to the highest degree, that is a sense which hath a relation unto creatures, and a sense which is natural; and though it be an illuminated understanding, yet this sense is natural, i. e. posterior unto, and originated from eternal nature; and though it may be good and true in its kind, with respect to the creature, and to the illumination, yet this sense must not be applied to that first abyssal world, as if it were able to declare what it is, but must absolutely be denied, since this first world is deeper than any natural sense or thought can reach.

But now, when such a sense as this is denied, the question is, What is then left, or what benefit can we reap from such descriptions?

Answer: There is left a deeper sense, excluding the generation of eternal nature, and therefore not conceivable by creatures, what, or how; but only knowable that it is. The words of Behmen signify that all our ideas of this first abyssal world must be negative; and that no affirmative one, truly to be called so, can be had thereof by any creature.

And our benefit is, that we are by his descriptions, advised what, and from whence we are, and how far we can reach; and be cautioned also to put a stop to our natural curiosity, etc. Thus much concerning this objection.

PROCEED we now in our designed method. When Behmen saith first negatively, that perceiving, knowing, etc., is not in this first abyssal world, by perceiving and knowing we understand that which is natural unto ourselves, and pre-supposeth the generation of eternal nature, upon which, with all our senses and perception we do depend, and are not able to have any deeper sense of these things than what this generation of eternal nature hath ended us with. So that we must own that all this, and whatever might be named the like, in this particular and natural sense, is not and cannot be in that first abyssal world, which excludeth nature.

But when Behmen saith again affirmatively, knowing and perceiving, etc. is in the first abyssal world; must this affirmative expression be false, by reason that the former negative was true? God forbid! That former negative must have been true, because of its implying a relation to the second world, which in the first can have no place at all, and must therefore absolutely be denied, nay cannot be denied strictly and vigorously enough.

And this latter affirmative must be true also, because of its not implying any relation neither unto nature nor creature, but reflecting only upon that first world as it is in itself. And so both this and that is true, with different respects, to two most different worlds.

Our greatest stumbling block lieth in this, that the same words, knowing and perceiving, etc. are used both in the affirmative and negative expressions; and because we cannot form in our minds any difference between knowing and knowing, we are apt to think there can be no foundation for it.

But let us but mind only this, often told us by Behmen, that none of our senses, thoughts, concepts, can reach that first abyssal world; because we are with all our being, only natural, and cannot rise, or raise up in us, nor send forth any thought beyond eternal nature. We might be apt to fancy, indeed, that we send beyond eternal nature such or such of our thoughts or ideas, when we are trying to conceive in our minds that first abyssal world. But if we stick here, our thoughts are very low, and unacquainted with Behmen's sense in this deep unexpressible matter.

None of our thoughts can be free from eternal nature, nor reach beyond its limits, no more than the sound of our words, when we speak at London of the East Indies, can exceed that compass, which our voice is able to reach. But all our thoughts are generated in and by eternal nature, are inferior to it, and are confined thereby to mere particulars, as they are all particulars themselves; wherefore, then, none of them can be able to break through its borders, and to enter that first central world, which alone is a whole and universal all.

Now, if all that natural sense which we have about these expressions of knowing, perceiving, etc., be utterly denied of the first abyssal world, there will presently (without our forming, or being solicitous about another sense,) this position result from his words, that there is, in his affirmative expressions, a sense, not conceivable what or how, but knowable that it is.

Which being knowable, will be found grounded upon that seeing of the spirit of the soul; when that other, not being conceivable, is grounded upon that sight's being dazzled, confounded, etc.

He that made the eye and prepared the ear, shall he not see and hear?

I know it will be here replied, the causa efficiens of knowing, etc. in creatures, is to be sought after in the generation of eternal nature, i. e. in the second, and not in the first world, which hath no relation unto creatures.

This is granted: but then we must ask further, Whence comes knowing in this second world? If it be the second, then there is another first and deeper, even that which Behmen expressly calleth God in himself, the first world; then certainly this second in the generation of eternal nature, is descended down from the first. We know that God and nature are not to be confounded. God in himself is free from nature, and is not generated by it, but is prior and superior to it; notwithstanding that in another sense, neither of them is prior, nor posterior, but both are co-eternal. But seeing that it cannot be said of God, that he had an eternal beginning in nature, when it can be said of nature, that she had an eternal beginning in God; and seeing again, that something is by Behmen, placed and considered as before and without eternal nature, which he calleth God, Nothing and All; we must allow that this eternal nothing and all, is the only causa efficiens of that second world, and the knowing therein.

It will still be replied, That knowing, etc. is not denied absolutely and in every sense of the first abyssal world, but that it lieth therein only potentially, and so, as Behmen saith, all powers, colours, and virtues do lie therein, as in a chaos or temperature, without distinction.

Answer: This chaos, or temperature without distinction, is rightly so called in one sense, with reference to the second world, and to creatures depending upon it, but cannot be called so in another, with respect to the first world itself. Seeing we heard above, that Behmen plainly saith, that in this first abyssal world, the one power, colour, virtue, etc., perceiveth the other in distinction.

Forasmuch then, as in this first world is distinction, let it be in what sense soever, this first world is not a chaos, nor a temperature in and to itself, though it is still so with respect to the second world.

For if this distinction in the first world, is not, according to the distinction in eternal nature, conceivable by creatures, but according to the first world, only knowable that it is; and if that spirit of the soul which is admitted into the sight thereof, can see that powers, colours, and virtues (three distinct things) do lie therein, and yet not see them distinctly, so as to discern the one from the other, this first world must be a chaos or temperature with respect to that soulish spirit that looks thereon, and to the second world wherein all things are so distinct as to be discernable; but must also again not be a chaos or temperature, with respect to what it is in and to itself. For seeing Behmen saith that in the first abyssal world, that which he calleth the Father, is not that selfsame in all and every sense, which he calleth the Son; that which he calleth Spirit, is not that which he calleth Wisdom; and so the powers are not colours, etc. All and every distinction cannot be absolutely denied.

It is known that Behmen describeth the eternal chaos as a most terrible appearance, which, like as a dreadful flash of lightning, confoundeth instantly and consumeth the sight of the soulish spirit, so that he cannot see what it is, but only know that it is. What shall we now think of this description? Can we think that it is given forth by Tentonicus, in order to declare what this wonderful thing is in itself? Hath it not a manifest relation unto creatures, and even unto creatures only, by saying that it is confounding and consuming? For certainly this cannot be applied to that Eye of eternity, with respect to what it is in and to itself, seeing that none will say, it is itself, and by itself, confounded in its sight? Wherefore then, it must be quite another thing in and to itself, than what it appears to be to a created eye, looking upon it from without.

If this eye seeth something, and seeth so that it can bear the sight without being confounded at it, it cannot see (like as the spirit of the soul seeth) only one something, or one confuse chaos; but it must see a numberless number of things, and must in this seeing, perceive them so as they are, viz. as not yet in being, and so also as not yet distinguished in themselves, but as standing in a possibility to be brought forth into so many distinct beings; and so also as distinguishable in the sight of this eye. For this is plain, when we but consider what from this sight, or in this eye, doth arise, viz. a delightful play, and further, a design to bring forth these wonders into being, that that they might appear into a distinct existency, etc. Again,

If perceiving, knowing, etc. should be absolutely denied of the first abyssal world, pray what could the name of Wisdom signify?

It is certain that Behmen placeth Wisdom not only in the second world, or in and after the generation of eternal nature, but also in the first; and that he saith expressly, in a Clavis never to my knowledge printed in English: The Mysterium Magnum without nature, and Wisdom, are utterly one and the same thing.

We know, indeed, that he speaks of a Mysterium Magnum in and after Nature; but this is plainly distinguished from that, by this notorious mark of distinction, without nature.

Now as to that other denomination of wisdom, he saith indeed plainly, that Wisdom is properly so called in the second world, implying and pre-supposing the generation of eternal nature; and that before nature in the first world, it is more properly called a mirror of eternal wonders. But even this twofold denomination sheweth us, that one and the same thing ought to be considered in a different sense, relating to two different worlds. For though he hath given us this twofold denomination, as proper, yet he useth almost always the selfsame name of wisdom, both in his first consideration before, and his second after the generation of eternal nature. And what is this else, but to say, that we must not make two quite different things, of that which is but one; but must look upon that one thing in two different respects, senses, and degrees, according to the different conditions of the first and second world.

Wisdom, then, is indeed more properly to be called so, in and after the generation of eternal nature, wherein it is Mysterium Magnum, with respect to its being unfolded and displayed afterwards in the creation, chiefly of angels and men, and is pre-supposing its having been unfolded and displayed in another degree already, in the generation of eternal nature.

And Wisdom is indeed more improperly called so before and without nature, where it is Mysterium Magnum, with respect to its becoming unfolded and displayed the first time, or in the first degree, in the generation of the seven chiefest, and innumerable lesser properties of eternal nature; and is pre-supposing no other antecedent unfolding or displaying.

But yet it is still both before and after nature only one and the same thing, and the two different denominations are only to give us notice of two different degrees, wherein this one thing is to be considered, if we will not confound the first world with the second.

Wisdom implieth in its idea, perception, knowledge, and understanding; therefore these are with wisdom both before and after eternal nature.

In the first world, God is considered only as in himself, abstractively from all relation, respect, or tendency towards anything without himself. And in the second, he is considered as in eternal nature, or with respect to something, which is in a sense without him, and is not himself, but is to be distinguished from him. When, nevertheless, this twofold consideration made by the creature, doth not make a twofold God, as it doth also not bring in a confusion between the first and second world. So then, according to this distinction, wisdom also must be considered both as in the first world, before, and as in the second, after eternal nature; when yet there will not be made thereby two wisdoms, but only one, and no confusion shall be brought in, but a great difference between the first and second consideration of wisdom will be found, consisting chiefly therein, that as wisdom in the second world, implieth a knowing and understanding what it is, to have actually unfolded and displayed the first deepest central world, in and through the generation of eternal nature, to have introduced himself out of the still eternity, or first temperature, which is without all properties, into the second temperature, full of harmonised properties and qualifications; to have brought forth his eternal tender Lubet through the three first restless properties of nature, to have exerted his omnipotent all-sufficiency in the generation of the fourth, by opening therein his own eternal liberty, or central groundless world, and to have introduced that eternal lubet, through this most dreadful magic fire, into that most majestic habitation, which is the second principle of light and love and glory, etc.

So also wisdom in the first world, implieth a perceiving, knowing, and understanding what it is to live and dwell only in himself, in the calm still eternity or liberty, without fire and light, and the properties of nature. But especially and chiefly also, what it is (N.B.) to be in himself alone all-sufficient for all the things performed in the generation of eternal nature. If we own that wisdom in the second world implieth perception and knowing, in that former more exterior sense, we must own also, that wisdom in the first world implieth perception and knowledge, etc. in this latter more interior sense. For these two can no more be separable from each other, than the second world can be separable from the first, or a circumference from its centre.

If there is in the first world before and without nature, no perception, knowledge, etc., then there is also not only no wisdom, but also no God, in no sense and manner. But how contrary is this to our CENTRALIS PHILOSOPHUS, who says, God is in himself the first world: God is both the byss and abyss, and yet nothing apprehendeth him, except the true understanding or intellect: and (N.B.) this intellect is God himself. Again,

If there were no understanding in this abyss, eternal nature must be looked upon as the only mother of wisdom. But nature is not the mother of wisdom, not even of that wisdom which is considered in the second world: but nature is only that medium sine qua non, or that instrument by the use of which the first original mother, or the deepest central womb, which is wisdom before nature in the first world, hath introduced itself into such a perceptibility, knowledge, and understanding, as can be had in the second world only, and as wisdom therefore in the first world could not have at all.

Wisdom cannot conveniently be called a mother, for as she never hath borne any other thing, wherefore Behmen calleth her a Virgin; so we can also not say, that wisdom in the first world hath borne any other or younger wisdom different from herself, as a child differs from its mother. But we say only that wisdom in the first world, wherein she was only in and to herself, hath in the second world unfolded and displayed herself and all her secret riches, which were concentrated in the first world:

That so she might be made sensible of what it is to have them thus displayed, and to behold and enjoy them distinctly, in fire, light, glory, joy, etc.: And she might also make herself thereby intelligible, accessible, and communicable, in a sense and manner unto creatures; all which she could neither have had nor could have been in the first world, before and without nature.

And though it may be said, if rightly understood, that eternal nature is the mother of wisdom, yet to say so absolutely and universally, without restriction, is nothing less than abominable nonsense. And to conceive that eternal nature hath brought forth wisdom, properly so called in the second world, out of itself, or from its own sufficiency, without concurrence or direction of a deeper antecedent wisdom, and without a foregoing intent, is utterly inconsistent with Behmen's Theosophy. Which not only placeth wisdom as well before nature in the first world, as after it in the second, but tells us also, that the first Abyssal world will not be such an imperceptible nothing as it is before Nature, but will perceive itself in and through the properties of nature; and that it hath therefore a fixed intent and purpose to flow forth out of its still eternity, and to introduce its tender lubet into strength, power, glory, majesty, fire, and light.

All which doth show us sufficiently, that wisdom in the first world is not an empty name, but that it implyeth not only a perceiving its abyssal state, but also a finding itself able and all-sufficient for performing its intent, viz., for going through the three first properties of dark nature into the fire, and through the fire into the light.

For this is its going into the second world, and its becoming in this world that which it will be, and not yet can be, in the first world.

Behmen saith plainly, that in the Mysterium Magnum before and without Nature (which is wisdom, as we heard above), there laid eternal nature itself, as a hidden fire, which (N.B.) is and is not. It is not, for it is in that first world, not only nothing unto creatures, but also nothing unto itself. And yet it is, for it is in the first world unto the eye of eternity that, which wisdom finds herself sufficient, for to fit and to prepare as a proper instrument, for her own use and advantage.

If then, nature laid thus hidden in wisdom, wisdom is not brought forth by nature, but nature by wisdom. And wisdom is but unfolded, displayed, manifested and glorified by nature, which is but as an instrument in her hand. And if so, it cannot but be evident sufficiently, not only that wisdom in the first world before, and wisdom in the second world in and after nature, are not two, but only one; but also, that this one wisdom must be considered with a different respect to these two different worlds, and must be taken in such a twofold sense, as mentioned before.

Our simile we had above, taken from a centre and its circumference, may help to illustrate this matter very much.

First we are to take good notice thereof, that the two names centre and circumference are both relative, so that neither of them can be, nor be conceived, without or with exclusion of the other. There may be, and may be conceived indeed, a single point, which can be made a centre, but cannot be called a centre, nor be conceived so, as long as the notion of a circumference is not implied. And again: there cannot be, nor be conceived any circumference, if a centre is not implied and presupposed; though there can be, and be conceived an individual point without relation to a circumference, and even that selfsame point which afterwards is made and called a centre, as soon as it hath drawn about it its circumference.

So then we have now a notable distinction between a POINT and a CENTRE: which distinction, as it doth not make neither two points nor two centres, so it doth also not bring in any change or alteration upon that point, but gives it only a new relation, which it had not before, and obliges us to consider one and the same thing in two different respects. First, as it is only in and to itself, without any relation to this or that without itself; in which consideration it is called a point, but not a centre. And secondly, as it is with this relation to the circumference without itself, in which consideration it is called a centre, not a point, notwithstanding that it still is in itself that very same without any alteration, which it was before, when it not yet could have been called a centre.

And so this distinction is not generated in our brain, nor laid upon the thing by our contrivance, but is generated in the thing itself; hath its ground in an actual generation, done without us; and is brought from thence into our idea, which cannot change or place the order of these names according to its own pleasure, but must needs conceive them as they are in their natural order; according to which, the notion of a point is prior to the notion of a centre, and the notion of a centre prior again to the notion of a circumference.

For every centre is a point, but not every point a centre; and no circumference can be, if there be not first a centre, from which it may have its being.

Like as also no centre can be, which could not first have been a point before it was a centre, and which could not still be that same point, though the circumference thereof were utterly removed. Seeing that the circumference depends only upon the centre, and cannot be without it what it is, but must lose all its being if the centre is abolished. But the centre depends not so upon the circumference, for it hath something in its own essence, which is deeper and more substantial than this accessory relation. This therefore it keeps and represents under the primary name of a point, and can by abolishing all the circumference, lose nothing but that secondary relative name of a centre.

Now in this distinction we shall find a fine and proper emblem of the first world before and without, and of the second world in or after eternal nature; and of those things also that are or may be attributed both unto this and that. The point shall be an emblem of the first abyssal world, considered only and purely as in and to itself. And the centre of that first abyssal world again, yet no more considered as before, but as bearing a relation to its being outflown, and unfolded in the generation of the eternal nature, which fitly may be represented by the circumference.

Now further, this circumference* may be considered so as we did above, viz. as consisting of numberless little points, all surrounding their centre and all standing in equal distance therefrom, and all being connected to each other in an exact order, number and proportion.

And in this consideration we may find a fine emblem of the creatures, but especially of angels and men, all standing round about the central throne of majesty, in the second world; and so also round about their only common deepest original in the first abyssal world; and all being made able to know and understand, not only their own condition they are in, with a mutual relation to themselves, but also more or less to their common centre, or abyssal original.

A large application of this simile is not intended, seeing that so many particulars thereof were declared and insisted upon above.

Let but them, and what more may depend upon them duly be considered, and it will appear of itself, that all that which holy angels, and men of Behmen's understanding, will say in this matter, that same (viz. in a shadowy resemblance thereof, and answerableness thereunto) all the particular points of a circumference would say also, both of themselves and of their centre, if they were understanding creatures, and able to declare their mind by speech; all which saying would cer-

* In illustration of this instructive and interesting subject of point, centre, circumference, unity, totality, etc. which necessarily embraces the whole philosophy of theoretical and indeed practical christian truth, Freher in the years 1717—20, designed a number of emblems and mathematical figures, inclosed by the circle of unity, which constitute a small treatise. We have not space or convenience for the insertion of these beautiful and elaborate symbols, but give the propositions with which in the original they are either circumscribed or superscribed. And by the way, the demonstration and symbolic illustration of propositions of abstract truth, might form another set exercise of elevated science in a theosophic college. The propositions are these:

I.—Centrum centrum ubique, circumferentia nusquam. Unum, non unum sic simul omnia.
II.—Unum immensi mensura sui. Non capitur nisi a se-ipso. In se quiescit; sibi sufficit uni; nullius indiget; continet omnia punctum.

III.—Quod cernis nec unum est, nec centrum est, nec punctum est, nec totum est: punctum intelligibile tantum. IV.—Pluralitas est nullitas.

V.—Ubi nil præter unum, quis illi dabit aliquid ut retribuatur ipsi? Quod vere totum partes non habet. Quod partes habet totum non est. Punctum solum vere totum.

VI.—Nec recedit, nec appropinquat, æqualiter semper à circumferentia distat. Est, erat, erit idem. Nomen illi tantum circumferentia mutat.

VII.—Ista cum ponerentur, extitit illud. Unum si negas omnia tollis: et quæ insania major?

VIII.—Tollantur ista; manet illud. Centrum cesset, nomen perdat; punctum erit.

IX.—Unum semper idem. Quod suum non dat alteri.

tainly be to this effect. Since there is perceiving, knowing, etc. in the circumference, which is granted by every one, there must also be perceiving, knowing, etc. in the centre, with that distinction only, which was mentioned so frequently. But again, since there is perceiving, knowing, etc. in the centre, as centre; which knowing and understanding hath a relation unto creatures, and is so much as to say: An understanding what it is to be a centre, and to have brought forth actually a circumference; there must also be perceiving, knowing, and understanding in that central point, considered only as a point, and before it came to be a centre. Which understanding hath not such a relation unto creatures, but is only so much as to say: An understanding what it is to be an individual point in itself, or an all and one, and to be all-sufficient of itself, for to become a centre. The plain reason of this consequence may appear from these two considerations. (1.) The generation of the circumference hath not brought any change upon that point, but only hath occasioned a new relation, expressed by that new relative name of a centre, when it was before that very same, in and to itself, under the name of a point. For the circumference, in its generation having not been able to give anything unto its centre, but only to receive from its centre, all what it is and hath, could not have given knowledge and understanding unto its center, but could only have been instrumental for unfolding and displaying that understanding, which in the centre was before, and so also in the point before the centre. (2.) In the abyssal point, before it was a centre, there was an aim, an intent, (as we have heard from Behmen above) to become a centre, by flowing forth and introducing itself into the generation of eternal nature; and further, by means of this, into the creation of angels and men. Which intent doth imply a perceiving, knowing, etc. (called so by denominations taken from after eternal nature, because none can be had from before it) both what it is, to be in and to it itself, an individual point, and to have an all-sufficiency for performing all that is required, for to be called a centre, and to be praised so, throughout the whole circumference.

So therefore it may be said, not only in a particular sense, that understanding is generated (not out of but) in or through the circumference of eternal nature; but also in a general one, that understanding was before the generation of eternal nature; and that this nature (unless understanding had been so before) could not have been generated at all. Which understanding in this latter sense, is plainly understood by that eternal seeing in Wisdom's glass, which is before and without eternal nature, according to many places in Behmen, already quoted.

So I think it is made out sufficiently, that all the expressions of Behmen about this matter, both negative and affirmative are true, with a different respect to two worlds. In those that are called negative, saying, that no perception, etc. is in the Divine Abyssal Being, the creature speaketh in its own sphere unto creatures, and of created things, having in its idea of perception, knowing, etc. nothing else but what is generated in and through the process of eternal nature. For beyond that it is not able to raise up any thought, much less to form any affirmative idea. Justly therefore the creature denyeth all these things of the Divine Abyssal Being, saying positively and absolutely they are not therein, and exalting thus that first Central Being above all what can be conceived, what is particular, circumferential, and standing in number and order. But in those expressions that are called affirmative, the creature speaketh as it were, in imitation of that Abyssal Being, which all alone knoweth and understandeth not only that, but also what, and how it is, in and to itself. And which is rather to be conceived therefore, as speaking of itself, and saying: I am the Lord thy God, but one God, etc. which how it is declared by Behmen, and applied to that first central being in the first world, before and without all nature and creature, may be seen and taken into deep consideration from the first chapter of PRÆDESTINATION. Unto which for a conclusion this only question may be added: What is that which holy angels not only adore, but also so adore, that they hide and cover their faces from?

Which we must needs answer unto (1.) that their honouring and adoring is chiefly to be referred to that infinite, most glorious Being in fire and light, which is so near unto them, that they are themselves also partakers of that divine nature, as so many particular images or representatives thereof, and related thereunto as children unto their father. And (2.) the hiding and covering their faces, hath a plain relation to that deepest, central and abyssal being, before and without its manifestation in eternal nature, or in fire and light.

For this they are not so near unto, but stand in a sense, as it were at an infinite distance from it, and can never be able to be admitted thereinto, though they may be able to look upon it. But like as our natural sight is instantly dazzled and confounded by looking into the bright shining sun, so that our eyes must be shut or covered; so theirs also, by looking into that first central world, which, from such a looking upon it, they can know no more of, but that it is, and must leave the knowledge and understanding, what or how it is, unto this first abyssal being itself.

Now all these things calmly and without prejudice considered, are enough to show, that both the affirmative and negative expressions of Teutonicus, are just and true, by minding only such a different respect to two different worlds.

But though thus far all is right, yet all this is not yet far enough, nor doth it reach the bottom, or represent the full sense and mind of our author.

From whose words there will still be objected, In one will can be no knowledge of itself. Wherefore we must now further in a second consideration, show also, that all his expressions both affirmative and negative are sound, true, and consistent with each other, in and with respect to the first abyssal world only, without any relation, or reflection, made upon the second world, or generation of eternal nature.

II.—In this our Second Consideration then, wherefrom the generation of eternal nature with all its properties is utterly excluded, the denomination of this first world, and especially that of abyss and of will, or the first Abyssal Will, are to be considered.

It is true indeed, that if this first world, or God in himself is called by Behmen abyss only, and nothing else or more but abyss, we cannot attribute any knowing, etc. to it, and his negative expressions only must be true, with exclusion of all them that are affirmative.

And again, if in this abyss, there is asserted by Behmen One only Will, absolutely and in every sense; his plain expression, that in one will there can be knowledge of itself, must be true absolutely and without any limitation:

But if we can show from his plain words, that in this first world (which is abyss and nothing but abyss with respect to the second world) there is not only abyss, but byss also, in another sense and respect appropriable to the first world. And again that in this first world, (wherein there is one will, in one sense) there is also in another, both a first and second will, answering to that abyss, and byss, which both are in the first world, which are inseparable from each other, are that first world themselves, it will be evident, that with a different relation to this abyss and byss, and to this first and second will, answerable thereunto, all his negative and affirmative expressions must be true both together, not only without any loss, but also without any contradiction. The negative must be true of the abyss, or first will, and the affirmative of the byss or second will, and so they shall be both true of this first world, without any relation to the second.

I shall represent an abstract of the first chapter of his MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, making such observations as plainly and undeniably arise from his expressions.

So then he says, ch. i. 2. God is an eternal nothing; he hath neither ground, nor beginning, nor place, and possesseth nothing but himself.

This is certainly spoken of God before and without eternal nature, for he saith that he possesseth nothing but himself: ergo no eternal nature, and none of all the properties thereof; for all these are not himself, but after and under him.

Now of this first world, or of God, considered as in himself only, he saith further, He is the will of the abyss; He is in himself but one.

Again, He generates himself in himself, (ergo not in nature) from eternity to eternity.

Objection. No generation can be without motion; now motion is a property of nature, ergo, the generation of eternal nature is here implied.

Answer. No natural generation, distinctly conceivable and intelligible by creatures, can be without that motion, which is the second property of eternal nature.

But a supernatural (called in other places the intellectual life, or) generation, not conceivable distinctly by angels and men, what or how it is, but only knowable that it is, can be without that motion, which is the second property of nature.

But there will be asked, What distinction can we conceive to be between motion and motion? Or why must we call one natural and the other supernatural? Is not this a distinction of our own invention?

No, this distinction is delivered us by Behmen, and is grounded upon the whole harmonious analogy of all his writings.

For we can conceive such a distinction between motion and motion, as we can and ought to conceive, between God dwelling in himself, in the first world, and as manifested without himself, in the second world; between lust and desire, neither of which can be conceived without all motion, when yet this latter only is natural, or in nature, and that former supernatural, or above and antecedent to nature. And again, such a distinction as is between generation and generation, or which here is all the very same, between generation and manifestation.

Read attentively the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth verses of the seventh chapter in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, where these two positions are distinctly expressed and explained, viz. (1.) God generates himself in Trinity: and (2.) the Trinity is rightly understood only in his eternal manifestation, or generation of eternal Nature.

Is it not here undeniably plain, (1.) that he speaks of a generation in himself, before nature, and (2.) of a manifestation, or generation in eternal nature; and that he distinguishes the one from the other, by saying, that the generation in nature, only is an object of our understanding, but not so the generation before and without nature.

Again, he saith

He hath no peculiar room, or place, where he might dwell: The eternal Wisdom, or intellect is his habitation: He is the will of wisdom, and wisdom is his manifestation.

Now that which is here called wisdom, is above called the Mysterium Magnum without nature, and the seeing Eye of eternity; and this wisdom is called again the habitation of the first will, and the manifestation thereof.

Now who does not see that he speaks here of a manifestation antecedent to nature, though in other places, and in another sense and respect, he saith right and true that without nature no manifestation could be? Nay who does not see, that such a manifestation and in such a sense, must be in God, of an absolute necessity, before and without nature. For truly a seeing eye implyeth all this manifestation.

But let us follow our author further.

v. 3. In this eternal generation, three things are to be understood: (1.) an eternal will, (2.) an eternal mind of that will, and (3.) the outgoing from this will and mind, which is a spirit of the will and mind. * * *

Before I proceed any further, it will be useful to make the following observations:

(1.) That whenever Behmen declareth the generation of eternal nature, considering the same, not only as to the distinct properties and different operations thereof, but also chiefly as to its coming forth out of the abyssal deep, or eternal temperature, or eternal nothing; he considereth that nothing chiefly as an UNITY, making in the most places no mention at all, and in some few, but a short mention of the Trinity.

But contrariwise, when he considereth that abyssal deep, or eternal nothing, only as in itself, he makes but little mention of the Unity, and insists chiefly, distinctly, and sometimes largely upon the Trinity.

(2.) The next observation is this, that in some places, Behmen gives us a description of God and Nature taken together in conjunction; wherein as to God, he represents both unity and trinity, and as to nature, he considers it as generated already, or as generating actually, so that he declareth the whole process of this generation, in all the seven properties. So, for instance, he doth in the AURORA, in the THREEFOLD LIFE, in the CLAVIS, etc.

And again in other places he describeth God and Nature together, but so, that he considereth nature as not yet generated, but as still lying in the first abyssal will, as a hidden fire, which is, and is not; taking no notice of its distinct properties, but only of its being eternally distinct from God, its only co-eternal original; which nevertheless he considers and represents not only as to the Unity, but also and chiefly, as to the Trinity. This he doth in the EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY MYSTERY, from the first text to v. 5 of the fifth text. So also in the SIX POINTS, i. 1—33. These places are thought to be the most against all knowledge, etc. and all Trinity before and without nature, though at the bottom they are strictly concordant with this first chapter of MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, and the first chapter of PREDESTINATION. * * *

Here I will only observe of these two places, in general,

If Behmen, in the Nine Texts, and in the SIX POINTS, considereth God and nature, so, that as to God, he tells us, What the Divine Being is in itself without a principle or what the deepest Divine Being is without nature, which are his own words, SIX POINTS, i. 22, and 30. And so, that as to nature, he looks upon it, as not yet nature or not actually generated, but as lying still in the first abyssal will, as a fire which burneth not, which is, and is not —. And if he nevertheless distinguisheth God from nature, or from that which is to be nature afterwards, and says of a generation in God, a generation in Trinity, a threefold Spirit, etc. after the same manner as he doth in the first chapter of MYSTERIUM MAGNUM and PREDESTINATION, it is certain that he giveth us in all these places but one and the same description of the Divine Being, containing a generation in Trinity, antecedent to nature, and excluding all its properties.

And again, if Behmen in the Nine Texts, gives us a description of the spiritual and essential or natural life, or of God and nature, so, that he not only calleth the one as well as the other a life, expressly speaking of two lives,

But also, that answerably to these two lives, he speaks of a twofold desire. Text iv. v. 8; the one of which is after the generation of the word or heart, and the other after the generation of nature. Declaring that first generation in the spiritual life, after the same manner, as he doth in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM and PREDESTINATION; and saying moreover, that in the natural life no intellect would be, if the spiritual life were not (N.B. 1.) desiring, in which desire (not that which is after the generation of nature) the Word is generated from eternity to eternity: from which (N.B. 2.) the desiring will goeth out eternally, into the natural life, and openeth, etc.

It is as plain as anything can be, that he asserts in the Nine Texts an Intellect, and generation in Trinity before and without nature.

But to return to the Mysterium Magnum. There then he says, that In this eternal generation three things are to be understood. As to the word generation we must observe, that as it differs from manifestation, in every common sense and matter, so it differs also therefrom in Behmen's sense, and in this deep spiritual matter;

Wherein the generation must needs go before the manifestation. Now in that first consideration of the Divine Being, he useth always the word generation, and in the second, implying and presupposing nature, that of manifestation.

The generation in Trinity is done and is still doing before and without nature, from eternity to eternity. But the manifestation of this Trinity is done and still doing in the generation of nature.

We cannot say that the Trinity is generated in or through nature, though in a certain limited sense it might be said so, but we cannot say so in an absolute sense without any limitation, if we will not make nature the original of the Triune Being: But we can say absolutely and in every sense, that the Trinity, which was, and still is generated in itself, before and without nature, is manifested in and through nature, without itself; and is by this manifestation made intelligible, first unto God himself, (in a certain sense relating unto nature, spoken of above sufficiently) and further unto creatures also. For, though there are not yet in this consideration, any creatures to be implied, yet there is implied so much, that this manifestation in and through nature, made a way for the production of creatures, which without it could not have been produced; and that it made also the Trinity able to be an object of a created understanding; which it could not have been, if this manifestation had not been made.

We know, not only that the generation of nature, is in its three first properties, represented by Behmen as a Δ , and called expressly the triangle of nature; but also, that these three are by him referred distinctly to the Father, Son, and Spirit.

Now we cannot say, that they are referred unto them, only so far, as Father, Son and Spirit are manifest in this generation of nature; but we must say also, so far as Father, Son, and Spirit are in this eternal generation before and without nature, where they are not yet properly to be called Father, Son, and Spirit (see Mysterium Magnum, vii. 10, 11,) and are yet called so most frequently.

For if that Father, Son and Spirit, which Behmen calleth so before nature, by denominations taken from after nature, is the Trinity in this eternal generation, represented by Behmen in such a character as Δ or Δ .

Further if this Trinity is that one eternal life, good, or God, which he commonly calleth so, in his first consideration of God: And if nature with all its properties, hath its eternal original from that one eternal life; the Δ in nature cannot but be originated from Father, Son and Spirit, or from that Trinity which is before and without nature. Seeing that this same triangle in nature is the beginning of its manifestation or the manifestation thereof itself, according to the inferior restless part of nature. Which manifestation therefore of the Trinity must needs be placed in nature, when the generation thereof must be before and without it; so that we rightly conceive this generation to be prior, and that manifestation to be posterior, yet both co-eternal and without beginning, but in such a difference of sense, as there was mentioned above.

Now further, this distinction and difference between generation and manifestation, can also show us plainly, how we are to conceive rightly, to place in due order the Unity and Trinity.

But first we must here observe, of the expression Unity, that it is here taken in that strict and narrow sense, wherein it is used by Behmen with relation to the Trinity only; and not in that larger, wherein he useth to say of an unity, or, if I may say so, of a chaotic oneness of all things, in the first Mysterium Magnum. Which latter unity hath a relation, or is rather opposite, not to the Divine Trinity, but to the variety and multiplicity produced in nature, and further in the creation of angels and men and of all this third principle. Which observation is well to be taken notice of, that we may not confound this unity with that, or else we shall confound the Trinity with multiplicity, and God with nature. [N.B.]

This latter unity, with relation to nature and creatures, and to the variety and multiplicity therein, is or was an unity before and without nature only, but in the generation of nature and creature, it is utterly lost, is turned into multiplicity, and hath ceased to be what it was before nature, so that it cannot be found in nature and creature, considered as nature and creature; for it is their own essentiality to stand all in division, distinction, particularity and variety, which if they stood not in, they were not nature and creature.

But that former Unity, with relation to the Trinity only, is an unity always, and everywhere, and ceaseth not to be in the generation of the Trinity; it is not lost at all therein, nor is turned into the Trinity, but continueth still an individual unity, diffused as it were through the whole Trinity, and to be found whole without diminution in each of the Three, and whole also without alteration in all Three together. For as much as it is the inseparable essentiality of God, both before and after nature, to be but one, in an universal individual Unity.

And though the properties of eternal nature do continue also, in a sense, all seven to be but one, yet this oneness of them is already so much different and declined from its former unity, which it had when it still laid as a hidden fire in the first abyssal will, and is now so abolished in the distinct generation of nature and the seven different properties thereof, that it can no more be found in nature, considered as nature generated, but only in a reflection made upon its first original.

Now this unity is here not considered, but only that former Unity in its strict and narrow sense, with relation to the Divine Trinity.

And of this Unity, we say according to Behmen, that we cannot place it before and without nature, and the Trinity, as if before eternal nature, there were nothing but an unity, and as if this unity were only in and through nature displayed, or unfolded into a Trinity.

For he says expressly, that in this generation (N.B.) three things are to be understood. And again, the triangle denotes (N.B.) the hidden God (or God unmanifest) viz. the word or Divine Intellect, which (hidden God) in his eternal beginningless generation, is threefold, and yet but one in his manifestation.

Here we see again and again, (1.) that the generation is different from the manifestation of God. (2.) That there is a generation in Trinity, (asserted by Behmen) in God himself from eternity to eternity. (3.) God unmanifest (which is nothing else but God before and without nature) is here denoted by a triangle, and expressly said to be threefold in the beginningless generation. (4.) That this God unmanifest in one sense, relating to nature, is manifest to himself according to his own eternal generation in himself.

For seeing there is in this unmanifestedness, mention made of a Divine Intellect, a manifestation of God unto himself is plainly implied, though he be unmanifest in nature.

Before and without nature, in the first place the Unity and in the second the Trinity are to be conceived, both as unmanifest to nature, but manifest unto themselves.

In or after nature, we must place first, the Unity again, and then the Trinity, but now as manifest and able to be an object of a created understanding, which, both as to angels and men, is and abides for ever and ever in nature, and in nature only.

And so we place no nature between the Unity and Trinity, but only between the Tri-unity unmanifest and the same Tri-unity manifest.

If we own, as it cannot be disowned, that Behmen makes a distinction between an eternal generation of God in himself, and an eternal manifestation in nature, saying, in this latter of three persons, and in that former of three things, we cannot refer the Trinity to this latter as also not unto that former only, but must refer it unto both; seeing that not only the three things before nature answer unto the three persons after nature, which are not generated by nature, but only manifested: but also that the three things before nature must needs be an unfolding of the Unity, as well as the three persons in or after nature, though not in an equal sense, manner or degree.

[NOTE.—This and the subsequent discourses are to be understood rather as abstracts from Frøher, made by Law for his own use, than verbatim copies of the originals: from which they differ in the form of the paragraphs, and in omitting here and there whatever Law considered not deserving his copying, or as unnecessary to the discourse. But the omissions (of which there are large portions in this and other places, antecedently and subsequently, which are not always distinguished by asterisks) may be of great value to such as are not so far advanced in theosophical science as he was: and therefore in case of publication of Frøher's works, it would be proper to print from the original, however voluminously expressed for clearness and perfect conviction, and as a foreigner, than from any abbreviations thereof by a master of logical composition, and native of this country.]
In the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, iv. 3. in an explication of the following characters [See 1, 2, 3, and 4 of Note.] he says,

The superior cross signifyeth (N.B.) the unformed Word in Trinity, without all nature: and this character [Note 3.] signifyeth the formed word, viz. the angelical world. First.]

The unformed Word here, is the same as unmanifest, both to be taken with reference to nature, declaring there is a Trinity unformed and unmanifest in nature, fitly represented by this character Λ , an emblem of the Unity as unfolded in Three.

Secondly, in this character [Note 3.] both the first and the second world, both the eternal generation and the eternal manifestation of the Trinity he represents together. For he says expressly, that this superior Λ is an emblem of the Trinity without all nature, and the [Note 5.] a character of the angelical world, that is, of nature in fire and light.

I know indeed, that in the SIGNATURA RERUM, ch. xiv. 29, he declareth this same character [Note 3.] after a manner quite different from this explication made in the fourth chapter of MYSTERIUM MAGNUM. For there he says, the superior cross above the circle is the kingdom of glory, which plainly implyeth the generation of eternal nature.

But what wonder is it, if upon a different account one and the same word, and so also one and the same character be used to represent different things, or also one and the same thing differently considered?

In the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM he considereth directly the Trinity without all nature, but in SIGNATURA RERUM he says not one word of the Trinity either as before or after nature, but considereth only the generation of the principles, and especially the production of the fire, which in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM is not mentioned at all.

In the SIGNATURA RERUM therefore he placeth justly the kingdom of glory, or the angelical world (as the highest in nature, which nature only he then considered) in the highest place immediately above the principle of fire.

And in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM he placeth justly also the Trinity without all nature (as the highest of all that can be named) even above the angelical world itself. Representing both that former and this latter, by one only character, but by such a one as \equiv fit for both.

It appears also in this same chapter xiv. 8. of the Signatura Rerum, that Behmen had not forgotten what he had said thereof in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM.

For he says, This impression is the only mother of the Mysterium's manifestation (N.B. not of the Mysterium but of the Mysterium's manifestation) and is called nature and substance, for it manifesteth what from eternity hath been in the eternal will.
